liar garments, which exposed them to greater contempt and ridicule. They never were instructed in the liberal arts, and their cruel masters often obliged them to drink to excess, to show the free-born citizens of Sparta the beastliness and disgrace of intoxication. They once every year received a number of stripes, that by this wanton flagellation they might recollect that they were born and died slaves. The Spartans even declared war against them; but Plutarch, who, from interested motives, endeavours to palliate the guilt and cruelty of the people of Lacedæmon, declares that it was because they had assisted the Messenians in their war against Sparta, after it had been overthrown by a violent earthquake. This earthquake was supposed by all the Greeks to be a punishment from heaven for the cruelties which the Lacedæmonians had exercised against the Helots. In the Peloponnesian war, these miserable slaves behaved with uncommon bravery, and were rewarded with their liberty by the Lacedæmonians, and appeared in the temples and at public shows crowned with garlands, and with every mark of festivity and triumph. This exultation did not continue long, and the sudden disappearance of the two thousand manumitted slaves was attributed to the inhumanity of the Lacedæmonians. Thucyd. 4.—Pollux. 3, c. 8.—Strab. 8.—Plut. in Lyc. &c.—*Aristot. HELVETI, an ancient nation of Gaul, conquered by J. Cæsar. Their country is the modern Switzerland. [Ancient Helvetia was of less extent than modern Switzerland, being bounded on the north by the Rhenus and Lacus Brigantinus or Lake of Constance, on the south by the Rhodanus and the Lacus Lemanus or Lake of Geneva, and on the west by Mons Jura.] *Cæs. HELVII, [a people of Gaul, north of the Arecomici, on the western bank of the Rhodanus. The mountain Cevenna, Cevennes, separates them from the Arverni. Their country is now Vivarez, and their capital Alba Augusta is Viviers.] Plin. 3, c. 4.

HENĒTI, [a people of Paphlagonia, along the coast of the Euxine. There was a tradition that they migrated to the north of Italy, near the mouths of the Padus or Po, and were the forefathers of the Veneti. But see remarks under the article Veneti, wherein it is attempted to be proved that the Veneti were of Slavonic descent.]

HENIŌCHI, a people of Asiatic Sarmatia, near Colchis, descended from Amphytus and Telechius, the charioteers (ἡνιοχοί) of Castor and Pollux, and thence called Lacedæmonii. Mela, 1, c. 21.—Paterc. 2, c. 40.—Flacc. 3, v. 270, l. 6, v. 42.

HEPHÆSTIA, the capital town of Lemnos.—A festival in honour of Vulcan, (Ἡφαιστος) at Athens. There was then a race with torches between three young men. Each in his turn ran a race with a lighted torch in his hand, and whoever could carry it to the end of the course before it was extinguished obtained the prize. They delivered it one to the other after they finished their course, and from that circumstance we see many allusions in ancient authors, who compare the vicissitudes of human affairs to this delivering of the torch, particularly in these lines of Lucretius 2 :

Et quasi cursores vitæ lampada tradunt.*

HEPHÆSTIĀDES, a name applied to the Lipari isles as sacred to Vulcan.

HEPHÆSTIUM. [a name given to a region in the extremity of Lycia near Phaselis, from which fire issued when a burning torch was applied to the surface. This was owing to the naphtha with which the soil was impregnated.]

HEPHÆSTĪO, a Greek grammarian of Alexandria in the age of the emperor Verus. There remains of his compositions a treatise entitled Enchiridion de metris & poemate, [the best edition of which is that of Gaisford, Oxon. 1810.]

HEPHÆSTĪON, a Macedonian famous for his intimacy with Alexander. He accompanied the conqueror in his Asiatic conquests, and was so faithful and attached to him, that Alexander often observed that Craterus was the friend of the king, but Hephæstion the friend of Alexander. He died at Ecbatana 325 years before the Christian era, according to some, from excess of drinking or eating. Alexander was so inconsolable at the death of this faithful subject, that he shed tears at the intelligence, and ordered the sacred fire to be extinguished, which was never done but at the death of a Persian monarch. The physician who attended Hephæstion in his illness was accused of negligence, and by the king's order inhumanly put to death, and the games were interrupted. His body was intrusted to the care of Perdicas, and honoured with the most magnificent funeral at Babylon. He was so like the king in features and statue, that he was often saluted by the name of Alexander. Curt.—Arrian. 7, &c.—Plut. in Alex.—Ælian. V. H. 7, c. 8.

HEPTAPŪLOS, a surname of Thebes in Bœotia, from its seven gates.

HERA, [Hēz] the name of Juno among the Greeks. [The name is commonly derived from anz air, by metathesis hez, making Juno the same as the air. Damm, however, makes it come from the same root as the Greek hēros, hero, namely from azē, votum, res admiranda.]

HERACLĒA, [a name given to more than 40 towns in Europe, Asia, Africa, and the islands of the Mediterranean. They are supposed to have derived this appellation from the Greek name of Hercules Ἡρακλῆς, and to have been either built in honour of him or placed under his protection. The most famous of these places were, —An ancient town of Sicily, near Agrigentum. Minos planted a colony there when he pursued Dædalus : and the town anciently known by the name of Macara, was called from him Minoæ. It was called Heraclea after Hercules, when he obtained a victory over Eryx. —Another, called for distinctions sake Heraclea Pontica. It was situate on the coast of Bithynia, south-east of the Chersonesus Acherusia. It is now Erekli. It was celebrated for its naval power, and its consequence among the Asiatic states. —Another in Phthiotis, near Thermopylæ, called also Trachinæ, to distinguish it from others. —Another in Lucania, on the Sinus Tarentinus. —Another in Ionia, vid. Latmos. —Another in Crete, on the northern coast. Pliny says it was opposite to the island of Dia ; and it is thought to have stood on the spot where the town of Candia was built in after ages.] Cic. Arch. 4.

HERACLĒIA, a festival at Athens, celebrated every fifth year, in honour of Hercules. The Thisbians and Thebans in Bœotia observed a festival of the same name, in which they offered apples to the god. This custom of offering apples arose from this : it was always usual to offer sheep, but the overflowing of the river Asopus prevented the votaries of the god from observing it with the ancient ceremony ; and as the word μῆλον signifies both an apple and a sheep, some youths acquainted with the ambiguity of the word, offered apples to the god with much sport and festivity. To represent the sheep, they raised an apple upon four sticks as the legs, and two more were placed at the top to represent the horns of the victim. Hercules was delighted with the ingenuity of the youths, and the festivals were ever continued with the offering of apples. Pollux. 8, c. 9. There was also a festival at Sicyon in honour of Hercules. It continued two days, the first was called σοματας, the second ηρακλῆα. —At a festival of the same name at Cos, the priest officiated with a mitre on his head, and in woman's apparel. —At Lindus, a solemnity of the same name was also observed, and at the celebration nothing was heard but execrations and profane words, and whosoever accidentally dropped any other words, was accused of having profaned the sacred rites.

HERACLĒUM, a town of Egypt near Canopus, on the western mouth of the Nile, to which it gave its name. —[A town of the Tauric Chersonese on the western side of the Palus Mæotis, now the fort of Ribat according to M. de Peyssonnel.] Diod. 1.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 60.—Strab. 2 and 17.

HERACLEŌTES, a surname of Dionysius the philosopher. —A philosopher of Heraclea, who, like his master Zenon, and all the stoics, firmly believed that pain was not an evil. A severe illness, attended with the most acute pains, obliged him to renounce his principles, and at the same time the philosophy of the stoics, about 264 years before the Christian era. He became afterwards one of the Cyrenaic sect, which placed the summum bonum in pleasure. He wrote some poetry, and chiefly treatises of philosophy. Diod. in vit.

HERACLĪDÆ, the descendants of Hercules, greatly celebrated in ancient history. Hercules at his death left to his son Hyllus all the rights and claims which he had upon the Peloponnesus, and permitted him to marry Iole, as soon as he came of age. The posterity of Hercules were not more kindly treated by Eurystheus than their father had been, and they were obliged to retire for protection to the court of Ceyx, king of Trachinia. Eurystheus pursued them thither; and Ceyx, afraid of his resentment, begged the Heraclidæ to depart from his dominions. From Trachinia they came to Athens, where Theseus, the king of the country, who had accompanied their father in some of his expeditions, received them with great humanity, and assisted them against their common enemy, Eurystheus. Eurystheus was killed by the hand of Hyllus himself, and his children perished with him, and all the cities of the Peloponnesus became the undisputed property of the Heraclidæ. Their triumph, however, was short, their numbers were lessened by a pestilence, and the oracle informed them that they had taken possession of the Peloponnesus before the gods permitted their return. Upon this they abandoned Peloponnesus, and came to settle in the territories of the Athenians, where Hyllus, obedient to his father's commands, married Iole, the daughter of Eurystus. Soon after he consulted the oracle, anxious to recover the Peloponnesus, and the ambiguity of the answer determined him to make a second attempt. He challenged to single combat Atreus, the successor to Eurystheus on the throne of Mycenæ, and it was mutually agreed that the undisturbed possession of the Peloponnesus should be ceded to whosoever defeated his adversary. Echemus accepted the challenge for Atreus, and Hyllus was killed, and the Heraclidæ a second time departed from Peloponnesus. Cleodæus, the son of Hyllus, made a third attempt, and was equally unsuccessful; and his son Aristomachus some time after met with the same unfavourable reception, and perished in the field of battle. Aristodemus, Temenus, and Chresphonates, the three sons of Aristomachus, encouraged by the more expressive and less ambiguous word of an oracle, and desirous to revenge the death of their progenitors, assembled a numerous force, and with a fleet invaded all Peloponnesus. Their expedition was attended with success, and after some decisive battles, they became masters of all the peninsula which they divided among themselves two years after. The recovery of the Peloponnesus by the descendants of Hercules forms an interesting epoch in ancient history, which is universally believed to have happened 80 years after the Trojan war, or 1104 years before the Christian era. This conquest was totally achieved about 120 years after the first attempt of Hyllus. Apollod. 2, c. 7, &c.—Herodot. 9, c. 26.—Paus. 1, c. 17.—Patere. 1, c. 2.—*Clemens. Alex. HERACLIDES, [a physician and philosopher, born at Heraclea Pontica, and educated partly under Aristotle and partly under Speusippus a disciple of Plato. He wrote a treatise on the "Causes of Diseases," and another on the "Disease in which the respiration is suspended," (περί τῆς ἀπνοῦς), a disease which Empedocles boasted of having cured when of 30 days' duration.]—A Sicilian put to death by Dion. He lived about 335 years before the Christian era. [vid. Dion.] Cic. Tusc. 5, ad Quint. 3.—Diog. in Pyth.

HERACLITUS, [a native of Ephesus who flourished about the 69th Olympiad. This philosopher was the founder of a sect derived from Pythagoras, the parent of the Italic school. He was naturally of a melancholy and splenetic temper, and despising the ignorance and follies of mankind, shunned public intercourse with the world, and devoted himself to retirement and meditation. His place of residence was a mountainous retreat, and his food the natural produce of the earth. When Darius, having heard of his fame, invited him to his court, he treated the invitation with contempt. His diet and mode of life at length occasioned a dropsy for which he could obtain no relief from medical advice. It seems that the philosopher who was always fond of enigmatical language, proposed the following questions to the physicians, "is it possible to bring dryness out of moisture?" and upon their answering in the negative, in place of stating his case more plainly to them, he turned away his own physician and attempted to cure himself by shutting himself up in a close stable with oxen. The event is doubtful, and the manner of his death, which happened at the age of 60 years, is not ascertained. Of Heraclitus it has been said that he was perpetually shedding tears on account of the vices of mankind, but the story is perhaps as little founded as that of the perpetual laughing of Democritus. It is usual, however, to call the former the crying, the latter the laughing philosopher.] He employed his time in writing different treatises, and one particularly, in which he supported that there was a fatal necessity, and that the world was created from fire, which he deemed a god omnipotent and omniscient. His opinions about the origin of things were adopted by the stoics, who entertained the same notions of a supreme power.—A writer of Halicarnassus, intimate with Callimachus. He was remarkable for the elegance of his style.

HERÆA, a town of Arcadia.—Festivals at Argos in honour of Juno, who was the patroness of that city. They were also observed by the colonies of the Argives which had been planted at Samos and Ægina. There were always two processions to the temple of the goddess without the city walls. The first was of the men in armour, the second of the women, among whom the priestess, a woman of the first quality, was drawn by white oxen. The Argives always reckoned their years from her priesthood, as the Athenians from their archons, or the Romans from their consuls. When they came to the temple of the goddess, they offered a hecatomb of oxen. Hence the sacrifice is often called ἑκατομβία, and sometimes λεχίβια, from λεχος a bed, because Juno presided over marriages, births, &c. There was a festival of the same name in Elis, celebrated every fifth year, in which sixteen matrons wove a garment for the goddess.—There were also others instituted by Hippodamia, who had received assistance from Juno when she married Pelops. Sixteen matrons, each attended by a maid, presided at the celebration. The contenders were young virgins, who being divided in classes according to their age, ran races each in order, beginning with the youngest. The habit of all was exactly the same, their hair was dishevelled, and their right shoulder bare to the breast, with coats reaching no lower than the knee. She who obtained the victory was rewarded with crowns of olives, and obtained a part of the ox that was offered in sacrifice, and was permitted to dedicate her picture to the goddess.—There was also a solemn day of mourning at Corinth, which bore the same name, in commemoration of Medea's children, who were buried in Juno's temple. They had been slain by the Corinthians, who, as it is reported, to avert the scandal which accompanied so barbarous a murder, presented Euripides with a large sum of money to write a play, in which Medea is represented as the murderer of her children.—Another festival of the same name at Pallene, with games in which the victor was rewarded with a garment.

HERÆUM, a temple and grove of Juno, situate about [10 stadia from Argos, and 10 from Mycenæ. It was embellished with a lofty statue of Juno, made of ivory and gold, a golden peacock, enriched with precious stones, and other equally splendid ornaments.] —[Another in the island of Samos, constructed by Rhæcus, the son of Philaus, who, with Theodorus of Samos, invented the art of making moulds of clay.]

HERCULANÆUM, [a city of Campania, near the present site of a small place called Portici, destroyed by an eruption of Vesuvius, in the first year of the reign of Titus, A. D. 79. Pompeii, which stood near, shared the same fate. After being buried under the lava for more than 1600 years, those cities were accidentally discovered: Herculaneum, in 1713, by labourers digging for a well, and Pompeii, 40 years after. It appears that Herculaneum is in no part less than 70 feet, and in some parts, 112 feet below the surface of the ground, while Pompeii is buried 10 or 12 feet deep, more or less. Sir W. Hamilton thinks that the matter which covers the city of Herculaneum is not the produce of a single eruption, but that the matter of six eruptions has taken its course over that with which the town is covered, and which was the cause of its destruction. Many valuable remains of antiquity, such as busts, manuscripts, &c. have been recovered from the ruins of this ancient city, and form the most curious museum in the world. These are all preserved at Portici, and the engravings taken from them have been munificently presented to the different learned bodies of Europe. The plan, also, of many of the public buildings has been laid open, and especially that of the theatre. Sir W. Hamilton thinks that the matter which first issued from Vesuvius and covered Herculaneum was in the state of liquid mud, and that this has been the means of preserving the pictures, busts, and other relics, which otherwise must have been either entirely destroyed by the red hot liquid lava, or else have become one solid body along with it when it cooled.] *Seneca. HERCULES, a celebrated hero, who, after death, was ranked among the gods, and received divine honours. [vid. remarks at the end of this article.] According to the ancients there were many persons of the same name. Diodorus mentions three, Cicero six, and some authors extend the number to no less than forty-three. Of all these the son of Jupiter and Alcmena, generally called the Theban, is the most celebrated, and to him, as may easily be imagined, the actions of the others have been attributed. The birth of Hercules was attended with many miraculous and supernatural events: and it is reported that Jupiter, who introduced himself to the bed of Alcmena, was employed for three nights in forming a child whom he intended to be the greatest hero the world ever beheld. [vid. Alcmena.] Hercules was brought up at Tirynthus; or, according to Diodorus, at Thebes, and before he had completed his eighth month, the jealousy of Juno, intent upon his destruction, sent two snakes to devour him. The child, not terrified at the sight of the serpents, boldly seized them in both his hands, and squeezed them to death, while his brother Iphiclus alarmed the house with his frightful shrieks. vid. Iphiclus. He was early instructed in the liberal arts, and Castor, the son of Tyndarus, taught him how to fight, Eurytus how to shoot with a bow and arrows, Autolicus to drive a chariot, Linus to play on the lyre, and Eumolpus to sing. He, like the rest of his illustrious contemporaries, soon after became the pupil of the centaur Chiron, and under him he perfected and rendered himself the most valiant and accomplished of the age. In the 18th year of his age, he resolved to deliver the neighbourhood of Mount Cithæron from a huge lion which preyed on the flocks of Amphitryon, his supposed father, and which laid waste the adjacent country. He went to the court of Thespius, king of Thespiis, who shared in the general calamity, and he received there a tender treatment, and was entertained during fifty days. The fifty daughters of the king became all mothers by Hercules during his stay at Thespiis, and some say that it was effected in one night. After he had destroyed the lion of Mount Cithæron, he delivered his country from the annual tribute of an hundred oxen which it paid to Erginus. vid.

Erginus. Such public services became universally known, and Creon, who then sat on the throne of Thebes, rewarded the patriotic deeds of Hercules by giving him his daughter in marriage, and intrusting him with the government of his kingdom. As Hercules by the will of Jupiter was subjected to the power of Eurystheus, vid. Eurystheus, and obliged to obey him in every respect, Eurystheus, acquainted with his successes and rising power, ordered him to appear at Mycenæ and perform the labours which by priority of birth he was empowered to impose upon him. Hercules refused, and Juno, to punish his disobedience, rendered him so delirious that he killed his own children by Megara, supposing them to be the offspring of Eurystheus. vid. Megara. When he recovered the use of his senses, he was so struck with the misfortunes which had proceeded from his insanity, that he concealed himself and retired from the society of men for some time. He afterwards consulted the oracle of Apollo, and was told that he must be subservient for twelve years to the will of Eurystheus, in compliance with the commands of Jupiter; and that after he had achieved the most celebrated labours, he should be reckoned in the number of the gods. So plain and expressive an answer determined him to go to Mycenæ, and to bear with fortitude whatever gods or men imposed upon him. Eurystheus, seeing so great a man totally subjected to him, and apprehensive of so powerful an enemy, commanded him to achieve a number of enterprises the most difficult and arduous ever known, generally called the 12 labours of Hercules. The favours of the gods had completely armed him when he undertook his labours. He had received a coat of arms and helmet from Minerva, a sword from Mercury, a horse from Neptune, a shield from Jupiter, a bow and arrows from Apollo, and from Vulcan a golden cuirass and brazen buskin, with a celebrated club of brass according to the opinion of some writers, but more generally supposed to be of wood, and cut by the hero himself in the forest of Nemæa.—The first labour imposed upon Hercules by Eurystheus, was to kill the lion of Nemæa, which ravaged the country near Mycenæ. The hero, unable to destroy him with his arrows, boldly attacked him with his club, pursued him to his den, and after a close and sharp engagement he choked him to death. He carried the dead beast on his shoulders to Mycenæ, and ever after clothed himself with the skin. Eurystheus was so astonished at the sight of the beast, and at the courage of Hercules, that he ordered him never to enter the gates of the city when he returned from his expeditions, but to wait for his orders without the walls. He even made himself a brazen vessel into which he retired whenever Hercules returned.—The second labour of Hercules was to destroy the Lernæan hydra, which had seven heads according to Apollodorus, 50 according to Simonides, and 100 according to Diodorus. This celebrated monster he attacked with his arrows, and soon after he came to a close engagement, and by means of his heavy club he destroyed the heads of his enemy. But this was productive of no advantage, for as soon as one head was beaten to pieces by the club, immediately two sprang up, and the labour of Hercules would have remained unfinished had he not commanded his friend Iolas to burn with a hot iron, the root of the head which he had crushed to pieces. This succeeded, (vid. Hydra,) and Hercules became victorious, opened the belly of the monster, and dipped his arrows in the gall to render the wounds which he gave fatal and incurable.—He was ordered in his third labour to bring alive and unhurt into the presence of Eurystheus a stag, famous for its incredible swiftness, its golden horns, and brazen feet. This celebrated animal frequented the neighbourhood of Cœnoe, and Hercules was employed for a whole year continually pursuing it, and at last he caught it in a trap, or when tired, according to others, by slightly wounding it and lessening its swiftness. As he returned victorious, Diana snatched the goat from him, and severely reprimanded him for molesting an animal which was sacred to her. Hercules pleaded necessity, and by representing the commands of Eurystheus, he appeased the goddess and obtained the beast.—The fourth labour was to bring alive to Eurystheus a wild boar which ravaged the neighbourhood of Erymanthus. In this expedition he destroyed the centaurs, (vid. Centauri,) and caught the boar by closely pursuing him through the deep snow. Eurystheus was so frightened at the sight of the boar, that, according to Diodorus, he hid himself in his brazen vessel for some days.—In his fifth labour Hercules was ordered to clean the stables of Augias, where 3000 oxen had been confined for many years. (vid. Augias.)—For his sixth labour he was ordered to kill the carnivorous birds which ravaged the country near the lake Stymphalus in Arcadia. (vid. Stymphalus.)—In his seventh labour he brought alive into Peloponnesus a prodigious wild bull which laid waste the island of Crete.—In his eighth labour he was employed in obtaining the mares of Diomedes, which fed upon human flesh. He killed Diomedes, and gave him to be eaten by his mares, which he brought to Eurystheus. They were sent to Mount Olympus by the king of Mycenæ, where they were devoured by the wild beasts; or, according to others, they were consecrated to Jupiter, and their breed still existed in the age of Alexander the Great.—For his ninth labour he was commanded to obtain the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. (vid. Hippolite.)—In his tenth labour he killed the monster Geryon, king of Erythia, and brought to Argos his numerous flocks which fed upon human flesh. (vid. Geryon.)—The eleventh labour was to obtain apples from the garden of the Hesperides. (vid. Hesperides.)—The twelfth and last, and most dangerous of his labours, was to bring upon earth the three-headed dog Cerberus. This was cheerfully undertaken by Hercules, and he descended into hell by a cave on Mount Tænarus. He was permitted by

Pluto to carry away his friends Theseus and Pirithous, who were condemned to punishment in hell; and Cerberus also was granted to his prayers, provided he made use of no arms but only force to drag him away. Hercules, as some report, carried him back to hell after he had brought him before Eurystheus.—Besides these arduous labours, which the jealousy of Eurystheus imposed upon him, he also achieved others of his own accord, equally great and celebrated. (vid. Cacus, Antæus, Busiris, Eryx, &c.) He accompanied the Argonauts to Colchis before he delivered himself up to the king of Mycenæ. He assisted the gods in their wars against the giants, and it was through him alone that Jupiter obtained a victory. (vid. Gigantes.) He conquered Laomedon, and pillaged Troy. (vid. Laomedon.) When Iole, the daughter of Eurytus, king of Œthalia, of whom he was deeply enamoured, was refused to his entreaties, he became the prey of a second fit of insanity, and he murdered Iphitus, the only one of the sons of Eurytus who favoured his addresses to Iole. [vid. Iphitus.] He was some time after purified of the murder, and his insanity ceased; but the gods persecuted him more, and he was visited by a disorder which obliged him to apply to the oracle of Delphi for relief. The coldness with which the Pythia received him, irritated him, and he resolved to plunder Apollo's temple, and carry away the sacred tripod. Apollo opposed him, and a severe conflict was begun, which nothing but the interference of Jupiter with his thunderbolts could have prevented. He was upon this told by the oracle that he must be sold as a slave, and remain three years in the most abject servitude to recover from his disorder. He complied; and Mercury, by order of Jupiter, conducted him to Omphale, queen of Lydia, to whom he was sold as a slave. Here he cleared all the country from robbers; and Omphale, who was astonished at the greatness of his exploits, restored him to liberty, and married him. Hercules had Agelaus and Lamon according to others, by Omphale, from whom Cræsus king of Lydia was descended. He became also enamoured of one of Omphale's female servants, by whom he had Alceus. After he had completed the years of his slavery, he retired to Peloponnesus, where he re-established on the throne of Sparta, Tyndarus, who had been expelled by Hippocoon. He became one of Dejanira's suitors, and married her after he had overcome all his rivals. [vid. Achelous.] He was obliged to leave Calydon, his father-in-law's kingdom, because he had inadvertently killed a man with a blow of his fist, and it was on account of this expulsion that he was not present at the hunting of the Calydonian boar. From Calydon he retired to the court of Ceyx, king of Trachinia. In his way he was stopped by the swollen streams of the Evenus, where the centaur Nessus attempted to offer violence to Dejanira, under the perfidious pretence of conveying her over the river. Hercules perceived the distress of Dejanira, and killed the centaur, who as he expired gave her a tunic, which, as he observed, had the power of recalling a husband from unlawful love. [vid. Dejanira.] Ceyx, king of Trachinia, received him and his wife with great marks of friendship, and purified him of the murder which he had committed at Calydon. Hercules was still mindful that he had once been refused the hand of Iole, he therefore made war against her father Eurytus, and killed him with three of his sons. Iole fell into the hands of her father's murderer, and found that she was loved by Hercules as much as before. She accompanied him to Mount Œta, where he was going to raise an altar and offer a solemn sacrifice to Jupiter. As he had not then the tunic in which he arrayed himself to offer a sacrifice, he sent Lichias to Dejanira in order to provide himself a proper dress. Dejanira, informed of her husband's tender attachment to Iole, sent him a philter, or more probably the tunic, which she had received from Nessus, and Hercules, as soon as he had put it on, fell into a desperate distemper, and found the poison of the Lernean hydra penetrate through his bones. He attempted to pull off the fatal dress, but it was too late, and in the midst of his pains and tortures he inveighed in the most bitter imprecations against the credulous Dejanira, the cruelty of Eurystheus, and the jealousy and hatred of Juno. As the distemper was incurable, he implored the protection of Jupiter, and gave his bow and arrows to Philoctetes, and erected a large burning pile on the top of Mount Œta. He spread on the pile the skin of the Nemæan lion, and laid himself down upon it as on a bed, leaning his head on his club. Philoctetes, or according to others, Pan or Hyllus, was ordered to set fire to the pile, and the hero saw himself on a sudden surrounded with the flames without betraying any marks of fear or astonishment. Jupiter saw him from heaven, and told to the surrounding gods that he would raise to the skies the immortal parts of a hero who had cleared the earth from so many monsters and tyrants. The gods applauded Jupiter's resolution, the burning pile was suddenly surrounded with a dark smoke, and after the mortal parts of Hercules were consumed, he was carried up to heaven in a chariot drawn by four horses. Some loud claps of thunder accompanied his elevation, and his friends, unable to find either his bones or ashes, showed their gratitude to his memory by raising an altar where the burning pile had stood. Menæctius the son of Actor, offered him a sacrifice of a bull, a wild boar, and a goat, and enjoined the people of Opus yearly to observe the same religious ceremonies. His worship soon became as universal as his fame, and Juno, who had once persecuted him with such inveterate fury, forgot her resentment, and gave him her daughter Hebe in marriage. Hercules has received many surnames and epithets, either from the place where his worship was established, or from the labours which he achieved. His temples were numerous and magnificent, and his divinity revered. No dogs or flies ever entered his temple at Rome, and that of Gades, according to Strabo, was always forbidden to women and pigs. The Phœnicians offered quails on his altars, and as it was supposed that he presided over dreams, the sick and infirm were sent to sleep in his temples, that they might receive in their dreams the agreeable presages of their approaching recovery. The white poplar was particularly dedicated to his service. Hercules is generally represented naked, with strong and well proportioned limbs; he is sometimes covered with the skin of the Nemean lion, and holds a knotted club in his hand, on which he often leans. Sometimes he appears crowned with the leaves of the poplar, and holding the horn of plenty under his arm. At other times he is represented standing with Cupid, who insolently breaks to pieces his arrows and his club, to intamate the passion of love in the hero, who suffered himself to be beaten and ridiculed by Omphale, who dressed herself in his armour while he was sitting to spin with her female servants. The children of Hercules are as numerous as the labours and difficulties which he underwent, and indeed they became so powerful soon after his death, that they alone had the courage to invade all Peloponnesus. (vid. Heraclidæ.) He was father of Deicoon and Therimachus, by Megara; of Ctesippus, by Atydamia; of Palemon, by Autonoe; of Eveser, by Parthenope; of Glycisonetes, Gyncus, and Odites, by Dejanira; of Thessalus, by Chalciopé; of Thestalus, by Epicaste; of Tlepolemus, by Astyoche; of Agathyrus, Gelon, and Scythia, by Echidna, &c. Such are the most striking characteristics of the life of Hercules, who is said to have supported for a while the weight of the heavens upon his shoulders, (vid. Atlas) and to have separated by the force of his arm the celebrated mountains which were afterwards called the boundaries of his labours. (vid. Abyla.) He is held out by the ancients as a true pattern of virtue and piety, and as his whole life had been employed for the common benefit of mankind, he was deservedly rewarded with immortality. His judicious choice of virtue in preference to pleasure, as described by Xenophon, is well known. [Hercules, according to the learned though singular theory of Dupuis, is no other than the Sun, and his twelve labours are only a figurative representation of the annual course of that luminary through the signs of the zodiac. He is the powerful planet which animates and imparts fecundity to the universe, whose divinity has been honoured in every quarter by temples and altars, and consecrated in the religious strains of all nations. From Meroe in Ethiopia, and Thebes in Upper Egypt, even to Britain and the icy regions of Scythia; from the ancient Taprobana and Palibothra in India, to Cadiz and the shores of the Atlantic; from the forests of Germany to the burning sands of Africa; every where, in short, where the benefits of the luminary of day are experienced, there we find established the name and worship of a Hercules. Many ages before the period when Alcmena is said to have lived, and the pretended Tiryinthian hero to have performed his wonderful exploits, Egypt and Phœnicia, which certainly did not borrow their divinities from Greece, had raised temples to the Sun, under the name of Hercules, and had carried his worship to the isle of Thasos and to Cadiz. Here was consecrated a temple to the year, and to the months which divided it into twelve parts, that is, to the twelve labours or victories which conducted Hercules to immortality. It is under the name of Hercules Astrochyton (Ἀστροχίτων), or, the god clothed with a mantle of stars, that the poet Nonnus designates the Sun, adored by the Tyrians. "He is the same god," observes the poet, "whom different nations adore under a multitude of different names: Belus on the banks of the Euphrates, Ammon in Libya, Apis at Memphis, Saturn in Arabia, Jupiter in Assyria, Serapis in Egypt, Helios among the Babylonians, Apollo at Delphi, Esculapius throughout Greece," &c. Martianus Capella, in his hymn to the sun, as also Avonius and Macrobius, confirm the fact of this multiplicity of names given to a single star. The Egyptians, according to Plutarch, thought that Hercules had his seat in the sun, and that he travelled with it around the moon. The author of the hymns ascribed to Orpheus, fixes still more strongly the identity of Hercules with the sun. He calls Hercules, "the god who produced time, whose forms vary, the father of all things, and destroyer of all. He is the god who brings back by turns Aurora and the Night, and who moving onwards from east to west, runs through the career of his twelve labours, the valiant Titan, who chases away maladies and delivers man from the evils which afflict him." The Phœnicians, it is said, preserved a tradition among them that Hercules was the Sun, and that his twelve labours indicated the sun's passage through the twelve signs. Porphyry, who was born in Phœnicia, assures us that they there gave the name of Hercules to the Sun, and that the fable of the twelve labours represents the sun's annual path in the heavens. In like manner the scholiast on Hesiod remarks, "the zodiac, in which the Sun performs his annual course, is the true career which Hercules traverses in the fable of the twelve labours; and his marriage with Hebe, the goddess of youth, whom he espoused after he had ended his labours, denotes the renewal of the year at the end of each solar revolution." Among the different epochs at which the year in ancient times commenced among different nations, that of the summer solstice was one of the most remarkable. It was at this period that the Greeks fixed the celebration of their Olympic games, the establishment of which is attributed to Hercules. It was the origin of the most ancient era of the Greeks. If we fix from this point the departure of the Sun on his annual career, and compare the progress of that luminary through the signs of the zodiac with the twelve labours of Hercules in the order in which they are sometimes handed down to us, a very striking coincidence is instantly observed. A few examples will be adduced. In the first month the Sun passes into the sign Leo; and in his first labour Hercules slew the Nemean lion. In the second month the Sun enters the sign Virgo, when the constellation of the Hydra sets; and in his second labour Hercules destroyed the Lernean hydra. In the third month the Sun enters the sign Libra, at the beginning of Autumn, when the constellation of the centaur rises, represented as bearing a wine-skin full of liquor, and a thyrsus adorned with vine leaves and grapes. At this same period what is termed by some a trionfiers the constellation of the boar rises in the evening; and in his third labour Hercules, after being hospitably entertained by a centaur, encountered and slew the other centaurs who fought for a cask of wine: he slew also in this labour the Erymanthian boar. In the fourth month the Sun enters the sign of Scorpio, when Cassiopeia rises, a constellation in which anciently a stag was represented; and in his fourth labour Hercules caught the famous stag with golden horns and brazen feet. In the fifth month the Sun enters the sign Sagittarius, consecrated to Diana, who had a temple at Stymphalus, in which were seen the birds called Stymphalides. At this same time rise the three birds, namely, the constellations of the vulture, swan, and eagle pierced with the arrows of Hercules; and in his fifth labour Hercules destroyed the harpies near lake Stymphalus, which are represented as three in number on the medals of Perinthus. In the sixth month the Sun passes into the sign Capricornus, who was, according to some, a grandson of the luminary. At this period the stream which flows from Aquarius sets; its source is between the hands of Aristæus, son of the river Peneus. In his sixth labour Hercules cleansed, by means of the Peneus, the stables of Augeas, son of Phœbus. A similar explanation may be given of the other labours of this demigod; but enough, it is conceived, has been advanced to show that the theory upon which these remarks have been based, although very questionable in some of its astronomical details is notwithstanding extremely plausible.] Diod. 1 and 4.—*Cic. de Nat. HERCULEUM FRETUM, a name given to the strait which forms a communication between the Atlantic and Mediterranean.

HERCŪLIS CŪLŪMŪNÆ, two lofty mountains, situate one on the most southern extremity of Spain, and the other on the opposite part of Africa. They were called by the ancients Abila and Calpa. They are reckoned the boundaries of the labours of Hercules, and according to ancient tradition, they were joined together till they were severed by the arm of the hero, and a communication opened between the Mediterranean and Atlantic Seas. HERCYNIA, [a very extensive forest of Germany, the breadth of which, according to Cæsar, was nine days' journey, while its length exceeded sixty. It extended from the territories of the Helvetii, Nemetes, and Rauraci, along the Danube to the country of the Daci and Anartes; then turning to the north it spread over many large tracts of land, and is said to have contained many animals unknown in other countries, of which Cæsar describes two or three kinds. Since the other forests of Germany were only branches of the Hercynian, some writers have considered it as covering nearly the whole of that extensive territory. On the country becoming more inhabited, the grounds were gradually cleared, and but few vestiges of the ancient forest remain in modern times. These now go by particular names, as the Black Forest which separates Alsace from Swabia; the Steyger in Franconia; the Spissard on the Main; the Thuringer in Thuringia; Hesswald in the dutchy of Cleves; the Bohemerwald which encompasses Bohemia, and was in the middle ages called Hercynia Silva; and the Hartz forest in Lunenburg. Some of the German writers at the present day derive the ancient name from the term hart, high; others suppose it to come from hartz resin, and consider the old name as remaining in the present Hartz forest. Pliny and Tacitus call the tract over which the ancient forest extended, Hercynius Saltus. In the writings of Eratosthenes, Ptolemy, and others of the Greek geographers, it is called the Orcynian forest.] Cæs. Bell. G. 6, c. 24.—Mela.—Liv. 5, c. 54.—Tacit. G. 30.

HERENNIVS SENECIO CAIVS, a man to whom Cicero dedicates his book de Rhetoricâ, a work attributed by some to Cornificius. —Philo, a Phœnician who wrote a book on Adrian's reign. He also composed a treatise divided into 12 parts, concerning the choice of books, &c.

HERMÆ, [statues of Mercury, which the Athenians had at the doors of their houses. They were made like terminal figures of stones, of a cubical form, and surmounted with a head of Mercury. From the Athenians Pausanias says that the form was borrowed by the rest of the Greeks. Paus. 4, 33.]—Cic. ad Att. 1, ep. 4 and 3.—C. Nep. in Alcib.

HERMÆA, a festival in Crete, where the masters waited upon the servants. It was also observed at Athens and Babylon. Paus. 3, c. 14.

HERMÆUM, a town of Arcadia.—A promontory at the east of Carthage, the most northern point of all Africa, now cape Bon. Liv. 29, c. 27.—Strab. 17.

[HERMIONES, one of the three great divisions of the Germanic tribes. They lay adjacent to the Danube.]

HERMAPHRODITUS, a son of Venus and Mercury, educated on Mount Ida by the Naiades. At the age of 15 he began to travel to gratify his curiosity. When he came to Caria, he bathed himself in a fountain, and Salmacis, the nymph who presided over it, became enamoured of him and attempted to seduce him. Hermaphroditus continued deaf to all entreaties and offers; and Salmacis, endeavouring to obtain by force what was denied to prayers, closely embraced him, and entreated the gods to make them two but one body. Her prayers were heard, and Salmacis and Hermaphroditus, now two in one body, still preserved the characteristics of both their sexes. Hermaphroditus begged the gods that all who bathed in that fountain might become effeminate. [The Abbé Banier explains this fable as follows, on the authority of Vitruvius. There was, it seems, a fountain in Caria, near Halicarnassus, the waters of which became the means of civilizing some of the adjacent barbarians. For, the latter having been expelled by the colony which the Argives had planted in that city, were obliged to come to this fountain to draw water; and this intercourse with the Greeks not only refined their manners, but by degrees infected them with the luxury of that voluptuous nation; and this, he observes, is what gave that fountain the character of having virtue to change the sex.] Ovid. Met. 4, v. 347.—Hygin. fab. 271.

HERMATHENA, [from Ἑρμης and Ἀθηνᾶ], a statue which represented Mercury and Minerva in the same body. This statue was generally placed in schools where eloquence and philosophy were taught, because these two deities presided over the arts and sciences. [M. Spon gives various figures of Hermathena in his "Recherches Curieuses de l'Antiquité," p. 98. They are a sort of statue raised on square pedestals after the manner of Hermæ, only that the attributes of Minerva are added to them.]

HERMESIANAX, an elegiac poet of Colophon, son of Agoneus. He was publicly honoured with a statue. Paus. 6, c. 17.

HERMIAS, [a writer towards the close of the second century, and native of Galatia, who has left us a short but elegant discourse, entitled "Irrisio philosophorum gentium."] The work shows that in the time of the writer Gentilism prevailed, and that it must have been written before the fall of paganism.] It was printed with Justin Martyr's works, fol. Paris, 1615 and 1636, and with the Oxford edition of Tatian, 8vo. 1700.

HERMIÖNE, a daughter of Mars and Venus, who married Cadmus. The gods, except Juno, honoured her nuptials with their presence, and she received, as a present, a rich veil and a splendid necklace which had been made by Vulcan. She was changed into a serpent with her husband Cadmus, and placed in the Elysian fields. [vid. Harmonia.] Apollod. 3.—Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 13.—A daughter of Menelaus and Helen. She was privately promised in marriage to Orestes the son of Agamemnon; but her father, ignorant of this pre-engagement, gave her hand to Pyrrhus the son of Achilles, whose services he had experienced in the Trojan war. Pyrrhus, at his return from Troy, carried home Hermione and married her. Hermione, tenderly attached to her cousin Orestes, looked upon Pyrrhus with horror and indignation. According to others, however, Hermione received the addresses of Pyrrhus with pleasure, and even reproached Andromache, his concubine, with stealing his affections from her. Her jealousy of Andromache, according to some, induced her to unite herself to Orestes, and to destroy Pyrrhus. She gave herself to Orestes after this murder, and received the kingdom of Sparta as a dowry. Homer. Od. 4.—Eurip. in Andr. & Orest.—Ovid. Heroid. 8.—Propert. 1.—A town of Argolis, now Castri. [It was particularly sacred to Ceres and Proserpine, and the temples of these deities served as an asylum. It was situate in the southern extremity of Argolis, off the Sinus Hermonicus.] The inhabitants lived by fishing. The descent to hell from their country was considered so short that no money, according to the usual rite of burial, was put into the mouth of the dead to be paid to Charon for their passage. Plin. 4, c. 5.—Virg. in Ciri. 472.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ptol. 8, c. 16.—Paus. 2, c. 34.

HERMIFFUS, a freed man, disciple of Philo, in the reign of Adrian, by whom he was greatly esteemed. He wrote five books upon dreams.—A man who accused Aspasia, the mistress of Pericles, of impiety and prostitution. He was son of Lysis, and distinguished himself as a poet by 40 theatrical pieces and other compositions, some of which are quoted by Athenæus. Plut.—A peripatetic philosopher of Smyrna who flourished B. C. 210.

HERMOCRATES, a general of Syracuse against Nicias the Athenian. His lenity towards the Athenian prisoners was looked upon as treacherous. He was banished from Sicily without even a trial, and he was murdered as he attempted to return back to his country, B. C. 408. Plut. in Nic. &c.

HERMODORUS, a philosopher of Ephesus, who is said to have assisted as interpreter the Roman decemvirs in the composition of the 10 tables of laws which had been collected in Greece. Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 36.—Plin. 34, c. 5.

HERMOGÉNÉS, an architect of Alabanda, in Caria, employed in building the temple of Diana at Magnesia. He wrote a book upon his profession.—A rhetorician in the second century, the best editions of whose rhetorica are that of Sturmius, 3 vols. 12mo. Argent. 1571, and Laurentius, Genev. 1614. He died A. D. 161, and it is said that his body was opened, and his heart found hairy and of an extraordinary size. At the age of 25, as is reported, he totally lost his memory.—A sophist of Tarsus, of such brilliant talents, that at the age of 15 he excited the attention and gained the patronage of the emperor M. Antoninus.

HERMOLAUS, a young Macedonian among the attendants of Alexander. As he was one day hunting with the king he killed a wild boar which was coming towards him. Alexander, who followed close behind him, was so disappointed because the beast had been killed before he could dart at him, that he ordered Hermolaus to be severely whipped. This treatment irritated Hermolaus, and he conspired to take away the king's life with others who were displeased with the cruel treatment he had received. The plot was discovered by one of the conspirators, and Alexander seized them, and asked what had impelled them to conspire to take his life. Hermolaus answered for the rest, and observed that it was unworthy of Alexander to treat his most faithful and attached friends like slaves, and to shed their blood without the least mercy. Alexander ordered him to be put to death. Curt. 8, c. 6.

HERMOPŒLIS, [or the city of Hermes, the name of two towns of Egypt. The first was in the Delta, east of the Canopic branch of the Nile, and north-east of Andropoli. For distinction sake the epithet parva was added to its name. Its position corresponds with that of the modern Demenhur.—The second was termed Magna or the great, and was situate in the Heptanomis, on the western bank of the Nile, opposite Antinoë. If a tradition of the country is to be credited, this city owed its origin to Ishmun, son of Misraim the ancestor of the Egyptian nation. The name of the place is now Ashmuneim.] Plin. 5, c. 9.

HERMOTIMUS, a famous prophet of Clazomenæ. It is said that his soul separated itself from his body, and wandered in every part of the earth to explain futurity, after which it returned again and animated his frame. His wife, who was acquainted with the frequent absence of his soul, took advantage of it and burnt his body, as if totally dead, and deprived the soul of its natural receptacle. Hermotimus received divine honours in a temple at Clazomenæ, into which it was unlawful for women to enter. Plin. 7, c. 52, &c.—Lucian.

HERMUNDURI, [the first of the Hermionic tribes in Germany. They were a great and powerful nation, and lay to the east and north-east of the Allemanni. Tacitus says, that in process of time they became allies to the Romans who distinguished them above the other Germans by peculiar privileges.] Tacit. Ann. 13, extr.

HERMUS, [a considerable river of Asia Minor, rising in Phrygia, and flowing through the northern part of Lydia until it falls into the sea near Phocæa. It receives in its course the rivers Pactolus and Hyllus or Phrygius. The plains which this river watered were termed the plains of Hermus; and the gulf into which it discharged itself was anciently called the Hermæan gulf; but when Theseus, according to some accounts, a person of distinction in Thessaly, migrated hither and founded a town on this gulf called Smyrna after his wife, the gulf was termed Smyrnæus Sineus, or Gulf of Smyrna; a name which it still retains. The sands of the Hermus were fabled by the poets to have been covered with gold; they were probably auriferous. The modern name of the river is the Sarabat.] *Virg. HERNICI, a people of Campania, celebrated for their inveterate enmity to the rising power of Rome. [About the origin of this people little of a definite nature is known. It is uncertain whether they were descended from the Aborigines who had wandered into Latium, or whether they were a branch of the Samnites and Marsi, or of Pelasgic origin as Hyginus asserts. One thing, however, is certain, that they did not belong to the Latin race, although reckoned commonly as a part of Latium. Macrob. Sat. 5, 18.—Dionys. Hal. 8, p. 537.] Liv. 9, c. 43 and 44.—Sil. 4, v. 226.—Juv. 14, v. 183.—Dionys. Hal. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 684.

HERO, a beautiful priestess of Venus at Sestos, greatly enamoured of Leander, a youth of Abydos. These two lovers were so faithful to one another that Leander in the night escaped from the vigilance of his family, and swam across the Hellespont, while Hero in Sestos, directed his course by holding a burning torch on the top of a high tower. After many interviews of mutual affection and tenderness, Leander was drowned in a tempestuous night as he attempted his usual course, and Hero in despair threw herself down from her tower and perished in the sea. [vid. Leander.] Musæus de Leand. & Hero.—Ovid. Heroid. 17 and 18.—Virg. G. 3, v. 258.

HERŒDES, surnamed the Great and Ascalonita, [second son of Antipater the Idumæan, was born B. C. 71. At the age of 25 he was made by his father governor of Galilee, and distinguished himself by the suppression of a band of robbers, and the execution of their leader with several of his comrades. He was summoned before the Sanhedrim for having done this by his own authority and put these men to death without a trial, but through the strength of his party and zeal of his friends he escaped censure.] In the civil wars he followed the interest of Brutus and Cassius, and afterwards that of Antony. He was made king of Judæa by means of Antony, and after the battle of Actium he was continued in his power by his flattery and submission to Augustus. He rendered himself odious by his cruelty and died in the 70th year of his age, after a reign of 40 years. [It was this Herod to whom the Magi came with the well known enquiry respecting the new-born king of the Jews. Herod was then at Jericho, suffering from a languishing illness, of which he soon after died. His death was attended with circumstances of intense and richly merited suffering. His bowels ulcerated: he had continual pains in his abdomen: his legs swelled like those of dropsical persons, and an intolerable itching spread over his whole body. A little before his death he sent for all who were persons of any distinction in Judæa to come to him at Jericho. They were confined in a circus, and Herod, with tears, constrained his sister Salome and Alexas his brother-in-law to promise him that as soon as he was dead, they should all be massacred, that so the Jews throughout the land might, at least in appearance, shed tears at his death. This order, however, was not executed.]—[Antipas, a son of Herod the Great, whom his father, in his first will, declared his successor in the kingdom, but to whom he afterwards gave merely the office of tetrarch over Galilee and Peræa, while he appointed his other son Archelaus king of Judæa. Antipas, after being confirmed in these territories by Augustus, married the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia. He divorced her, however, A. D. 33, that he might marry his sister-in-law Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, who was still living. John the Baptist exclaiming against this incest was seized, and subsequently beheaded. Afterwards, A. D. 39, Herodias being jealous of the prosperity of her brother Agrippa, who from a private person had become king of Judæa, persuaded her husband Herod-Antipas to visit Rome, and desire the same dignity from Tiberius. Agrippa being apprised of his design, wrote to the emperor, accusing Antipas of being implicated in the affair of Sejanus, upon which he was banished to Lugdunum in Gaul. This is that Antipas who, being at Jerusalem at the time of our Saviour's suffering, ridiculed Jesus whom Pilate had sent to him, dressed him in mock attire, and sent him back to the Roman governor as a king, whose ambition gave him no umbrage. The year of his death is unknown, though it is certain that he and Herodias ended their days in exile, according to Josephus, in Spain.]

—[Agrippa, son of Aristobulus, and grandson of Herod the Great, born three years before the birth of our Saviour, and seven before the vulgar era. He was educated by his grandfather, and sent to Rome in order to ingratiate himself with Tiberius. The emperor conceived a great affection for him, and placed him near Drusus his son. After many vicissitudes of fortune occasioned principally by his own imprudence, he was made tetrarch of Batanæa and Trachonitis by Caligula, and king of Judæa by Claudius, whom he had aided by his advice in securing the imperial throne. He became upon this one of the greatest princes of the east. His death was sudden. Being seized in the theatre with tormenting pains in his bowels, and devoured by worms, he died at the end of five days. vid. Agrippa.]—Atticus. vid. Atticus.

HERODIANUS, a Greek historian [who flourished from the reign of Commodus to that of the third Gordian.] He was born at Alexandria, and he was employed among the officers of the Roman emperors. He wrote a Roman history in eight books, from the death of Marcus Aurelius to Maximinus. His style is peculiarly elegant, but it wants precision, and the work too plainly betrays that the author was not a perfect master of geography. He is accused of being too partial to Maximinus, and too severe upon Alexander Severus. His book comprehends the history of 68 or 70 years, and he asserts that he has been an eyewitness of whatever he has written. The best editions of his history are that of Politian, 4to. Dovan, 1525, who afterwards published a very valuable Latin translation, and that of Oxford, 8vo. 1708. [The most erudite and elaborate edition, however, is that projected by Leisner, and after his death in 1767, completed by Irmisch, Lips. 1789-1805, 5 vols. 8vo.]

HERODOTUS, a celebrated historian of Halicarnassus, whose father's name was Lyxes, and that of his mother Dryo. He fled to Samos when his country laboured under the oppressive tyranny of Lygdamis, and travelled over Egypt, Italy, and all Greece. He afterwards returned to Halicarnassus, and expelled the tyrant; he soon, however, left his native city again, being pursued by the hatred of some factious citizens. To procure a lasting fame, he publicly repeated at the Olympic games, the history which he had composed in his 39th year, B. C. 445. It was received with such universal applause that the names of the nine Muses were unanimously given to the nine books into which it is divided. [It was on this occasion that the young Thucydides, who was one of the spectators, was affected to tears. Herodotus read his history a second time at Athens during the festival of the Panathenæa. After this he departed with an Athenian colony to Magna Græcia. vid. Thurium. Here he revised and made additions to his work. Whether he died at Thurium or not is uncertain.] This celebrated composition, which has procured its author the title of father of history, is written in the Ionic dialect. Herodotus is among the historians what Homer is among the poets and Demosthenes among the orators. His style abounds with elegance, ease, and sweetness; and if there is any of the fabulous or incredible, the author candidly informs the reader that it is introduced upon the narration of others. The work is an history of the wars of the Persians against the Greeks, from the age of Cyrus to the battle of Mycale in the reign of Xerxes, and besides this it gives an account of the most celebrated nations in the world. Herodotus had written another history of Assyria and Arabia, which is not extant. The Life of Homer, generally attributed to him, is supposed by some not to be the production of his pen. Plutarch has accused him of malevolence towards the Greeks; an imputation which can easily be refuted. [The chief inconvenience attending the perusal of his history is his discursive manner, some entire histories being introduced, as it were, by way of parenthesis, in the bodies of others. Notwithstanding all his faults, however, he is a most pleasing writer.] The two best editions of this great historian are that of Wesseling, fol. Amsterdam, 1763; and that of [Schweighæuser, Argent. et Paris, 1816, 6 vols. 8vo.] Cic. de leg. 1, de oral. 2.—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Plut. de mal. Herod.

HEROËS, a name which was given by the ancients to such as were born from a god, or to such as had signalized themselves by their actions, and seemed to deserve immortality by the service they had rendered their country. The heroes which Homer describes, such as Ajax, Achilles, &c. were of such a prodigious strength, that they could lift up and throw stones which the united force of four or five men of his age could not have moved. The heroes were supposed to be interested in the affairs of mankind after death, and they were invoked with much solemnity. As the altars of the gods were crowded with sacrifices and libations, so the heroes were often honoured with a funeral solemnity, in which their great exploits were enumerated. The origin of heroism might proceed from the opinions of some philosophers, who taught that the souls of great men were often raised to the stars, and introduced among the immortal gods. According to the notions of the stoics, the ancient heroes inhabited a pure and serene climate, situate above the moon.

HERON, two mathematicians, one of whom is called the ancient and the other the younger. The former, who lived about 100 years before Christ, was disciple of Ctesibius, and wrote a curious book translated into Latin, under the title of Spiritualium Liber, the only edition of which is that of Baldus, Aug. Vind. 1616,

HEROOPOLIS, [a city of Egypt, about equidistant from Pelusium, the apex of the Delta, and the city of Arsinoe, on the extremity of the western branch of the Sinus Arabicus. It gave to that branch the name of Sinus Heroopolites, now Bahr-Assuez. Heroopolis was called Pilhom by the Egyptians, and was the residence of the ancient shepherd kings of Egypt.]

HEROPHILA, a sybil, who, as some suppose, came to Rome in the reign of Tarquin. (vid. Sibyllæ.) Paus. 10, c. 12.

HEROPHILUS, [a celebrated physician, a native of Chalcedon. Galen indeed has called him a Carthaginian; but in the book entitled "Introduction," which is ascribed to Galen, he is said to be of Chalcedon. Herophilus lived under Ptolemy Soter, and was contemporary with the philosopher Diodorus, and with the celebrated physician Erasistratus, with whose name his own is commonly associated in the history of anatomical science. As a physician, Herophilus is mentioned with praise, both by the ancient and the early modern writers. Cicero, Plutarch, and Pliny in particular, praise him. One writer, Fallopius, has even affirmed that his authority in anatomy was equal to the Gospel.]

HERSE, a daughter of Cecrops, king of Athens, beloved by Mercury. The god disclosed his love to Aglauros, Herse's sister, in hopes of procuring an easy admission to Herse; but Aglauros, through jealousy, discovered the amour. Mercury was so offended at her behaviour, that he struck her with his caduceus and changed her into a stone. Herse became mother of Cephalus by Mercury, and after death she received divine honours at Athens. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 559, &c.

HERSILIA, one of the Sabines carried away by the Romans at the celebration of the Consualia. She was given and married to Romulus, though, according to some, she married Hostus, a youth of Latium, by whom she had Hostus Hostilius. After death she was presented with immortality by Juno, and received divine honours under the name of Ora. Liv. 1, c. 11.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 332.

HERTHA and HERTA, a goddess among the Germans supposed to be the same as the earth. [Vossius conjectures that this goddess was Cybele, but incorrectly.] She had a temple and a chariot dedicated to her service in a remote island, and was supposed to visit the earth at stated times, when her coming was celebrated with the greatest rejoicings and festivity. [Some have supposed that Stonehenge was a temple consecrated to the goddess Hertha.] Tacit. de Germ.

HERULI, a savage nation in the northern parts of Europe, who attacked the Roman power in its decline. [According to Jornandes and Procopius, the Heruli were originally a Gothic nation. The former writer affirms that they first dwelt in Scandinavia, and being driven thence by the Danes, wandered eastward as far as the Palus Mæotis, and settled in that neighbourhood. Procopius represents them as in ancient times inhabiting the countries which lie beyond the Danube. Here they continued making frequent incursions into the empire, until the reign of Anastasius, when great numbers of them were cut off by the Lombards, and the rest migrated to the west. They began to invade the empire about A. D. 526. They were a remarkably ferocious people.]

HESIODUS, a celebrated poet, [born at Cumæ in Æolis, but carried in his infancy to Asera in Bœotia, whence he is commonly styled the Ascræan bard.] His father's name was Dius, and his mother's Pyrimene. He lived in the age of Homer, and even obtained a poetical prize in competition with him, according to Varro and Plutarch. [This contest of Homer and Hesiod is an invention of a later age. The poem published under this title is a mere canto, formed from the works of the two poets, and was composed probably in the second or third century of the Christian era, if not later.] Quintilian, Philostratus, and others, maintain that Hesiod lived before the age of Homer; but Val. Paterculus, &c. support that he flourished about 100 years after him. Hesiod is the first who wrote a poem on agriculture. This composition is called The Works and Days; and, besides the instructions which are given to the cultivator of the field, the reader is pleased to find many moral reflections worthy of a refined Socrates or a Plato. [The Works and Days should very probably be considered merely as a fragment of a larger work which is lost, or, according to some critics, as composed of various detached pieces put together by some Diaseuastes. Twisten has even endeavoured to point out and distinguish these component parts.] His Theogony is a miscellaneous narration executed without art, precision, choice, judgment, or connection, yet it is the more valuable for the faithful account it gives of the gods of antiquity. [Even as early as the time of Pausanias, it was considered doubtful whether Hesiod wrote the Theogony. According to the theory of Hermann, it is a poem formed by the union of several minor compositions on the same subject, collected together by the ancient grammarians. What renders the Theogony very interesting is the circumstance of its being the oldest monument we have of the Greek mythology.] His Shield of Hercules is but a fragment of a larger poem, in which it is supposed he gave an account of the heroes descended from the Gods by mortal mothers. [The poem here alluded to was called the Heroogony. A minor composition respecting the battle between Hercules and Cynus, containing a description of the shield of that hero, is supposed to have been appended to it by some rhapsodist. It is from this small piece that the poem in question bears the name of the Shield of Hercules. Modern critics think that the Heroogony is made up of two poems cited by the ancients. One under the title of the Catalogue of Women, that is, of the females who have been the mothers of demigods; and the other under the title of Ἡσίοδος μεγάλας, so named because the history of each heroine in it commences, as the Shield of Hercules, with the words ἡ εἶν, "or such as." The Catalogue consisted of five cantos, of which the Hoias formed the fourth.] Hesiod, without being master of the fire and sublimity of Homer, is admired for the elegance of his diction, and the sweetness of his poetry. Besides these poems he wrote others, now lost. Pausanias says, that in his age, Hesiod's verses were still written on tablets in the temple of the Muses, of which the poet was a priest. If we believe Clem. Alexand. 6, Strom. the poet borrowed much from Musæus. One of Lucian's dialogues bears the name of Hesiod, and in it the poet is introduced as speaking of himself. Virgil, in his Georgics, has imitated the compositions of Hesiod, and taken his opera and dies for a model, as he acknowledges. Cicero strongly commends him, and the Greeks were so partial to his poetry and moral instructions, that they ordered their children to learn all by heart. Hesiod was murdered by the sons of Ganyctor of Naupactum, and his body was thrown into the sea. Some dolphins brought back the body to the shore, which was immediately known, and the murderers were discovered by the poet's dogs, and thrown into the sea. If Hesiod flourished in the age of Homer, he lived 907 B. C. The best editions of this poet are that of Robinson, 4to. Oxon, 1737, that of Loesner, 8vo. Lips. 1778, and that of Parma, 4to. 1785. Cic. Fam. 6, ep. 18.—Paus. 9, c. 3, &c.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Paterc.—Varro.—Plut. de 7 Sep. & de Anim. Sag.

HESIONE, a daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, by Strymo, the daughter of the Scamander. It fell to her lot to be exposed to a sea-monster, to whom the Trojans yearly presented a marriageable virgin, to appease the resentment of Apollo and Neptune, whom Laomedon had offended; but Hercules promised to deliver her, provided he received as a reward six beautiful horses. Laomedon consented, and Hercules attacked the monster just as he was going to devour Hesione, and he killed him with his club. Laomedon, however, refused to reward the hero's services; and Hercules, incensed at his treachery, besieged Troy, and put the king and all his family to the sword, except Podarces, or Priam, who had advised his father to give the promised horses to his sister's deliverer. The conqueror gave Hesione in marriage to his friend Telamon, who had assisted him during the war, and he established Priam upon his father's throne. The removal of Hesione to Greece proved at last fatal to the Trojans; and Priam, who remembered with indignation that his sister had been forcibly given to a foreigner, sent his son Paris to Greece to reclaim the possession of Hesione, or more probably to revenge his injuries upon the Greeks by carrying away Helen, which gave rise soon after to the Trojan war. Lycophron mentions, that Hercules threw himself, armed from head to foot, into the mouth of the monster to which Hesione was exposed, and that he tore his belly to pieces, and came out safe only with the loss of his hair, after a confinement of three days. *Homer. HESPERIA, a large island of Africa, once the residence of the Amazons. Diod. 3.—A name common both to Italy and Spain. It is derived from Hesper or Vesper, the setting sun, or the evening, whence the Greeks called Italy Hesperia, because it was situate at the setting sun, or in the west. The same name, for similar reasons, was applied to Spain by the Latins. [The Greeks styled Italy Hesperia; the Romans on the contrary applied this name to Spain, sometimes, for distinction sake, this latter country was called Hesperia Ultima.] Virg. Æn. 1, v. 634, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 34, v. 4, l. 1, od. 27, v. 28.—Sil. 7, v. 15.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 258.—A daughter of the Cebrenus. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 769.

HESPERIDES, three celebrated nymphs, daughters of Hesperus. Apollodorus mentions four, Ægle, Erythia, Vesta, and Arethusa: and Diodorus confounds them with the Atlantides, and supposes that they were the same number. They were appointed to guard the golden apples which Juno gave to Jupiter on the day of their nuptials; and the place of their residence, placed beyond the ocean by Hesiod, is more universally believed to be near Mount Atlas in Africa, according to Apollodorus. This celebrated place or garden abounded with fruits of the most delicious kind, and was carefully guarded by a dreadful dragon which never slept. It was one of the labours of Hercules to procure some of the golden apples of the Hesperides. The hero, ignorant of the situation of this celebrated garden, applied to the nymphs in the neighbourhood of the Po for information, and was told that Nereus, the god of the sea, if properly managed, vid. Nereus, would direct him in his pursuits. Hercules seized Nereus as he was asleep, and the sea-god, unable to escape from his grasp, answered all the questions which he proposed. Some say that Nereus sent Hercules to Prometheus, and that from him he received all his information. When Hercules came into Africa, he repaired to Atlas, and demanded of him three of the golden apples. Atlas unloaded himself, and placed the burden of the Heavens on the shoulders of Hercules, while he went in quest of the apples. At his return Hercules expressed his wish to ease his burden by putting something on his head, and when Atlas assisted him to remove his inconvenience, Hercules artfully left the burden, and seized the apples which Atlas had thrown on the ground. According to other accounts, Hercules gathered the apples himself, without the assistance of Atlas, and he previously killed the watchful dragon which kept the tree. These apples were brought to Eurystheus, and afterwards carried back by Minerva into the garden of the Hesperides, as they could be preserved in no other place. Hercules is sometimes represented gathering the apples, and the dragon which guarded the tree appears bowing down his head, as having received a mortal wound. This monster, as it is supposed, was the offspring of Typhon, and it had a hundred heads and as many voices. This number, however, is reduced by some to only one head. Those that attempt to explain mythology, observe that the Hesperides were certain persons who had an immense number of flocks, and that the ambiguous word μικρον, which signifies an apple and a sheep, gave rise to the fable of the golden apples of the Hesperides. Diod. 4. [Pliny and Solinus will have the dragon to have been no other than an arm of the sea, wherewith the garden was encompassed and protected. Some place the gardens of the Hesperides at Lorach, a city of Fez; others at Berenice, the modern Bernic; others are for the province of Sina in Morocco. Dupuis, who makes Hercules to have been the Sun, and refers his twelve labours to the passage of that luminary through the signs of the zodiac, explains the fable of the Hesperides as follows. In the twelfth month, making the first coincide with Leo, the sun enters the sign Cancer. At this period the constellation of Hercules ingeniculus descends towards the western regions, called Hesperia, followed by the polar dragon, the guardian of the apples of the Hesperides. On the celestial sphere Hercules tramples the dragon under foot, which falls towards him as it sets. Hence the fable.] *Ovid. [HESPERIDUM Insulæ, are generally thought to correspond with the Cape de Verd islands; but as these are too far from the coast, they possibly may have been rather the small islands called Bisagos, lying a little above Sierra Leone. In these some place the gardens of the Hesperides, which others will have to be on the continent.]

HESPERIS, vid. Hesperus.—A town of Cyrenaica, now Bernic or Bengazi, where most authors have placed the garden of the Hesperides. [According to Pliny, Ptolemy, and Ammianus Marcellinus, the name of this city originally was Berenice, and afterwards changed to Hesperis.]

HESPERUS, a son of Japetus, brother to Atlas. He came to Italy, and the country received the name Hesperia from him, according to some accounts. He had a daughter called Hesperis, who married Atlas, and became mother of seven daughters, called Atlantides or Hesperides. Diod. 4.—The name of Hesperus was also applied to the planet Venus, when it appeared after the setting of the sun. It was called Phosphorus or Lucifer when it preceded the sun. Cæc. de Nat. D. 2, c. 2.—Senec. de Hippol. 749. Id. in med. 71.

HESUS, a deity among the Gauls, the same as the Mars of the Romans. Lucan. 1, v. 445.

HESYCHIUS, [a native of Alexandria. He is placed by different writers in the 4th and at the end of the 6th century. He is celebrated as a lexicographer, and has been supposed by some to be the same person as the patriarch of Jerusalem of that name. From the insertion of scriptural words in his lexicon, it is inferred that he was a Christian, though critics have thought that these might have been added by another hand. His work is a Greek lexicon or vocabulary, which has been esteemed one of the most valuable treasures of the Greek language. The best edition is that of Alberti, Lugd. Bat. 2 vols. folio. 1746.]

HETRŪRIA and ETRURIA, [a celebrated country of Italy, lying to the west of the Tiber. Herodotus represents the inhabitants as of Lydian descent, an opinion which is followed by Cicero, Strabo, Velleius Paterculus, Seneca, Pliny, Plutarch, and Servius. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, on the contrary, considers this account of the origin of the Etrurians as entirely fabulous, principally on the ground that Xanthus, the chief historian of Lydia, says nothing of any colony having emigrated to Italy. He conceives the Etrurians to have been the Aborigines or natives of the country. He admits, however, that a tribe of Pelasgi passed from Thessaly to the mouth of the Po, many ages previous to the Trojan war, and, thence directing their course to the south, aided the Etrurians in their wars with the Siculi; that subsequent to this they were again dispersed in consequence of disease and famine, but a few still remained behind, and, being incorporated with the ancient inhabitants, bestowed on them whatever in language or customs appeared to be common to the Etrurians with the other nations of Pelasgic descent. The theory of Mannert admirably reconciles these conflicting opinions, and furnishes what may be regarded as the true history of the origin of the Etrurians. According to this writer, the Pelasgi being driven out of Thessaly by the Hellenes under Deucalion, about four or five ages previous to the Trojan war, retired in a great measure to Epirus, whence numbers of them crossed over into Italy. Here they formed an union with the Aborigines, and invaded with them the territories of the Umbri, which extended at that early period from sea to sea. From the Umbri they wrested the city of Cortona with its adjacent territory, which a part of them selected as the place of their abode. The remainder moved onward to the south, aided their allies the Aborigines in their wars with the Siculi, the primitive possessors of what was afterwards called Latium, drove these Siculi to the southern extremities of Italy, and spread themselves over the fertile plains of Latium and Campania. In the mean time that portion of the Pelasgi expelled from Thessaly which had not retired to Epirus, had emigrated to the coast of Asia Minor. It is here that Homer makes mention of them among the allies of the Trojans, and of their capital city Larissa, called so evidently from the city of the same name in Thessaly, their ancient capital. From the Æolic writer Meæcrates of Elea, we learn that they had possessed themselves of the entire coast of what was subsequently termed Ionia, and Strabo assures us that the Greek colonies which came afterwards to these shores, induced the Pe-

lasgi to look elsewhere for new places of abode. It was these Pelasgi then who migrated to Italy from the coast of Asia. A migration by the Lydians at that early period was utterly impossible, for they were as yet an inland people, at a distance from the shores of the Ægean, and only became acquainted at a subsequent period with maritime affairs. When these Pelasgi from Asia had reached the shores of Italy, they united with their brethren who were already in that country, and the foundation was thus laid for the Etrurian nation. It appears from good authorities that the true name of the Pelasgi was Tyrseni or Raseni, and it will be found upon examination that the appellations of Pelasgi and Tyrseni were perfectly synonymous in the ancient writers. Sophocles, for example, names the Argives Pelasgic Tyrseni. Myrsilus asserts that the Pelasgi erected the ancient wall around the Acropolis of Athens, which is therefore styled by Callimachus, as quoted in the scholia to the "Birds" of Aristophanes, the Pelasgic wall of the Tyrseni. Those Pelasgi, moreover, who retired from Attica to Lemnos are called by Apollonius of Rhodes Tyrseni, and Thucydides informs us that the Pelasgi on the coast of Thrace were the same nation with the Tyrseni who once inhabited Attica. Thus much for the origin of the Etrurian nation. In the career of prosperity and renown this singular people advanced with almost gigantic strides. They spread from the mouth of the Po far to the south into Campania, while on the other side they pushed their conquests north even to the Alps. They soon became a civilized, polished, and highly prosperous nation, and their glory was at its height before Rome was yet founded. Their form of government was a sort of federative one, resembling in some degree that of the Swiss Cantons. They were divided into 12 states, each of which was governed by a Lucumo. Their names were Veientes, Clusini, Perusini, Cortoneses, Arretini, Vetulonii, Volaterrani, Russellani, Volscinii, Tarquinii, Falisci, and Cæratini. They fell at last beneath the superior power of Rome, and never recovered their defeat at the Lake Vadimonis.] Plin. 3, c. 4.—Strab. 5.—Plut. in Rom.—Mela, 2, c. 4.

HIERAPŌLIS, [a city of Syria, near the Euphrates, south of Zeugma. It derived its Greek name, (Holy City) from the circumstance of the Syrian goddess Atergatis being worshipped there. By the Syrians it was called Bambyce or Mabog. It is now Membiz.]—[A city in the south-western angle of Phrygia, near the confines of Lydia, and north-west of Laodicea. It is now called by the Turks Bambuk-Calasi, or the castle of Cotton, because the neighbouring rocks resembled that substance in their whiteness.]

HIÉRO 1st, a king of Syracuse, after his brother Gelon, who rendered himself odious in the beginning of his reign by his cruelty and avarice. He made war against Theron, the tyrant of Agrigentum, and took Himera. He obtained three different crowns at the Olympic games, two in horse-races, and one at a chariot-race. Pindar has celebrated him as being victorious at Olympia. In the latter part of his reign the conversation of Simonides, Epicharmus, Pindar, &c. softened in some measure the roughness of his morals and the severity of his government, and rendered him the patron of learning, genius, and merit. He died, after a reign of 18 years, B. C. 467, leaving the crown to his brother Thrasybulus, who disgraced himself by his vices and tyranny. Diod. 11.—The second of that name king of Syracuse, was descended from Gelon. He was unanimously elected king by all the states of the island of Sicily, and appointed to carry on the war against the Carthaginians. He joined his enemies in besieging Messana, which had surrendered to the Romans, but he was beaten by Appius Claudius, the Roman consul, and obliged to retire to Syracuse, where he was soon blocked up. Seeing all hopes of victory lost, he made peace with the Romans, and proved so faithful to his engagements during the fifty-nine years of his reign, that the Romans never had a more firm, or more attached ally. He died in the 94th year of his age, about 225 years before the Christian era. He was universally regretted, and all the Sicilians showed by their lamentations, that they had lost a common father and a friend. He liberally patronized the learned, and employed the talents of Archimedes for the good of his country. He wrote a book on agriculture, now lost. He was succeeded by Hieronymus. Ælian. V. HIÉROCLÉS, a persecutor of the Christians under Dioclesian, who pretended to find inconsistencies in Scripture, and preferred the miracles of Thyaneus to those of Christ. His writings were refuted by Lactantius and Eusebius.—A Platonic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, and wrote a book on providence and fate, fragments of which are preserved by Photius; a commentary on the golden verses of Pythagoras; and facetious moral verses. He flourished A. D. 485. The best edition is that of Ashton and Warren, 8vo London, 1742.

HIÉRONICA LEX, by Hiero, tyrant of Sicily, to settle the quantity of corn, the price and time of receiving it between the farmers of Sicily and the collector of the corn tax at Rome. This law, on account of its justice and candour, was continued by the Romans when they became masters of Sicily.

HIÉRONYMUS, a tyrant of Sicily who succeeded his father or grandfather Hiero, when only 15 years old. He rendered himself odious by his cruelty, oppression, and debauchery.

He abjured the alliance of Rome, which Hiero had observed with so much honour and advantage. He was assassinated, and all his family was overwhelmed in his fall, and totally extirpated, B. C. 214.—An historian of Rhodes, who wrote an account of the actions of Demetrius Poliorcetes, by whom he was appointed over Bœotia, B. C. 254. Plut. in Dem.—An Athenian set over the fleet while Conon went to the king of Persia.—A Christian writer, commonly called St. Jerome, born in Pannonia, and distinguished for his zeal against heretics. He wrote commentaries on the prophets, St. Matthew's Gospel, &c. a Latin version, known by the name of Vulgate, polemical treatises, and an account of ecclesiastical writers, before him. Of his works, which are replete with lively animation, sublimity, and erudition, the best edition is that of Vallar-ius, fol. Veronæ, 1734 to 1740, ten vols. Jerome died A. D. 420, in his 91st year.

HIÉROSOLYMA, [a celebrated city of Palestine, and capital of Judea. It was anciently denominated Jebus or Salem. The Jebusites held it until the time of David, when it was taken possession of by the tribe of Benjamin, who allowed the ancient inhabitants to remain. It was then called by the Hebrews Jeruschalaim or Jeruschalem, the vision of peace, or the possession of the inheritance of peace. The name Hierosolyma was applied to it by the Greeks and Romans. It was built on several hills, the largest of which was Mount Sion, which formed the southern part of the city. A valley toward the north separated this from Acra the second or lower city, on the east of which was Mount Moriah, the site of the temple of Solomon. North-east of Mount Moriah was the Mount of Olives, on the south was the valley of Hinnom, and at the north Mount Calvary, the scene of our Lord's crucifixion.] It was taken by Pompey, who, on that account, is surnamed Hierosolymarus. Titus also took it and destroyed it the 8th of September A. D. 70, according to Josephus, 2177 years after its foundation. In the siege by Titus, 110,000 persons are said to have perished, and 97,000 to have been made prisoners, and afterwards either sold for slaves, or wantonly exposed for the sport of their insolent victors to the fury of wild beasts. [The ardent zeal of the Jewish nation for their holy city and temple soon caused both to be again rebuilt, but fresh commotions compelled the emperor Adrian to interfere, and ordain that no Jew should remain in, or even approach near Jerusalem on pain of death. On the ruins of their temple the same emperor caused a temple in honour of Jupiter Capitolinus to be erected, and the image of a hog to be cut in stone over the doorway, as a standing insult to the religious feelings of this unfortunate people. The name of the city also was changed to Ælia Capitolina, the first part of the name alluding to the family of the Roman emperor. This latter name became afterwards the ordinary name of the city, and Jerusalem became nearly obsolete. Upon the ascension to the throne, however, of the Christian emperors, the name revived. Jerusalem thus restored, was much less in its compass than the ancient city, Mount Sion and Bezetha being excluded.] Joseph. Bell. J. 7, c. 16, &c.—Cic. ad Attic. 2, ep. 9.—Flacc. 28.

HILARIUS, a bishop of Poitiers in France, who wrote several treatises, the most famous of which is on the Trinity, in 12 books. The only edition is that of the Benedictine monks, fol. Paris, 1693. Hilary died A. D. 372, in his 80th year.

HILLEVIÖNES, a people of Scandinavia; [according to Ptolemy, they occupied the only known part of this country. Among the various names of countries and people reported by Jornandes, we still find, observes D'Anville, Hallin; and that which is contiguous to the province of Skane is still called Halland.] Plin. 4, c. 13.

HIMÉRA, a city of Sicily built by the people of Zancle, and destroyed by the Carthaginians 240 years after. Strab. 6.—There were two rivers of Sicily of the same name, the one, now Fiume de Termini, falling at the east of Panormus into the Tuscan Sea, with a town of the same name at its mouth, and also celebrated baths. [The place is now called Termini from the thermæ or warm baths.] Cic. Verr. 4, c. 33. The other, now Fiume Salso, running in a southern direction, and dividing the island almost into two parts. [This river separated the Syracusan from the Carthaginian dependencies in Sicily.] Liv. 24, c. 6, 1. 25, c. 49.—The ancient name of the Euerotas. Strab. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Polyb.

HIMILCO, a Carthaginian, sent to explore the western parts of Europe. Fest. Avien.—A son of Amilcar, who succeeded his father in the command of the Carthaginian armies in Sicily. He died with his army, by a plague, B. C. 398. Justin. 19, c. 2.

HIPPARCHUS, a son of Pisistratus, who succeeded his father as tyrant of Athens, with his brother Hippias. He patronized some of the learned men of his age, and distinguished himself by his fondness for literature. The seduction of a sister of Harmodius raised him many enemies, and he was at last assassinated by a desperate band of conspirators, with Harmodius and Aristogiton at their head 513 years before Christ. Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 2.—[An ancient astronomer, born at Nicæa in Bithynia, and flourished between the 154th and 163d Olympiads. He was the first person who attempted to count the number of the fixed stars, and his catalogue is still preserved in Ptolemy's Almagest, where they are set down with their longitudes and apparent magnitudes. According to Pliny he foretold the course of the sun and moon for 600 years; he predicted the times of eclipses, and taught mankind that they ought not to be alarmed at the recurrence of such phenomena. Thales was the first among the Greeks who could foretell the approach of an eclipse. Sulpicius Gallus among the Romans began to be successful in that kind of prediction. Hippar-chus came after these, and greatly improved that science, making Ephemerides and other learned and useful helps to astronomy. He discovered a new star, and is memorable for having been the first who discovered the precession of the equinoxes.] He makes no mention of comets. From viewing a tree on a plain from different situations, which changed its apparent position, he was led to the discovery of the parallax of the planets, or the distance between their real or apparent position, viewed from the centre, and from the surface of the earth. He determined longitude and latitude, and fixed the first degree of longitude at the Canaries. He likewise laid the first foundations of trigonometry, so essential to facilitate astronomical studies. After a life of labour in the service of science and astronomy, and after publishing several treatises and valuable observations on the appearance of the heavens, he died 125 years before the Christian era. Plin. 2, c. 26, &c.

HIPPÄSUS, [a native of Metapontum and follower of the Pythagorean doctrine. He is said to have excelled in the application of mathematical principles to music, statics, and mensuration. In common with others of the same sect he held that fire was the originating cause of all things. He taught also that the universe is finite, is always changing, and undergoes a periodical conflagration.] Diog.

HIPPÄS, a philosopher of Elis, who maintained that virtue consisted in not being in want of the assistance of men. At the Olympic games he boasted that he was master of all the liberal and mechanical arts; and he said that the ring upon his finger, the tunic, cloak, and shoes, which he then wore, were all the work of his own hands. Cic. de Orat. 3, c. 32.—A son of Pisistratus, who became tyrant of Athens after the death of his father, with his brother Hipparchus. He was willing to revenge the death of his brother who had been assassinated, and for this violent measure he was driven from his country. He fled to king Darius in Persia, and was killed at the battle of Marathon, fighting against the Athenians, B. C. 490. He had five children by Myrrhine, the daughter of Callias. Herodot. 6.—Thucyd. 7.

HIPPUS, a surname of Neptune, from his having raised a horse (ἵππος) from the earth in his contest with Minerva concerning the giving a name to Athens.

HIPPO [REGIUS, a city of Africa, in that part of Numidia called the western province. It was situate near the sea, on a bay in the vicinity of the promontory of Hippus. It was called Hippo Regius, not only in opposition to Hippo Zarytus mentioned below, but also from its having been one of the royal cities of the Numidian kings; for, according to Silius Italicus, it was one of their favourite seats. Of this city St. Augustine was bishop. The ruins are spread at the present day over the neck of land that lies between the rivers Boo-jemah and Seibouse. Near the ancient site is a town named Bona.]—[Zarytus, a town of Africa, on the coast, to the west of Utica.

It was thus termed to distinguish it from the one above mentioned, and the name has reference to its situation among artificial canals which afforded the sea an entrance to a navigable lagune adjacent. It is now Benzert, corrupted by mariners into Biserte.]

HIPPOCENTAURI, a race of monsters who dwell in Thessaly. vid. Centauri.

HIPPOCRATES, a celebrated physician of Cos, one of the Cyclades. [He was of the family of the Asclepiades, the descendants of Æsculapius; his father Heraclides being the seventeenth lineal descendant from that personage, and the sixteenth from Podalirius, who, with his brother Machaon, followed the army of the Greeks to the Trojan war.] He studied physic, in which his grandfather Nebrus was so eminently distinguished; and he improved himself by reading the tablets in the temples of the gods, where each individual had written down the diseases under which he had laboured, and the means by which he had recovered. He delivered Athens from a dreadful pestilence in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and he was publicly rewarded with a golden crown, the privileges of a citizen of Athens, and the initiation at the grand festivals. Skilful and diligent in his profession, he openly declared the measures which he had taken to cure a disease, and candidly confesses that of 42 patients which were intrusted to his care, only 17 had recovered, and the rest had fallen a prey to the distemper in spite of his medical applications. He devoted all his time for the service of his country; and when Artaxerxes invited him, even by force of arms, to come to his court, Hippocrates firmly and modestly answered, that he was born to serve his countrymen, and not a foreigner. He enjoyed the rewards which his well-directed labours claimed, and while he lived in the greatest popularity, he was carefully employed in observing the symptoms and the growth of every disorder, and from his judicious remarks, succeeding physicians have received the most valuable advantages. The experiments which he had tried upon the human frame increased his knowledge, and from his consummate observations, he knew how to moderate his own life as well as to prescribe to others. He died in the 99th year of his age, B. C. 361, free from all disorders of the mind and body; and after death he received, with the name of Great, the same honours which were paid to Hercules. His writings, few of which remain, have procured him the epithet of divine, and show that he was the Homer of his profession. According to Galen, his opinion is as respectable as the voice of an oracle. He wrote in the Ionic dialect, at the advice of Democritus, though he was a Dorian. His memory is still venerated at Cos, and the present inhabitants of the island show a small house which Hippocrates, as they mention, once inhabited. The best editions of his works are that of Fæsius, Genæ, fol. 1657; of Linden, 2 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1665; and that of Mackus, 2 vols. fol. Viennæ, 1743. His treatises, especially the Aphorisms, have been published separately. [The learned Coray published a translation in French of the medical works of Hippocrates, at Toulouse in 1801, in 4 vols. 8vo. and also a translation of his treatise on airs, waters, and places, at Paris, 1801, in 2 vols. 8vo. enriched with a critical, historical, and medical commentary.] Plin. 7, c. 37.—Cic. de Orat. 3.

HIPPOCRÈNE, a fountain of Bœotia, near Mount Helicôn, sacred to the muses. It first rose from the ground, when struck by the feet of the horse Pegasus, whence the name ἵππου ἕρην, the horse's fountain. [vid. Aganippe and Helicôn.] Ovid. 5, Met. v. 256.

HIPPODÁME and HIPPODAMIA, a daughter of Cœnomaus, king of Pisa, in Elis, who married Pelops son of Tantalus. Her father, who was either enamoured of her himself, or afraid lest he should perish by one of his daughter's children, according to an oracle, refused to marry her, except to him who could overcome him in a chariot-race. As th beauty of Hippodamia was greatly celebrated, many courted her, and accepted her father's conditions, though death attended a defeat. Thirteen had already been conquered, and forfeited their lives, when Pelops came from Lydia and entered the lists. Pelops purposely bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Cœnomaus, and ensured himself the victory. In the race, Cœnomaus mounted on a broken chariot, which the corrupted Myrtilus had previously provided for him, was easily overcome, and was killed in the course; and Pelops married Hippodamia, and avenged the death of Cœnomaus, by throwing into the sea the perfidious Myrtilus, who claimed for the reward of his treachery, the favour which Hippodamia could grant only to her husband. Hippodamia became mother of Atreus and Thyestes, and it is said that she died of grief for the death of her father, which her guilty correspondence with Pelops and Myrtilus had occasioned. Virg. G. 3, v. 7.—Huglin. fab. 34 and 253.—Paus. 5, c. 14, &c.—Diod. 4.—Ovid. Heroid. 8 and 17.—A daughter of Adrastus, king of Argos, who married Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ. The festivity which prevailed on the day of her marriage was interrupted by the attempts of Eurytus to offer her violence. (vid. Pirithous.) She is called Ischomache by some, and Deidamia by others. Ovid. Met. 12.—Plut. in Thes.

HIPPODRŌMUS, [a place wherein chariot and horse-races were performed and horses exercised. The term comes from ἵππος, equus, and δρομος, cursus.]

HIPPŌLYTE, a queen of the Amazons, given in marriage to Theseus by Hercules who had conquered her, and taken away her girdle by order of Eurystheus. (vid. Hercules.) She had a son by Theseus, called Hippolytus. Plut. in Thes.—Propert. 4, el. 3.—The wife of Acastus, who fell in love with Peleus, who was in exile at her husband's court. She accused him of incontinence, and of attempts upon her virtue, before Acastus, only because he refused to gratify her desires. She is also called Astyoehia. (vid. Acastus.)—A daughter of Cretheus. Apollod.

HIPPOLÝTUS, a son of Theseus and Hippolyte, famous for his virtues and his misfortunes. His step-mother Phædra fell in love with him, and when he refused to pollute his father's bed, she accused him of offering violence to her person before Theseus. Her accusation was readily believed, and Theseus entreated Neptune severely to punish the incontinence of his son. Hippolytus fled from the resentment of his father, and, as he pursued his way along the sea-shore, his horses were so frightened at the noise of sea-calves, which Neptune had purposely sent there, that they ran among the rocks till his chariot was broken and his body torn to pieces. Temples were raised to his memory, particularly at Træzene, where he received divine honours. According to some accounts, Diana restored him to life. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 268. Met. 15, v. 469. —Verg. Æn. 7, v. 761 &c.—A Christian writer in the third century, [the disciple of Irenæus and instructor of Origen. The seat of his principal labours in propagating the gospel, in which cause his zeal rendered him very celebrated, was at Rome. were it is probable he suffered martyrdom. This took place in the year 230, under Alexander Severus. Some ascribe it, however, to the persecution under Maximinus, five years later, and others to the Decian persecution about the year 250.] His works have been edited by Fabricius, Hamb. fol. 1716.

HIPPOMÉDON, a son of Nisimachus and Mythis, who was one of the seven chiefs who went against Thebes. He was killed by Ismarus, son of Acastus. Apollod. 3, c. 6.—Paus. 2, c. 36.

HIPPOMENES, a son of Macareus and Melepe, who married Atalanta (vid. Atalanta) with the assistance of Venus. These two fond lovers were changed into lions by Cybele, whose temple they had profaned in their impatience to consummate their nuptials. Ovid. Met. 10, v. 585, &c.

HIPPOMOLGI, a people of Scythia, who, as the name implies, lived upon the milk of horses. Hippocrates has given an account of their manner of living. De aqua & aer. 44.—Dionys. Perieg.

HIPPONA, a goddess who presided over horses. Her statues were placed in horses' stables. Juv. 8, v. 157.

HIPPONAX, a Greek poet, born at Ephesus 540 years before the Christian era. He cultivated the same satirical poetry as Archilochus, and was not inferior to him in the beauty or vigour of his lines. His satirical railery obliged him to fly from Ephesus. As he was naturally deformed, two brothers, Buphalus and Anthermus, made a statue of him which, by the deformity of its features, exposed the poet to universal ridicule. Hipponax resolved to avenge the injury, and he wrote such bitter invectives and satirical lampoons against them that they hanged themselves in despair. Cic. ad famil. 7, ep. 24.

HIPPÓNÍUM, [called also Viba Valentia, and now Bivona, a town of Italy, on the western coast of the territory of the Bruttii, southwest from Scylacium.] Here Agathocles built a dock. Strab.

HIPPÓPÓDES, a people of Scythia, who have horses' feet. [The Hippopodes are mentioned by Dionysius, Mela, Pliny, and St. Augustine. The truth appears to be, that they had this appellation given them on account of their swiftness of foot.] Dionys. Per. 310.—Mela, 3, 6.—Plin. 4.

HIPPÓTAS or HIPPÓTES, a Trojan prince changed into a river. (vid. Crinissus.)—The father of Æolus, who from thence is called Hippotades. Hom. Od. 10, v. 2.—Ovid. Her. 18, v. 46. Met. 14, v. 224.

HIPPÓTHOON, a son of Neptune and Alope, daughter of Cercyon, exposed in the woods by his mother, that her amours with the god might be concealed from her father. Her shame was discovered, and her father ordered her to be put to death. Neptune changed her into a fountain, and the child was preserved by mares, whence his name, and when grown up, placed on his grandfather's throne by the friendship of Theseus. Hygin. fab. 187.—Paus. 1, c. 38.

HIPPÜRIS, one of the Cyclades. Mela. 2, c. 7.

HIRA, [or Alexandria, now Mesjid-ali, or Meham-ali, a town of Asia in Babylonia, situate on a lake, a short distance from the western bank of the Euphrates. It was the residence of a dynasty of princes who served the Persians and Parthians against the Romans. They are called in history by the general name of Alamundari, after the term Al-Mondar, common to many of these princes at the fall of their dynasty under the Mahometan power. The body of Ali was here interred; and hence from the sepulchre of the caliph came the modern name.]

HIRPINI, [a people of Italy, who formed a part of the Samnites, and were situate to the south of Samnium proper. As the term Hirpinus signified in the Samnite dialect a wolf, they are said to have been thus called from their having followed the tracks of these animals in migrating to this quarter. Towards the end of the second Punic war they began to be distinguished from the rest of the Samnites. Their territory comprehended the towns of Beneventum, Caudium, Abellinum, and Compsa.] Sil. 8, v. 560.

HIRTIA LEX de magistratibus, by A. Hirtius. It required that none of Pompey's adherents should be raised to any office or dignity in the state.

HIRTIVS AULUS, a consul with Pansa, who assisted Brutus when besieged at Mutina by Antony. They defeated Antony, but were both killed in battle B. C. 43. [Hirtius and Pansa were the last of the free Roman consuls elect. Hirtius is the author of a supplementary part of Cæsar's commentaries. He wrote the 8th book of the Gallic war, and those of the Alexandrine and African wars. Of the two latter he received his information in part from Cæsar's own mouth. His style is good, but his narrative is considered less clear than that of Cæsar himself.]

HISPALIS, [a famous city of Spain, situate on the Bætis, and corresponding to the modern Seville. Mannert thinks that it was the same as the ancient Tartessus. The name is supposed to be of Phœnician origin, and, according to Isidorus, has reference to the city's being founded on piles or stakes of wood, on account of the insecurity of the ground where it stood. Some ascribe the origin of the place to Hercules; probably, however, it was a Phœnician colony. It was a place of great commerce, the Bætis being navigable in ancient times for the largest ships up to the city. Now, however, vessels drawing more than ten feet of water are compelled to unload 3 miles below the town, and the largest vessels stop at the mouth of the river. When Hispalis became a Roman colony the name was changed to Julia Romulensis.] Plin. 3, c. 3.—Cæs. Fam. 10, ep. 32.

HISPANIA, [an extensive country, forming a kind of peninsula, in the S. W. of Europe. It was bounded on the north by the Pyrenees and Sinus Cantabricus or Bay of Biscay, on the west by the Atlantic, on the south by Atlantic, Fretum Herculeum, or Straits of Gibraltar, and Mediterranean, which last bounds it also on the east. The name Hispania is evidently of Phœnician origin, and is said by Bochart to come from the oriental term Span or Spahn, signifying a rabbit, from the vast numbers of these animals which it was found to contain. The Romans borrowed this name from the Carthaginians, through whom they first became acquainted with the country. The Greeks called it Iberia, but attached at different periods different ideas to the name. Up to the time of the Achæan league and their more intimate acquaintance with the Romans, they understood by this name all the sea-coast from the pillars of Hercules to the mouth even of the Rhodanus or Rhone in Gaul; the coast of Spain on the Atlantic, they called Tartessus. The interior of the country they termed Celtice (Κελτική), a name which they applied in fact to the whole north-western part of Europe. The Greeks in after ages understood by Iberia the whole of Spain. The name Iberia is derived from the Iberi, of whom the Greeks had heard as one of the most powerful nations of the country.] Spain was first known to the merchants of Phœnicia, and from them passed to the Carthaginians, to whose power it long continued in subjection. The Romans became sole masters of it at the end of the second Punic war, and divided it at first into Citerior and Ulterior. [Hispania Citerior was afterwards called Tarraconensis, from Tarraco its capital, and extended from the foot of the Pyrenees to the mouth of the Durius or Douro, on the Atlantic shore; comprehending all the north of Spain, together with the south as far as a line drawn below Carthago Nova or Carthagena, and continued in an oblique direction to Salamantica or Salamanca on the Durius. Hispania Ulterior was divided into two provinces, Bætica, on the south of Spain between the Anas or Gaudiana and Citerior, and above it Lusitania, corresponding in a great degree, though not entirely, to modern Portugal. This change took place under Augustus. In the age of Dioclesian and Constantine, Tarraconensis was subdivided into a province toward the limits of Bætica, and adjacent to the Mediterranean, called Carthaginiensis, from its chief city Carthago Nova, and another, north of Lusitania, called Gallicia from the Calliaci.] The inhabitants were naturally warlike, and they often destroyed a life which was become useless, and even burdensome, by its infirmities. Spain was famous for its rich mines of silver, which employed 40,000 workmen, and daily yielded to the Romans no less than 20,000 drachms. These have long since failed, though in the flourishing times of Rome, Spain was said to contain more gold, silver, brass, and iron, than the rest of the world. It gave birth to Quintilian, Lucan, Martial, Mela, Silius, Seneca, &c. Justin. 44.—Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 1 and 20.

HISPANUS, a native of Spain; the word Hispaniensis was also used, but generally applied to a person living in Spain but not born there. Martial. 12, præf.

HISTILÆOTIS, a country of Thessaly, situate below Mount Olympus and Mount Ossa, anciently called Doris, from Dorus the son of Deucalion, and inhabited by the Pelasgi. The Pelasgi were driven from the country by the Cadmeans, and these last were also dispossessed by the Perrhæbears, who gave to their newly acquired possessions the name of Histiæotis, or Estiæotis, from Estiæa, or Histiæa, a town of Eubœa, which they had then lately destroyed, and whose inhabitants they had carried to Thessaly with them. Strab.—Herodot. 4.—A small country of Eubœa, of which Histiæa, or Estiæa, was the capital.

[HISTILÆA, vid. Oreus.]

HISTIAEUS, [a tyrant of Miletus, who, when the Scythians had almost persuaded the Ionian princes to destroy the bridge over the Ister, in order that the Persian army might perish, opposed the plan, and induced them to abandon the design. His argument was, that if the Persian army was destroyed and the power of Darius brought to an end, a popular government would be established in every Ionian city and the tyrants expelled. He was held in high estimation on this account by Darius, and rewarded with a grant of land in Thrace. But Megabyzus having convinced the king that it was bad policy to permit a Grecian settlement in Thrace, Darius induced Histiæus, who was already founding a city there, to come to Susa, having allured him by magnificent promises. Here he was detained under various pretences, the king being afraid of his influence and turbulent spirit at home. Histiæus, tired of this restraint, urged by means of secret messengers, his nephew Aristagoras to effect a revolt of the Ionians. This was done, and Histiaeus was sent by Darius to stop the revolt. He put himself at the head of an army of Ionians and Æolians, and attacked the Persians, but being made prisoner was crucified by Artaphernes at Sardis. Herod. 4, 137, 5, 11, &c.

HOMEROMASTIX, a surname given to Zoilus the critic. [vid. Zoilus.]

HOMERUS, a celebrated Greek poet, the most ancient of all the profane writers. [vid. end of this article.] The age in which he lived is not known, though some suppose it to be about 163 years after the Trojan war, or, according to others, 160 years before the foundation of Rome. According to Paterculus, he flourished 963 years before the Christian era, or 884, according to Herodotus, who supposed him to be contemporary with Hesiod. The Arundelian Marbles fix his era 907 years before Christ, and make him also contemporary with Hesiod. This diversity of opinions proves the antiquity of Homer; and uncertainty prevails also concerning the place of his nativity. No less than seven illustrious cities disputed the right of having given birth to the greatest of poets, as it is well expressed in these lines:

Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Salamis, Rhodos, Argos, Athenæ,

Orbis de patriâ certat, Homere, tuâ.

[A Greek epigram of Antipater Sidonius, gives the places somewhat differently.

Ἑπτα πόλεις μὲνεντο σοφῆν διὰ γίγνην Ὀμηροῦ.
Σμύρνα, Χίος, Κολοφών, Ἰθάκη, Πύλος, Ἄργος, Ἀθηναί.]

He was called Melesigenes, because supposed to be born on the borders of the river Meles. There prevailed a report that he had established a school at Chios in the latter part of his life, and indeed, this opinion is favoured by the present inhabitants of the island, who still glory in showing to travellers the seats where the venerable master and his pupils sat in the hollow of a rock, at the distance of about four miles from the modern capital of the island. These difficulties and doubts have not been removed, though Aristotle, Herodotus, Plutarch, and others, have employed their pen in writing his life. In his two celebrated poems called the Iliad and Odyssey, Homer has displayed the most consummate knowledge of human nature, and rendered himself immortal by the sublimity, the fire, sweetness, and elegance of his poetry. He deserves a greater share of admiration when we consider that he wrote without a model, and that none of his poetical imitators have been able to surpass, or, perhaps, to equal their great master. If there are any faults found in his poetry, they are to be attributed to the age in which he lived, and not to him; and we must observe, that the world is indebted to Homer for his happy successor Virgil. In his Iliad, Homer has described the resentment of Achilles, and its fatal consequences in the Grecian army before the walls of Troy. In the Odyssey, the poet has for his subject the return of Ulysses into his country, with the many misfortunes which attended his voyage after the fall of Troy. These two poems are each divided into 24 books, the same number as the letters of the Greek alphabet, and though the Iliad claims an uncontested superiority over the Odyssey, yet the same force, the same sublimity and elegance, prevail, though divested of its more powerful fire; and Longinus, the most refined of critics, beautifully compares the Iliad to the mid-day, and the Odyssey to the setting sun; and observes, that the latter still preserves its original splendour and majesty, though deprived of its meridian heat. The poetry of Homer was so universally admired, that, in ancient times, every man of learning could repeat with facility any passage in the Iliad or Odyssey; and, indeed, it was a sufficient authority to settle disputed boundaries, or to support any argument. The poems of Homer are the compositions of a man who travelled and examined with the most critical accuracy whatever deserved notice and claimed attention. Modern travellers are astonished to see the different scenes which the pen of Homer described about 3000 years ago still existing in the same unvaried form, and the sailor, who steers his course along the Ægean, sees all the promontories and rocks which appeared to Nestor and Menelaus when they returned victorious from the Trojan war. The ancients had such veneration for Homer, that they not only raised temples and altars to him, but offered sacrifices, and worshipped him as a god. The inhabitants of Chios celebrated festivals every fifth year in his honour, and medals were struck, which represented him sitting on a throne, holding his Iliad and Odyssey. In Egypt his memory was consecrated by Ptolemy Philopator, who erected a magnificent temple, within which was placed a statue of the poet beautifully surrounded with a representation of the seven cities which contended for the honour of his birth. The inhabitants of Cos, one of the Sporades, boasted that Homer was buried in their island; and the Cyprians claimed the same honour, and said that he was born of Themisto, a female native of Cyprus. Alexander was so fond of Homer, that he generally placed his compositions under his pillow, with his sword; and he carefully deposited the Iliad in one of the richest and most valuable caskets of Darius, observing that the most perfect work of human genius ought to be preserved in a box the most valuable and precious in the world. It is said, that Pisis-tratus, tyrant of Athens, was the first who collected and arranged the Iliad and Odyssey in the manner in which they now appear to us; and that it is to the well-directed pursuits of Lycurgus that we are indebted for their preservation. Many of the ancients have written the life of Homer, yet their inquiries and labours have not much contributed to prove the native place, the parentage, and connections of a man whom some have represented as deprived of sight. Besides the Iliad and Odyssey, Homer wrote, according to the opinion of some authors, a poem upon Amphiarus's expedition against Thebes, besides the Phocæis, the Cercopes, the small Iliad, the Epiclides, and the Batrachomyomachia, and many hymns to some of the gods. The merit of originality is taken very improperly, perhaps, from Homer, by those who suppose, with Clemens Alex. 6 Strom. that he borrowed from Orpheus, or that, according to Suidas, (voce Corinnus) he took his plan of the Iliad from Corinnus, an epic poet, who wrote on the Trojan war at the very time the Greeks besieged that famed city. Agathon, an ancient painter, according to Ælian, represented the merit of the poet in a manner as bold as it is indelicate. Homer was represented as vomiting, and all other poets as swallowing what he ejected. Of the numerous commentaries published on Homer, that of Eustathius, bishop of Thessalonica, is by far the most extensive and erudite. [Homer most probably flourished about 1000 or 1100, A. C. Hesychius, among other derivations for the name of this poet, (Ὅμηρος), deduces it by metathesis from Μηρος, one who cannot see, and considers it as a mere appellation for a person that is blind. Igen, a German scholar, derives it from ὄμου, together, and ἀγω, to fit, whence comes ὄμνησεν, synonymous with ὑπαείδειν, and hence Ὅμηρος means a poet who accompanies the lyre with his voice, "cantor qui citharam pulsans ὑποκαλον αὐδα." M. Girardet is inclined to deduce it from the Hebrew plural form omerim, i. e. words, considering that appellation as being commonly given to poetical narrations of important events; these narrations in fact being called επιη, words, even by the Greeks, whence the name Epopee. This last etymology appears to harmonise with the singular theory of Bentley, who wrote a dissertation for the purpose of proving that Solomon, king of Israel, was the author of the Iliad and Odyssey, and that he composed these poems after his apostacy from God. The dissertation was never printed, but exists, in manuscript, in the British Museum. The two principal questions which have been started in relation to this poet are the following: 1. Did Homer commit the Iliad and Odyssey to writing? 2. Did he compose these two poems entirely himself, or are they not rather to be regarded as made up of various minor poems by different authors, united and formed into one connected whole by some skilful grammarian? A few remarks will be here offered upon each of these long agitated topics. And first, as to the question whether writing was known in the time of Homer. The historian Josephus states positively that Homer did not write his poems, but that they were preserved during many ages by oral tradition. This passage of the Jewish historian had never been regarded with much attention, being considered as the testimony of an author of too modern a date, until cited by Wood in his

"Essay on the original genius and writings of Homer." In this work an attempt is made to prove that writing was not known in the time of Homer. Wood regards as a decisive proof of the fact which he supports, the circumstance of no mention being made of the art of writing either in the Iliad or Odyssey, although frequent opportunities occur where the poet might have easily and naturally alluded to it. To this it may be replied that two passages occur in the Iliad in which allusion is actually made to marks or characters, and in the last of the two evidently to alphabetic writing. In the 7th Book of the Iliad, v. 175, the Grecian chiefs draw lots to ascertain who shall engage in combat with Hector. Each chief marked his lot for the purpose of recognising it when drawn. The lot of Ajax came out first, and being showed by the herald to all the chiefs, was at last claimed by the hero above mentioned. We have here an approximation to writing. The second passage is, however, decisive. It occurs in the 6th Book of the Iliad, v. 168, and relates to the story of Bellerophon. Prætus, it is there said, not wishing to kill Bellerophon, and yet desiring his destruction, sent him to Lycia unto the father-in-law of the former, and gave him a folded tablet in which he had written many things calculated to induce Jobates to effect the destruction of the bearer. Were the contents of this tablet mere arbitrary symbols, or were they hieroglyphics, or in fact alphabetic characters, that is, actual writing? Abandoning even the argument which might be drawn from the use of the word γεγραμμεν in the original, enough remains to prove that alphabetic writing is here meant. If the tablet contained merely symbols, why were they many in number? One or two certainly would have sufficed. The multiplication of written symbols is only another name for writing. Again, if symbols or hieroglyphics were employed by Prætus on this occasion, they must have been very plain and direct, speaking at once to the eye, or also they could not have answered the end for which they were made. If they were thus plain and significant, why entrust them to the hands of Bellerophon himself? Would he not have immediately perceived the snare that was laid for him? But, it may be replied, the tablet was folded. To this we rejoin that the very folding of it must have excited the suspicion of Bellerophon, who would soon have been induced to examine its contents, and finding the symbols there, would not have been the bearer of the fatal package. If it contained letters, however, no examination on his part would lead to any discovery, for these letters were most probably Pelasgic, Prætus and Jobates being of Pelasgic origin, while Bellerophon was descended from Sisyphus, and of a different race. But the strongest argument is to be drawn from the use of the term θυμοφθορα in the original. This is commonly rendered "deadly things." Prætus did indeed write "deadly things," and yet this is not all which the term in question implies. According to its very composition, (ἄνευ and ἄνευ) it has a manifest allusion to the effect produced upon the feelings of an individual in rendering him evil disposed and hostile towards another. For the truth of this assertion we refer to the writings of Homer himself. Wherever the term ἄνευ is used by him, it carries along with it more or less of this peculiar force, and even when joined by the poet to the word ἄνευ, it means poisons which bereave one of the exercise of his understanding, and which consequently are deadly. Now it certainly would have been impossible for Prætus so to express or arrange his pretended symbols as to excite hostile feelings against Bellerophon in the breast of Jobates. The conclusion from all this is inevitable, namely, that alphabetic writing and no other is alluded to in the passage we have been considering. If alphabetic writing was unknown in the time of Homer, what manner of person must he have been? Certainly something more than human, for alone and unaided he composes two poems of about 30,000 verses, he fixes in them the foundations of the language, he observes with admirable accuracy the unity of design, and all this by the aid of his memory alone. Does not the vast number of historical and religious traditions of which his poems are the depository, the variety of knowledge of almost every kind which they more or less contain, the rich abundance of thought and imagery which they unfold, and on which every succeeding age has drawn for more than 2000 years, does not all this prove that Homer lived in an enlightened age? And yet how could that age have been an enlightened one unless acquainted with the use of alphabetic writing. Where is the difficulty or improbability of this supposition, when 500 years before Homer Cadmus brought letters into Greece? It may be stated still farther that the catalogue of the ships which forms the half of the second book of the Iliad, and in which are named the commanders of more than 1300 vessels, with their genealogies, their wives, their children, together with many cities and countries, must from the very nature of the case have been reduced to writing, and thus handed down to posterity; and, in order to compose it, access must have been had to the written memoirs of families. This same catalogue moreover was regarded as an historical document of such exactness and accuracy, that, according to Aristotle and Eustathius, it was often quoted in controversies that arose respecting the limits and boundaries of states. Surely such deference never would have been paid to it had it been handed down by oral communication. To have been regarded as authentic and worthy of reliance it must have been in writing. Thus much for the first question we proposed to consider. Besides Wood, many others have contended against the side which we have espoused. Wolf, a celebrated German critic, published in 1794 an edition of Homer with learned progomena, in which he maintains that the Iliad and Odyssey were not reduced to writing, though he admits that writing was used in Greece before the time of Homer; not, however, in the common affairs of life until the time of the Olympiads, but only in inscriptions. Of the same opinion was the illustrious Heyne. The second question which we propose to consider is a much more important one. Did Homer write all of the Iliad and Odyssey? Perrat and Hedelin (better known under the name of the Abbé d'Aubignac), seem to have been the first that started the question and maintained the negative. The latter writer, however, pushed the matter to an absurd extreme in maintaining that such a poet as Homer never existed, and that his name is merely synonymous with singer. A similar hypothesis, though less exaggerated, was maintained by an Italian critic, Gian-Battista Vico, who borrowed the idea from the learned Bentley. The most powerful advocate, however, for this side of the question is to be found in Wolf, who endeavours with rare and singular erudition in his prolegomena to Homer, to prove that the Iliad and Odyssey should be regarded as two collections of poems by various authors, and that only a part of each belong to Homer himself. He lays great stress upon the improbability of a single poet's ever having conceived the plan of two poems of such great length, when the common mode of reciting poetical productions in those days, namely, by detached portions, must have caused him to foresee that these two poems could never be chanted each from beginning to end at one and the same time. He endeavours likewise to show the impossibility of executing so vast a plan without the aid of writing; but this argument, after what has been advanced above, must be regarded as untenable. The hypothesis of Wolf, however, relies chiefly for support and confirmation upon the discrepancies which the German critic thinks he discovers between various parts of the Iliad and Odyssey. He calls in historical facts to the aid of this last position. The poems of Homer, brought into Greece by Lycurgus, were chanted in the latter country by rhapsodists, who wandered over the face of the land reciting, wherever they stopped, detached portions of these poems, and this species of division had no analogy with that which we at present know. The rhapsodists were accustomed to select certain parts which formed a complete action, and recite these by themselves; as, for example, "The pestilence of the Grecian Camp," "The dream of Agamemnon," &c. Under the Pisistratidæ, all these scattered fragments were collected together and united into two great poems. Such at least is the assertion of Cicero, although R. P. Knight remarks that Herodotus and Thucydides, Plato and Aristotle, who have so often spoken both of Homer as well as of Pisistratus and his sons, are entirely silent on this head. It is maintained, moreover, that from time to time these poems we retouched, arranged, added to, and continued, by the Diaseuastæ, who obtained their name from their employment; and that it was finally owing to the care of the Alexandrian grammarians in the third and fourth centuries A. C. that the poems in question owed the form they at present possess. Such is a brief outline of the theory of Wolf. He is opposed, however, by numerous authorities, both ancient and modern, and in particular by the well known remark of Aristotle that the Iliad and Odyssey are complete models of unity of design, as far as this could have been effected. The chief opponent of Wolf has been the Baron de Sainte-Croix. According to this writer, if there were the least foundation for the hypothesis of Wolf, we should certainly not find Lycurgus, Pisistratus, and his son Hipparchus, ascribing entire poems to Homer when others had been the authors of them. They were undoubtedly better qualified to judge of these matters than even the most sagacious critic of modern times, and supposing, after all, that they were deceived, is it likely that Aristotle, Crates, Aristophanes, Aristarchus, Longinus, in a word the most celebrated critics of antiquity, would fall into the same error? How could the Iliad have been written by many hands and yet the unity of the whole poem so admirably preserved? And what must have been the fertility of talent in that early age, when many poets could be found to bear each his part in the composition of a work which has baffled the imitation as much as it has excited the admiration and surprise of every succeeding age? If we reject, however, the hypothesis of Wolf, another remains which carries with it a more plausible appearance. Eustathius informs us that as early as the time of Aristophanes of Byzantium, doubts existed as to the authenticity of the last book of the Odyssey and a part of the preceding one. This grammarian believed that the Odyssey ended with the 296th verse of the 23d Book, and that all which followed was by a strange hand. His reason undoubtedly was because this last appeared unworthy of the poet. Thus, some good manuscripts have a mark at this part of the poem, indicating that what follows does not belong to the Odyssey. It must be confessed that there are very strong grounds for admitting this hypothesis. The fable of the Odyssey ends, in fact, at the moment when Ulysses regains possession of his palace and wife, and enjoys repose from his labours. The verses which precede the 296th terminate the poem, moreover, by one of those melancholy reflections, which, in the opinion of critics, ought to be found at the end of Epopees, in order to leave in the breast of the reader a feeling of sadness. But of all hypotheses the boldest is that of Bryant. M. Lechevalier having published his "Researches on the situation of ancient Troy, and on the scene of the Iliad in general," the learned English scholar favoured the world with his "Essay concerning the war of Troy and the expedition of the Grecians, described by Homer," in which he maintained the singular theory that Troy never existed, and that the expedition of the Greeks against that city is a mere fable. This hypothesis has fallen into well merited oblivion. The system of Wolf, already shaken by the arguments of Sainte-Croix, has found still more formidable antagonists in two of the countrymen of Bryant. One of these, Richard Payne Knight, in his learned prolegomena to Homer, appears to us to have set the question entirely at rest. The other, Granville Peun, undertakes to establish the unity of design in the Iliad, a ground which even Knight himself had abandoned as untenable. The reader is referred to his "Examination of the primary argument of the Iliad," in which he will find it ably maintained that the poem is to be taken as a whole, and that its primary and governing argument is "the sure and irresistible power of the divine will exemplified in the death and burial of Hector, by the instrumentality of Achilles, as the immediate preliminary to the destruction of Troy." The best editions of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey may, perhaps, be found to be Barnes, 2 vols. 4to. Cantab. 1711; that of Glasgow, 2 vols. fol. 1758; that of Berglerus, 2 vols. 12mo. The government, during his minority, was placed in the hands of the illustrious general Stilicho, whose daughter he married in 398. As his character opened he appeared ill adapted to his high station, addicted to puerile amusements, and void of talents. The revolt of the Goths and the invasion of Italy by Alaric so alarmed him that he fled to Liguria, and was for a time besieged in a town there by the Goths. Stilicho came to his relief, and by the defeat of Alaric, also freed Italy from present danger. After this he fixed his residence at Ravenna, and was completely governed by his ministers. He died of a dropsy in the 39th year of his age.] Under him and his brother the Roman power was divided into two different empires. The successors of Honorius, who fixed their residence at Rome, were called the emperors of the west, and the successors of Arcadius, who sat on the throne of Constantinople were distinguished by the name of emperors of the eastern Roman empire. This division of power proved fatal to both empires, and they soon looked upon one another with indifference, contempt, and jealousy.

HORATIA, the sister of the Horatii, killed by her brother for mourning the death of the Curatii. Cic. de Inv. 2, c. 20.

HORATIUS COCLES. vid. Cocles.—Q. FLACCUS, a celebrated poet, born at Venusia. His father was a freedman, and though poor in his circumstances, he liberally educated his son, and sent him to learn philosophy at Athens, after he had received the lessons of the best masters at Rome. Horace followed Brutus from Athens, and the timidity which he betrayed at the battle of Philippi so effectually discouraged him, that he forever abandoned the profession of arms; and at his return to Rome, applied himself to cultivate poetry. His rising talents claimed the attention of Virgil and Varius, who recommended him to the care of Mæcenas and Augustus, the most celebrated patrons of literature. Under the fostering patronage of the emperor and of his minister, Horace gave himself up to indolence and refined pleasure. He was a follower of Epicurus, and, while he liberally indulged his appetites, he neglected the calls of ambition, and never suffered himself to be carried away by the tide of popularity or public employments. He even refused to become secretary of Augustus, and the emperor was not offended at his refusal. He lived at the table of his illustrious patrons as if he were in his own house; and Augustus, while sitting at his meals with Virgil at his right hand and Horace at his left, often ridiculed the short breath of the former, and the watery eyes of the latter, by observing that he sat between tears and sighs, Ego sum inter suspiria & lacrymas. Horace was warm in his friendship, and, if ever any ill-judged reflection had caused offence, the poet immediately made every concession which could effect a reconciliation, and not destroy the good purposes of friendly society. Horace died in the 57th year of his age, B. C. 8. His gaiety was suitable to the liveliness and dissipation of a court: and his familiar intimacy with Mæcenas has induced some to believe that the death of Horace was violent, and that he hastened himself out of the world to accompany his friend. The 17th ode of his second book, which was written during the first illness of Mæcenas, is too serious to be considered as a poetical rhapsody or unmeaning effusion; and, indeed the poet survived the patron only three weeks, and ordered his bones to be buried near those of his friend. He left all his possessions to Augustus. The poetry of Horace, so much commended for its elegance and sweetness, is deservedly censured for the licentious expressions and indelicate thoughts which he too frequently introduces. In his odes he has imitated Pindar and Anacreon; and if he has confessed himself to be inferior to the former, he has shown that he bears the palm over the latter, by his more ingenious and refined sentiments, by the ease and melody of his expressions, and by the pleasing variety of his numbers. In his satires and epistles, Horace displays much wit, and much satirical humour, without much poetry; and his style, simple and unadorned, differs little from prosaic composition. In his art of poetry he has shown much taste and judgment, and has rendered in Latin hexameters, what Aristotle had, some ages before, delivered to his pupils in Greek prose; the poet gives judicious rules and useful precepts to the most powerful and opulent citizens of Rome, who, in the midst of peace and enjoyment, wished to cultivate poetry and court the muses. [vid. the end of this article.] The best editions of Horace will be found to be that of Basil, fol. 1580, illustrated by eighty commentators, and that of Baxter, improved by Gesner, and after him by Zeunius, Lips. 1815, in 8vo. A new edition of this last appeared in 1822, from the Leipsic press, edited by Böthe, which is in many respects superior to the old one. [The edition of Doering, Gotha, 1824, is, however, decidedly the best. It was reprinted at Glasgow in 1826, in one vol. 8vo. Much discussion has been elicited by the composition of Horace which is commonly styled his "Art of Poetry." Quintilian cites it by this title, and he is followed by many of the ancient grammarians and scholiasts; but this circumstance does not by any means prove that Horace himself gave it the name. It is well known how little the ancients cared for exactness in citations of this nature, which they regarded as of not the least importance. The opinions of commentators on the object which Horace had proposed to himself in publishing this work, may be arranged into three classes. The ancient grammarians and the first editors of the poet, believed it to have been the intention of Horace not to give a complete theory of the poetic art, but merely some detached precepts in relation to it. The scholiasts Acron and Porphyrio divided the poem into rules or sections, confessing at the same time that these divisions were defective as regards ed connection with each other. Lambinus, Julius Cæsar, Scaliger, and Gerard Vossius were of the same opinion. Daniel Heinsius and the President Bouhier were persuaded that it was the wish of Horace to give an abridgment of the Art of Poetry, and that the confusion which exists in his poem has been caused by the copyists. They have reported consequently to various transpositions in order to bring back the poem to its original state. Dacier believed that the work was left unfinished; while Hardouin, faithful to his general system, will not have Horace to be the author of it. A second class of commentators, on the other hand, perceive in this poem a complete theory of the poetic art, as well as the most perfect union between its several component parts. Among the defenders of this opinion, the ablest and most judicious is Regelsberger, who published, in 1797, a German translation of the work. A third class of commentators is composed of those who, acknowledging in the work neither plan nor unity, still suppose that there lies hid under it a particular intention, and that the object of it is restrained to some special idea. Baxter was the first who suspected that the poem in question was a satire directed against the Roman stage. His idea was developed and enlarged upon by Hurd, in his learned commentary, and also by Sanadon, who states that Horace expresses in this production the indignation with which certain bad poets of the day had inspired him. It has likewise been adopted by Engel, a German critic, who believes the particular end of the poem to have been a criticism of the poets and pretended connoisseurs of the day in general, and of the dramatic writers in particular. This hypothesis has been developed and modified with rare erudition, by Wieland. He is perhaps the first who divined the true relation which existed between the object of the poem and the young Piso, to whom it is addressed. According to him, it is a simple epistle, in which the poet, urged on perhaps in private by the request of a father who was dissatisfied with the direction which the studies of his son, destined for a brilliant career, had assumed, by his passing rapidly in succession from one object to another, displays to the young man's view the difficulties of poetry and the dangers resulting from giving ourselves up to its cultivation, unless we are directly qualified for the task. Colman, who published in 1783, in London, an edition of this poem, accompanied with notes, adopts the hypothesis of Wieland. He admits at the same time that the bent of the young Piso's mind carried him towards dramatic poetry. Ast, a German scholar, has advanced a third hypothesis. He believes that Horace in composing this piece had in view the Phædrus of Plato, and that, as in this dialogue the philosopher ridicules the rhetoricians, so Horace wished to indulge in raillery at the worthless poets of his time. Finally, de Bosch, in his notes to the Anthology, supposes that the poem was not actually addressed to a Piso, but that the poet made use of this name by way of prosopopeia.] *Suet. in Aug.—Ovid. In the first attack two of the Horatii were killed, and the only surviving brother, by joining artifice to valour, obtained an honourable trophy: by pretending to fly from the field of battle, he easily separated his antagonists, and, in attacking them one by one, he was enabled to conquer them all. As he returned victorious to Rome, his sister reproached him with the murder of one of the Curiatii, to whom she was promised in marriage. He was incensed at the rebuke, and killed his sister. This violence raised the indignation of the people; he was tried and capitally condemned. His eminent services, however, pleaded in his favour; the sentence of death was exchanged for a more moderate but more ignominious punishment, and he was only compelled to pass under the yoke. A trophy was raised in the Roman forum, on which he suspended the spoils of the conquered Curiatii. Cic. de Invent. 2, c. 26.—Liv. 1, c. 24, &c.—*Dionys. Q. HORTENSIVS, a celebrated orator, who began to distinguish himself by his eloquence in the Roman forum, at the age of nineteen. [He was born of a plebeian family A. In the contest between Marius and Sylla he remained neuter, and was one of the twenty questors established by Sylla A. U. 674. He afterwards obtained in succession the offices of ædile, prætor, and consul, the last of these A. U. 685. As an orator he for a long time balanced the reputation of Cicero, but, as his orations are lost, we can only judge of him by the account which his rival gives of his abilities. "Nature had given him," says Cicero in his Brutus, (c. 38,) "so happy a memory that he never had need of committing to writing any discourse which he had meditated, while after his opponent had finished speaking, he could recall word by word, not only what the other had said, but also the authorities which had been cited against himself. His industry was indefatigable. He never let a day pass without speaking in the forum, or preparing himself to appear on the morrow; oftentimes he did both. He excelled particularly in the art of dividing his subject, and in then reuniting it in a luminous manner, calling in at the same time even some of the arguments which had been urged against him. His diction was noble, elegant, and rich, his voice strong and pleasing, his gestures carefully studied. Thus far Cicero's account of him. It is very probable that much of his reputation was owing to the imposing nature of his forensic displays, since Cicero himself confesses that his orations when read were inferior to what they appeared when spoken, and Quintilian considers the praise which Cicero has bestowed upon them as greatly exceeding the true limit. It is very creditable to both Cicero and Hortensius that they became eventually and continued very warm friends.] Hortensius was very rich, and not less than 10,000 casks of Arvisian wine were found in his cellar after his death. Their empire ended with Attila. In the year 888, they had obtained a settlement in Pannonia, to which country they gave the name of Hungary. Some authors state that the rage of the ancient Huns were all cut off in the long war waged against them by Charlemagne, and that the country was afterwards peopled by the neighbouring nations, to whom the present Hungarians owe their origin.]

and Apollo. It continued for three days, during which time the grief of the people was so great for the death of Hyacinthus, that they did not adorn their hair with garlands during their festivals, nor eat bread, but fed only upon sweetmeats. They did not even sing paeans in honour of Apollo, or observe any of the solemnities which were usual at other sacrifices. On the second day of the festival, there were a number of different exhibitions. Youths, with their garments girt about them, entertained the spectators, by playing sometimes upon the flute or upon the harp, and by singing anapaestic songs, in loud-echoing voices, in honour of Apollo. Others passed across the theatre mounted upon horses richly adorned, and at the same time, choirs of young men came upon the stage singing their uncouth rustic songs, and accompanied by persons who danced at the sound of vocal and instrumental music, according to the ancient custom. Some virgins were also introduced in chariots of wood, covered at the top, and magnificently adorned. Others appear in race chariots. The city began then to be filled with joy, an immense number of victims were offered on the altars of Apollo, and the votaries liberally entertained their friends and slaves. During this latter part of the festivity, all were eager to be present at the games, and the city was almost desolate, and without inhabitants. Athen. 4.—*Ovid. HYANTIS, an ancient name of Bœotia.

HYAS, a son of Atlas, of Mauritania, by Æthra. His extreme fondness for shooting proved fatal to him, and in his attempts to rob a lioness of her whelps he was killed by the enraged animal. Some say that he died by the bite of a serpent, and others that he was killed by a wild boar. His sisters mourned his death with such constant lamentations, that Jupiter, in compassion of their sorrow, changed them into stars. [vid. Hyades.] Hygin. fab. 192.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 170.

HYBLA, [the name of three towns in Sicily; Hybla major, minor, and parva. The first was situate near the south of Mount Ætna, on a hill of the same name with the city; near it ran the river Simœthus. This was the Hybla so famous in antiquity for its honey and bees.—The second place was called also Hæra; it was situate in the southern part of Sicily, and is placed in the itinerary of Antonine, on the route from Agrigentum to Syracuse. On D'Anville's map it is north of Camerina. This is now Calata Girona.—The last place was a maritime one on the eastern coast of Sicily, below Syracuse. It was also denominated Galaotis, but more frequently Megara, whence the gulf to the south of it was called Megarensis sinus.] Paus. 5, c. 23.—Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Cic. Verr. 3, c. 43, l. 5, c. 25.—Sil. 14, v. 26.—Stat. 14, v. 201.

HYDARNES, one of the seven noble Persians who conspired to destroy the usurper Smerdis, &c. Herodot. 3 and 6.—Strab. 11.

HYDASPES, [a river of India, and one of the tributaries of the Indus. D'Anville makes it to be the modern Shautrou, Mannert, however, decides in favour of the Behut. Alexander crossed this river to give battle to Porus.]

HYDRA, a celebrated monster, which infested the neighbourhood of the lake Lerna in Peloponnesus. [vid. the end of this article.] It was the fruit of Echidna's union with Typhon. It had an hundred heads, according to Diodorus; fifty, according to Simonides; and nine, according to the more received opinion of Apollodorus, Hyginus, &c. As soon as one of these heads was cut off, two immediately grew up if the wound was not stopped by fire. It was one of the labours of Hercules to destroy this dreadful monster, and this he easily effected with the assistance of Iolaus, who applied a burning iron to the wounds as soon as one head was cut off. While Hercules was destroying the hydra, Juno, jealous of his glory, sent a sea-crab to bite his foot. This new enemy was soon despatched; and Juno, unable to succeed in her attempts to lessen the fame of Hercules, placed the crab among the constellations, where it is now called Cancer. The conqueror dipped his arrows in the gall of the hydra, and from that circumstance, all the wounds which he gave proved incurable and mortal. [This Hydra with many heads is said to have been only a multitude of serpents which infested the marshes of Lerna near Mycenæ, and which seemed to multiply as they were destroyed. Hercules, with the assistance of his companions, cleared the country of them, by burning the reeds in which they lodged. See also Dupuis's explanation in the remarks appended to the article Hercules.] Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Paus. 5, c. 17.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 69.—Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 61.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 276, l. 7, v. 658.

HYDRAOTES, [a tributary to the Indus. D'Anville takes it to be the modern Biah. Rennell, however, makes the Hyphasis the Biah; the Hydraotes appears to be the modern Rauwee.]

HYDROPHORIA, a festival observed at Athens, called απο του φορειν υδαρ, from carrying water. It was celebrated in commemoration of those who perished in the deluge of Deucalion and Ogyges.

HYDRUNTUM and HYDRUS, a city of Calabria, 50 miles south of Brundisium. As the distance from thence to Greece was only 60 miles, Pyrrhus, and afterwards Varro, Pompey's lieutenant, meditated the building here a bridge across the Adriatic. Though so favourably situated, Hydrus, now called Otranto, is but an insignificant town, scarce containing 3000 inhabitants. Plin. 3, c. 16.—Cic. 15, Att. 21, l. 16, ep. 5.—Lucan. 5, v. 375.

HYEMPSAL, a son of Micipsa, brother to Adherbal, murdered by Jugurtha, after the death of his father. [The more correct orthography is Hiempsal.] Sallust. de Jug. Bell.

HYGEIA or HYGIEA, the goddess of health, daughter of Æsculapius, held in great veneration among the ancients. Her statues represented her with a veil, and the matrons usually consecrated their locks to her. She was also represented on monuments as a young woman holding a serpent in one hand, and in the other a cup, out of which the serpent sometimes drank, [and sometimes twined around the whole body of the goddess.] According to some authors, Hygeia is the same as Minerva, who received that name from Pericles, who erected to her a statue, because in a dream she had told him the means of curing an architect, whose assistance he wanted to build a temple. Plut. in Pericl.—Paus. 1, c. 23.

C. JUL. HYGINUS, [one of the ancient grammarians. He is mentioned by Suetonius as a native of Spain, though some have supposed him an Alexandrian, and to have been brought to Rome after the capture of that city by Cæsar. He was appointed keeper of the Palatine library, and received pupils for instruction. He was intimately acquainted with Ovid and other literary characters of the day, and was said to be the imitator of Cornelius Alexander a Greek grammarian. He wrote the lives of illustrious men which are referred to by Aulus Gellius; a volume of examples; and a copious treatise on the cities of Italy. Other works have been attributed to him; but the only pieces that have come down to us are entitled, "Poeticon Astronomicon," "De mundi et spheræ ac utriusque partium Declaratione," and a book of fables. The best edition of this writer is that of Munker, in the Mythographi Latini, Amstel. 1681, 8vo.] His compositions have been greatly mutilated, and their incorrectness and their bad Latinity have induced some to suppose that they are spurious. Sueton. de Gram.

HYLAS, a son of Thiodamas, king of Mysia and Menodice, stolen way by Hercules, and carried on board the ship Argos to Colchis. On the Asiatic coast the Argonauts landed to take a supply of fresh water, and Hylas, following the example of his companions, went to the fountain with a pitcher, and fell into the water and was drowned. The poets have embellished this tragical story, by saying, that the nymphs of the river, enamoured of the beautiful Hylas, carried him away; and that Hercules, disconsolate at the loss of his favourite youth, filled the woods and mountains with his complaints, and at last abandoned the Argonautic expedition to go and seek him. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Hygin. fab. 14, 271.—Virg. Ecl. 6.—Propert. 1, el. 20.—A river of Bithynia. [It flows into the Sinus Cianus, near the town of Cius, and to the south-west of the lake Ascianus and the city of Nicæa. The inhabitants of Cius celebrated yearly a festival in honour of Hylas, who was carried off by the nymphs, as is above mentioned, in the neighbourhood of this river. The river was named after him. At this celebration it was usual to call with loud cries upon Hylas.] Plin. 5, c. 32.

HYLLUS, a son of Hercules and Dejanira, who, soon after his father's death, married Iole. He, as well as his father, was persecuted by the envy of Eurystheus, and obliged to fly from the Peloponnesus. The Athenians gave a kind reception to Hyllus and the rest of the Heraclidæ, and marched against Eurystheus. Hyllus obtained a victory over his enemies, and killed with his own hand Eurystheus, and sent his head to Alcmena.

his grandmother. Some time after he attempted to recover the Peloponnesus with the Heraclidæ, and was killed in single combat by Echemus, king of Arcadia. [*vid. It is mentioned by Homer, (Il. 20, v. 392.) Strabo states that it was named in his time Phrygius. Pliny calls it the Phryx, makes it distinct from the Hyllus, and adds that it gave name to the Phrygian nation, and separated Phrygia from Caria, all which is a manifest error on the part of the Roman writer.] Liv. 37, c. 38.—Herodot. 1, c. 180.

HYMÉNÆUS and HYMEN, the god of marriage among the Greeks, was son of Bacchus and Venus, or, according to others, of Apollo and one of the muses. Hymenæus, according to the more received opinions, was a young Athenian of extraordinary beauty, but ignoble origin. He became enamoured of the daughter of one of the richest and noblest of his countrymen, and, as the rank and elevation of his mistress removed him from her presence and conversation, he contented himself to follow her wherever she went. In a certain procession, in which all the matrons of Athens went to Eleusis, Hymenæus, to accompany his mistress, disguised himself in woman's clothes, and joined the religious troop. His youth, and the fairness of his features, favoured his disguise. A great part of the procession was seized by the sudden arrival of some pirates, and Hymenæus, who shared the captivity of his mistress, encouraged his female companions, and assassinated their ravishers while they were asleep. Immediately after this, Hymenæus repaired to Athens, and promised to restore to liberty the matrons who had been enslaved, provided he was allowed to marry one among them who was the object of his passion. The Athenians consented, and Hymenæus experienced so much felicity in his marriage state, that the people of Athens instituted festivals in his honour, and solemnly invoked him at their nuptials, as the Latins did their Thalassius. Hymen was generally represented as crowned with flowers, chiefly with marjoram or roses, and holding a burning torch in one hand, and in the other a vest of purple colour. It was supposed that he always attended at nuptials; for, if not, matrimonial connections were fatal, and ended in the most dreadful calamities; and people ran about, calling aloud, Hymen! Hymen! &c. Ovid. Medea. Met. 12, v. 215.—Virg. Æn. 1, &c.—Catull. ep. 62.

HYMETTUS, [a mountain of Attica, south-east of Athens, and celebrated for its excellent honey. According to Mr. Hobhouse, Hymettus approaches to within three miles of Athens, and is divided into two ranges; the first running from east-north-east to south-west, and the second forming an obtuse angle with the first, and having a direction from west-north-west to east-south-east. The first is called Trelo Vouni, the second Lambra

Vouni. The same writer states, that Hymettus is neither a high nor a picturesque mountain, but a flat ridge of bare rocks. The sides about half way up are covered with brown shrubs and heath, whose flowers scent the air with delicious perfume. The honey of Hymettus is still held in high repute at Athens, being distinguished by a superior flavour and a peculiar aromatic odour, which plants in this vicinity also possess. Hobhouse's Journey, vol. 1, p. 320.—Strab. 6.—Ital. 2, v. 228, l. 14, v. 200.—Plin. 36, c. 3.—Horat. 2, od. 18, v. 3, l. 2. Sat. 2, v. 15.—Cic. 2, fin. 34.

HYPERA or IPPEA, now [Berghi,] a town of Lydia, sacred to Venus, between Mount Tmolus and the Caystrus. Strab. 13.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 152.

HYPÂNIS, a river of European Scythia, now called Bog, which falls into the Borysthenes, [after a south-east course of about 400 miles,] and with it into the Euxine. Herodot. 4, c. 52, &c.—*Ovid. HYPATES, a river of Sicily, near Camarina. Ital. 14, v. 231.

HYPĀTA, a town of Thessaly, [on the Sperchius, west of Anticyra. It is now Neopatra.] Liv. 41, c. 25

HYPATIA, a native of Alexandria, celebrated for her beauty, her virtues, and her great erudition. She was assassinated 414 A. D.

HYPĒRĒBŌRĒI, [vid. the end of this article,] a nation in the northern parts of Europe and Asia, who were said to live to an incredible age, even to a thousand years, and in the enjoyment of all possible felicity. The sun was said to rise and set to them but once a year, and therefore perhaps they are placed by Virgil under the north pole. The word signifies people who inhabit beyond the wind Boreas. Thrace was the residence of Boreas, according to the ancients. Whenever the Hyperboreans made offerings they always sent them towards the south, and the people of Dodona were the first of the Greeks who received them. The word Hyperboreans is applied, in general, to all those who inhabit any cold climate. [The term Hyperborean has given rise to various opinions. Pelloutier makes the people in question to have been the Celtic tribes near the Alps and Danube. Pliny places them beyond the Rhipean Mountains and the N. E. wind, "ultra aquilonis intra." Mention is made of them in several passages of Pindar, and the scholiast on the 8th Olympic, v. 63, observes, ὡς ὑπερβορέους, ἔνθα ἰστέρος τὰς πηγὰς ἔχει, "to the Hyperboreans, where the Ister has its rise." Protarchus, who is quoted by Stephanus under the word "ὑπερβορέων," states that the Alps and Rhipean Mountains were the same, and that all the nations dwelling at the foot of this chain were called Hyperboreans. It would appear from these and other authorities that the term Hyperborean was applied by the ancient writers to every nation situated much to the north. But whence arise the highly coloured descriptions which the ancients have left us of these same Hyperboreans? It surely could not be that rude and barbarous tribes gave occasion to those beautiful pictures of human felicity on which the poet of former days delighted to dwell. "On sweet and fragrant herbs they feed, amid verdant and grassy pastures, and drink ambrosial dew, divine potation: all resplendent alike in cœveal youth, a placid serenity for ever smiles on their brows, and lightens in their eyes; the consequence of a just temperament of mind and disposition, both in the parents and in the sons, disposing them to do what is just, and to speak what is wise. Neither diseases nor wasting old age infest this holy people; but without labour, without war, they continue to live happily, and to escape the vengeance of the cruel Nemesis." Thus sang Orpheus and Pindar. If an opinion might be ventured it would be this, that all the tradition respecting the Hyperborean race, which are found scattered among the works of the ancient writers, point to an early and central seat of civilization, whence learning and the arts of social life diverged over the world. Shall we place this seat of primitive refinement in the North? But, it may be replied, the earliest historical accounts which we have of those regions, represent them as plunged in the deepest barbarism. The answer is an easy one. Ages of refinement may have rolled away, and been succeeded by ages of ignorance. Who will venture to deny that the northern regions of Europe must not at an early period have enjoyed a milder climate, when the vast quantities of amber found in the environs of the Baltic clearly show that the forests, now imbedded in the earth, in which amber is produced, could not have existed in that quarter, if a very elevated temperature had not prevailed. We will abandon, however, this argument, strong as it is, and pursue the inquiry on other and clearer grounds. The term Hyperborean means a nation or people who dwell beyond the wind Boreas. The name Boreas is properly applied by the Greeks to the wind which blows from the north-north-east, (vid. Schneider Lex. ad voc.) and is the same with the Aquilo of the Latins. Of this latter wind Pliny remarks, "stat inter Septentrionem et Ortum solstitialem," and Forcellini, (Lex. Tot. Lat.) observes that it is often confounded with, and mistaken for, the North. The term Hyperborei then, if we consider its true meaning, refers to a people dwelling far to the north-east of the Greeks, and will lead us at once to the plains of central Asia, the cradle of our race. Here it was that man existed in primeval virtue and happiness, and here were enjoyed those blessings of existence, the remembrance of which was carried by the various tribes that successively migrated from this common home, into every quarter of the earth. Hence it is that even among the Oriental nations so many traces are found of their origin being derived from some country to the north. Adelung has adopted the opinion which assigns central Asia as the original seat of the human species, and has mentioned a variety of considerations in support of it. He observes that the central plain of Asia being the highest region in the globe, must have been the first to emerge from the universal ocean, and therefore first became capable of affording a habitable dwelling to terrestrial animals and to the human species; hence, as the subsiding waters gradually gave up the lower regions to be the abode of life, they may have descended, and spread themselves successively over their new acquisitions. The desert of Kobi, which is the summit of the central steppe, is the most elevated ridge in the globe. From its vicinity the great rivers of Asia take their rise and flow towards the four cardinal points. The Selinga, the Ob, the Irthig, the Lena, and the Jenisei, send their water to the Frozen Ocean; the Iaik flows towards the setting sun; the Amu and Hoang-ho, and the Indus, Ganges, and Burrampooter, towards the east and south. On the declivities of these high lands are the plains of Thibet, lower than the frozen region of Kobi, where many fertile tracts are well fitted to become the early seat of animated nature. Here are formed not only the vine, the olive, rice, the legumina, and other plants, on which man has in all ages depended, in a great measure, for his sustenance, but all those animals run wild upon these mountains, which he has tamed and led with him over the whole earth, as the ox, the horse, the ass, the sheep, the goat, the camel, the hog, the dog, the cat, and even the gentle rein-deer, who accompanies him to the icy polar tracts. In Cashmere plants, animals, and men exist in the greatest physical perfection. A number of arguments are suggested in favour of this opinion. Baily has referred the origin of the arts and sciences, of astronomy and of the old lunar zodiac, as well as of the discovery of the planets to the most northerly tract of Asia. His attachment to Buffon's hypothesis of the central fire and the gradual refrigeration of the earth, has driven him indeed to the banks of the Frozen Ocean, but his arguments apply more naturally to the centre of Asia. In our Scriptures moreover the second origin of mankind is referred to a mountainous region eastward of Shinar, and the ancient books of the Hindoos fix the cradle of our race in the same quarter. The Hindoo paradise is on Mount Meru, which is on the confines of Cashmere and Thibet. vid. Müller's Universal History, vol. 1, p. 19, in notis.] Plin. 4, c. 12, l. 6, c. 17.—Mela, 3, c. 5.—*Virg. HYPERÆA and HYPERIA, a fountain of Thessaly, with a town of the same name. Strab. 9.—Another in Messenia, in Peloponnesus. Flav. 1, v. 375.

HYPERIDES, an Athenian orator, disciple to Plato and Socrates, and long the rival of Demosthenes. His father's name was Glau-cippus. He distinguished himself by his eloquence, and the active part he took in the management of the Athenian republic. After the unfortunate battle of Cranon, he was taken alive, and, that he might not be compelled to betray the secrets of his country, he cut off his tongue. He was put to death by order of Antipater, B. C. 322. Only one of his numerous orations remains, admired for the sweetness and elegance of its style.

It is said, that Hyperides once defended the courtezan Phryne, who was accused of impiety, and that, when he saw his eloquence ineffectual, he unveiled the bosom of his client, upon which her judges, influenced by the sight of her beauty, acquitted her. Plut.

HYPERION, a son of Cœlus and Terra, who married Thea, by whom he had Aurora, the sun and moon. Hyperion is often taken by the poets for the sun itself. [The meaning of the name is, "He who moves on high."
It is very remarkable that a term of precisely similar import, Ikare, is applied to the same luminary by the Iroquois of our own country.] Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 1, c. 1 and 2.

HYPERMNESTRA, one of the fifty daughters of Danaus, who married Lynceus, son of Ægyptus. She disobeyed her father's bloody commands, who had ordered her to murder her husband the first night of her nuptials, and suffered Lynceus to escape unhurt from the bridal bed. Her father summoned her to appear before a tribunal for her disobedience, but the people acquitted her, and Da-naus was reconciled to her and her husband, to whom he left his kingdom at his death.
Some say that Lynceus returned to Argos with an army, and that he conquered and put to death his father-in-law, and usurped his crown. vid. Danaides. Paus. 2, c. 19.—

[HYPHASIS, a tributary of the Indus, now the Caul. It was the limit of Alexander's conquests, and he erected altars on its banks in memory of his expedition.

HYPSA, now Belici, a river of Sicily, falling into the Crinusis, and then into the Mediterranean near Selinus. Ital. 14, v. 228.

HYPSICRATES, a Phœnician, who wrote an history of his country in the Phœnician language. This history was saved from the flames of Carthage, when that city was taken by Scipio, and translated into Greek.

HYPSPYLE, a queen of Lemnos, daughter of Thoas and Myrine. During her reign, Venus, whose altars had been universally slighted, punished the Lemnian women, and rendered their mouths and breath so extremely offensive to the smell, that their husbands abandoned them and gave themselves up to some female slaves whom they had taken in a war against Thrace. This contempt was highly resented by all the women of Lemnos, and they resolved on revenge, and all unanimously put to death their male relations:

Hypspyle alone excepted, who spared the life of her father Thoas. Soon after this cruel murder, the Argonauts landed at Lemnos, in their expedition to Colchis, and remained for some time in the island. During their stay the Argonauts rendered the Lem-nian women mothers, and Jason, the chief of
pregnant at his departure, and promised her eternal fidelity. Hypspyle brought forth twins, Euneus and Nebrophonus, whom some have called Deiphilus or Thoas. Jason forgot his vows and promises to Hypspyle, and the unfortunate queen was soon after forced to leave her kingdom by the Lemnian women, who conspired against her life, still mindful that Thoas had been preserved by means of his daughter. Hypspyle, in her flight, was seized by pirates, and sold to Lycurgus, king of Nemæa. She was intrusted with the care of Archemorus, the son of Lycurgus; and when the Argives marched against Thebes, they met Hypspyle, and obliged her to show them a fountain where they might quench their thirst. To do this more expeditiously, she laid down the child on the grass, and in her absence he was killed by a serpent. Lycurgus attempted to revenge the death of his son, but Hypspyle was screened from his resentment by Adrastus the leader of the Argives. *Ovid. Hero-ate to the south of the eastern part of the Caspian Sea. This country was mountainous, covered with forests and inaccessible to cavalry. It had a capital called Hyrcania, assumed the name of Japyges Messapii. It was situate in the interior of the country, between Tarentum and Brundisium. Strabo calls it Ouria, and the Latins Uria. It is now Dria.]

HYRIEUS and HYREUS, a peasant, or, some say, a prince of Tanagra, son of Neptune and Alcyone, who kindly entertained Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury, when travelling over Bœotia. Being childless, he asked of the gods to give him a son without his marrying, as he promised his wife, who was lately dead, and whom he tenderly loved, that he never would marry again. The gods, to reward the hospitality of Hyreus, made water in the hide of a bull, which had been sacrificed the day before to their divinity, and they ordered him to wrap it up and bury it in the ground for nine months. At the expiration of the nine months, Hyreus opened the earth, and found a beautiful child in the bull's hide, whom he called Orion. vid. Orion.

HYRTIUS, a Trojan of Mount Ida, father to Nisus, one of the companions of Æneas.

Virg. Æn. 9, v. 177 and 406. Hence the patronymic of Hyrtacides is applied to Nisus. It is also applied to Hippocoon. Id. 5, v. 492.

HYSIA, a town of Bœotia, built by Nycteus, Antiope's father.—A village of Argos.—A city of Arcadia.

HYSTASPES, a noble Persian, of the family of the Achæmenides. His father's name was Arsames. His son Darius reigned in Persia after the murder of the usurper Smerdis. It is said by Ctesias that he wished to be carried to see the royal monument which his son had built between two mountains. The priests who carried him, as reported, slipped the cord with which he was suspended in ascending the mountain, and he died of the fall. Darius is called Hystaspis, or, the son of Hystaspes, to distinguish him from his royal successors of the same name. Herodot. 1, c. 209, l. 5, c. 83.—Ctesias Fragm.

Met.* 4, 15.—Some suppose him to be a son of Ceres because in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries, the word Iacchus was frequently repeated. [They who make the Grecian mythology of Oriental origin, discover in the attributes of the Hindoo Deity Iswara a manifest resemblance to those of Bacchus. The attendants of Iswara were termed Iacchi, from whom he derived the name of Iaccheo, lord of the Iacchi, corrupted by the nations of the west into Iacchus. vid. remarks under the article Bacchus.] Herodot. 8, c. 65.—Paus. 1, c. 2.

IALYSUS, [a town of the island of Rhodes, 30 stadia from the city of Rhodes. Its vicinity to the capital proved so injurious to its growth that it became reduced in Strabo's time to a mere village.] It was built by Ialysus, of whom Protagenes was making a beautiful painting when Demetrius Poliorcetes took Rhodes. *Ovid. IAMBE, a servant maid of Metanira, wife of Celeus, king of Eleusis, who tried to exhilarate Ceres, when she travelled over Attica in quest of her daughter Proserpine. From the jokes and stories which she made use of, free and satirical verses have been called Iambics. [Some derive the name of Iambic verse from ιαμβίζειν, maledicere; this however is rather a derivation itself from ιαμβος. According to others, it comes from Iambe, a young female, who, having been severely attacked in some satirical verses, put an end to her existence. Archilochus is generally regarded as the inventor of Iambic measure.] Apollod. 1, c. 5.

IAMBLICUS, [an ancient philosopher, a native of Syria, and educated at Babylon. Upon Trajan's conquest of Assyria he was reduced to slavery, but, recovering his liberty, he afterwards flourished under the emperor Antoninus. His treatise in the Greek language, on the loves of Simonides and Rhodane, in 16 books, is said to have been lodged in MS. in the library of the Escurial, and to have been destroyed by fire in 1671. A fragment of it was preserved by Leo Allatius, accompanied with his own Latin version, in his selections from the MSS. of Greek rhetoricians and sophists, Rome, 1641, in 8vo.]—[A native of Chalcis in Syria, who flourished about the beginning of the fourth century. He was a disciple of Porphyry, and was eminently versed in the mysteries of the Plotinian system. These he taught with great success, and attracted to himself a large number of hearers. He commanded the reverence of his followers by high pretensions to theological powers, which he professed to receive by intercourse with invisible beings. He wrote various works, and among the rest, a life of Pythagoras interspersed with trifling and fabulous accounts of the actions of that philosopher, which some think was intended to be opposed to the miracles of our Saviour. The rest of his writings now extant are, "An exhortation to the study of philosophy," "Three Books on Mathematical learning," "A commentary upon Nicomachus," "A treatise upon the mysteries of the Egyptians," &c. The best edition of the last named work is that of Gale, Oxon. 1678, fol. and of the life of Pythagoras, that of Kuster, Amstel. 1707, 4to. Iamblichus was a great favourite with the emperor Julian, who ranked him equal with Plato. The style of Iamblichus is inaccurate and inelegant, and he borrows largely from others, especially Porphyry. He is supposed to have died A. D. 333.]

IAMIDÆ, certain prophets among the Greeks, descended from Iamus, a son of Apollo, who received the gift of prophecy from his father, which remained among his posterity. Paus. 6, c. 2.

JANICŪLUM and JANICULARIUS MONS, one of the seven hills at Rome, joined to the city by Ancus Martius, and made a kind of citadel, to protect the place against an invasion. This hill, (vid. Janus,) which was on the opposite shore of the Tiber, was joined to the city by the bridge Sublicius, the first ever built across that river, and perhaps in Italy. It was less inhabited than the other parts of the city, on account of the grossness of the air, though from its top, the eye could have a commanding view of the whole city. It is famous for the burial of king Numa and the poet Italicus. Porsenna, king of Etruria, pitched his camp on Mount Janiculum, and the senators took refuge there in the civil wars, to avoid the resentment of Octavius. [From its sparkling sands it got the name of Mons Auteus, corrupted into Montorius.] Liv. 1, c. 33, &c.—Dio. 47.—Ovid. 1, Fast. v. 246.—Virg. 8, v. 358.—Mart. 4, ep. 64, l. 7, ep. 16.

JANUS, the most ancient king who reigned in Italy. He was a native of Thessaly, and son of Apollo, according to some. He came to Italy, where he planted a colony and built a small town on the river Tiber, which he called Janiculum. Some authors make him son of Cœlus and Hecate; and others make him a native of Athens. During his reign, Saturn, driven from heaven by his son Jupiter, came to Italy, where Janus received him with much hospitality, and made him his colleague on the throne. Janus is represented with two faces, because he was acquainted with the past and the future; or, according to others, because he was taken for the sun who opens the day at his rising, and shuts it at his setting. [Some say that he was thus exhibited because, upon his sharing the kingdom with Saturn, he caused medals to be struck, having on one side a head with two faces, to denote that his power was divided between Saturn and himself, and that his dominions were to be governed by the counsels of both. Plutarch states as a reason for his being thus represented, that it was thereby intimated that this prince and his people had passed from a wild and rustic to a civilized life. The truth is, Janus was nothing more than a representation of the year, and the name appears to be a very good derivation for the Latin term annus.] Some statues represent Janus with four heads. He sometimes appeared with a beard, and sometimes without. In religious ceremonies, his name was always invoked the first, because he presides over all gates and avenues, and it is through him only that prayers can reach the immortal gods. From that circumstance he often appears with a key in his right hand, and a rod in his left. Sometimes he holds the number 300 in one hand, and in the other 65, to show that he presides over the year, of which the first month bears his name. Some suppose that he is the same as the world, or Cœlus; and from that circumstance, they call him Eanus, ab eundo, because of the revolution of the heavens. He was called by different names, such as Consivius a consvrendo, because he presided over generation; Quirinus or Martialis, because he presided over war. He is also called Patulcius & Clausius, because the gates of his temples were opened during the time of war, and shut in time of peace. He was chiefly worshipped among the Romans, where he had many temples, some erected to Janus Bifrons, others to Janus Quadrifrons. The temples of Quadrifrons were built with four equal sides, with a door and three windows on each side. The four doors were the emblems of the four seasons of the year, and the three windows in each of the sides the three months in each season, and all together, the twelve months of the year. Janus was generally represented in statues as a young man. After death Janus was ranked among the gods, for his popularity, and the civilization which he had introduced among the wild inhabitants of Italy. His temple, which was always open in times of war, was shut only three times during above 700 years, under Numa, 234 B. C. and under Augustus; and during that long period of time, the Romans were continually employed in war. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 65, &c.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 607.—Varro de L. L. 1.—*Macrob. JAPËTUS, a son of Cœlus or Titan, by Terra, who married Asia, or, according to others, Clymene, by whom he had Atlas, Menœtius, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. The Greeks looked upon him as the father of all mankind, and therefore from his antiquity old men were frequently called Japeti. His sons received the patronymic of Iapetionides. JAPÏDES, [a people of Dalmatia, who dwelt contiguous to Istria, under the range of Mount Albus, and whose country answers to a province of Croatia called Murlakia.] Liv. 43, c. 5.—Tibull. 4, v. 109.—Cic. Balb. 14.

JAPYGIA, [a division of Italy, forming what is called the heel. It was called also Messapia, and contained two nations, the Calabri on the north-east, and the Salentini on the south-west side. The country was so called from the Iapyges. These appear to have been a race of Illyrian origin, who in a very remote age settled along the entire coast of the Tarentine gulf, but who in after days were compelled to restrict themselves to narrower limits.] Plin. 3, c. 11.—Strab. 6.

JAPYX, a son of Dædalus, who conquered a part of Italy, which he called Iapygia. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 458.—A wind which blows from Apulia, and is favourable to such as sailed from Italy towards Greece. It was nearly the same as the Caurus of the Greeks. Horat. 1, od. 3, v. 4, l. 3, od. 7, v. 20.

JARBAS, a son of Jupiter and Garamantis king of Gætulia, from whom Dido bought land to build Carthage. He courted Dido, but the arrival of Æneas prevented his success, and the queen, rather than marry Jarbas, destroyed herself. vid. Dido. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 36, &c.—Justin. 18, c. 6.—*Ovid. JARCHAS and JARCHAS, a celebrated Indian philosopher. His seven rings were famous for their power of restoring old men to the bloom and vigour of youth, according to the traditions of Philostr. in Apoll.

JASIDES, a patronymic given to Palinurus as descended from a person of the name of Jasius. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 843.—Also of Jasius. Id. 12, v. 392.

JASION and IASIU, a son of Jupiter and Electra, one of the Atlantides, who reigned over part of Arcadia, where he diligently applied himself to agriculture. He married the goddess Cybele, or Ceres, and all the gods were present at the celebration of his nuptials. He had by Ceres two sons, Philomelus and Plutus, to whom some have added a third, Corybas, who introduced the worship and mysteries of his mother in Phrygia. He had also a daughter, whom he exposed as soon as born, saying that he would raise only male children. The child, who was suckled by a she-bear and preserved, rendered herself famous afterwards under the name of Atalanta. Jason was killed with a thunderbolt of Jupiter, and ranked among the gods after death, by the inhabitants of Arcadia. H. siod. Theog. 970.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 168.—Hygin. Poet. 2, c. 4.

IÄSIS, a name given to Atalanta, daughter of IASUS.

JÄSON, a celebrated hero, son of Alcimede, daughter of Phylacus, by Æson the son of Cretheus, and Tyro the daughter of Salmoneus. Tyro, before her connection with Cretheus the son of Æolus, had two sons, Pelias and Neleus by Neptune. Æson was king of Iolchos, and at his death the throne was usurped by Pelias, and Æson, the lawful successor, was driven to retirement and obscurity. The education of young Jason was intrusted to the care of the centaur Chiron, and he was removed from the presence of the usurper, who had been informed by an oracle that one of the descendants of Æolus would dethrone him. After he had made the most rapid progress in every branch of science, Jason left the centaur, and by his advice went to consult the oracle. He was ordered to go to Iolchos his native country, covered with the spoils of a leopard, and dressed in the garments of a Magnesian. In his journey he was stopped by the inundation of the river Evenus or Eupeus, over which he was carried by Juno, who had changed herself into an old woman. In crossing the streams he lost one of his sandals, and at his arrival at Iolchos, the singularity of his dress and the fairness of his complexion, attracted the notice of the people, and drew a crowd around him in the market-place. Pelias came to see him with the rest, and as he had been warned by the oracle to beware of a man who should appear at Iolchos with one foot bare and the other shod, the appearance of Jason, who had lost one of his sandals, alarmed him. His terrors were soon after augmented. Jason, accompanied by his friends, repaired to the palace of Pelias, and boldly demanded the kingdom which he had unjustly usurped. The boldness and popularity of Jason intimidated Pelias; he was unwilling to abdicate the crown, and yet he feared the resentment of his adversary. As Jason was young and ambitious of glory, Pelias, at once to remove his immediate claims to the crown, reminded him that Æetes king of Colchis had severely treated and inhumanly murdered their common relation Phryxus. He observed that such a treatment called aloud for punishment, and that the undertaking would be accompanied with much glory and fame. He farther added, that his old age had prevented him from avenging the death of Phryxus, and that if Jason would undertake the expedition, he would resign to him the crown of Iolchos when he returned victorious from Colchis. Jason readily accepted a proposal which seemed to promise such military fame. His intended expedition was made known in every part of Greece, and the youngest and bravest of the Greeks assembled to accompany him, and share his toils and glory. They embarked on board a ship called Argo, and after a series of adventures, they arrived at Colchis. (vid. Argonautæ.) Æetes promised to restore the golden fleece, which was the cause of the death of Phryxus, and of the voyage of the Argonauts, provided they submitted to his conditions. Jason was to tame bulls who breathed flames, and who had feet and horns of brass, and to plough with them a field sacred to Mars. After this he was to sow in the ground the teeth of a serpent from which armed men would rise, whose fury would be converted against him who ploughed the field. He was also to kill a monstrous dragon who watched night and day at the foot of the tree on which the golden fleece was suspended. All were concerned for the fate of the Argonauts; but Juno, who watched with an anxious eye over the safety of Jason, extricated them from all these difficulties. Medea, the king's daughter, fell in love with Jason, and as her knowledge of herbs, enchantments, and incantation was uncommon, she pledged herself to deliver her lover from all his dangers if he promised her eternal fidelity. Jason, not insensible to her charms and to her promise, vowed eternal fidelity in the temple of Hecate, and received from Medea whatever instruments and herbs could protect him against the approaching dangers. He appeared in the field of Mars, he tamed the fury of the oxen, ploughed the plain, and sowed the dragon's teeth. Immediately an army of men sprang from the field, and ran towards Jason. He threw a stone among them, and they fell one upon the other till all were totally destroyed. The vigilance of the dragon was lulled to sleep by the power of herbs, and Jason took from the tree the celebrated golden fleece, which was the sole object of his voyage. These actions were all performed in the presence of Æetes and his people, who were all equally astonished at the boldness and success of Jason. After this celebrated conquest, Jason immediately set sail for Europe with Medea, who had been so instrumental in his preservation. Upon this Æetes desirous to revenge the perfidy of his daughter Medea, sent his son Absyrtus to pursue the fugitives. Medea killed her brother, and strewed his limbs in her father's way, that she might more easily escape, while he was employed in collecting the mangled body of his son. (vid. Absyrtus.) The return of the Argonauts in Thessaly was celebrated with universal festivity; but Æson, Jason's father, was unable to attend on account of the infirmities of old age. This obstruction was removed, and Medea, at the request of her husband, restored Æson to the vigour and sprightliness of youth. (vid. Æson.) Pelias, the usurper of the crown of Iolchos, wished also to see himself restored to the flower of youth, and his daughters, persuaded by Medea, who wished to avenge her husband's wrongs, cut his body to pieces, and placed his limbs in a caldron of boiling water. Their credulity was severely punished. Medea suffered the flesh to be consumed to the bones, and Pelias was never restored to life. This inhuman action drew the resentment of the populace upon Medea, and she fled to Corinth with her husband Jason, where they lived in perfect union and love during ten successive years. Jason's partiality for Glauce, the daughter of the king of the country, afterwards disturbed their matrimonial happiness, and Medea was divorced that Jason might more freely indulge his amorous propensities. This infidelity was severely revenged by Medea, (vid. Glauce.) who destroyed her children in the presence of their father. (vid. Medea.) After his separation from Medea, Jason lived an unsettled and melancholy life. As he was one day reposing himself by the side of the ship which had carried him to Colchis, a beam fell upon his head, and he was crushed to death. This tragical event had been predicted to him before by Medea, according to the relation of some authors. Some say that he afterwards returned to Colchis, where he seized the kingdom, and reigned in great security. Eurip. in Med.—*Ovid. JASONIDÆ, a patronymic of Thoas and Euneus, sons of Jason and Hypsipyle.

IASSUS, [a city of Asia Minor, situate on a small island very near the coast of Caria, and giving to the adjacent bay the name of Sinus Iassius. It was a rich and flourishing city, and the inhabitants were chiefly occupied with fisheries along the adjacent coasts. It is now in ruins, though many vestiges remain of it. The name of the place is Askem-Calesi. Plin. 5, c. 28.—Liv. 32, c. 33, l. 37, c. 17.]

IAXARTES, [a large river of Asia, rising in the chain of Mons Imaus, and flowing into the Sea of Aral, after a course of 1682 English miles. It is now the Syr-Daria. The Greeks confounded this river with the Tanais in the time of Alexander, partly out of flattery to that monarch, and partly from an ignorance of its true course. Even Ptolemy, in a later age, makes it flow into the Caspian. He was unacquainted with the existence of the Sea of Aral. Herodotus is thought to allude to this sea when he speaks of the Araxes, with the exception of a single branch, losing itself amid bogs and marshes.] Curt. 6 and 7.—Plin. 6, c. 16.—Arrian. 4, c. 15.

IAZIGES, [a people of Scythia. Of these there were the lazyges Mæotæ, who occupied the northern coast of the Palus Mæotis; the lazyges Metanastæ, who inhabited the angular territory formed by the Tibiscus, the Danube, and Dacia: they lived in the vicinity of Dacia, and are called by Pliny, Sarmates. The Iazyges Basili, or Royal, were a people of Sarmatia, joined by Strabo, to the lazyges on the coast of the Euxine, between the Tyras and the Borysthenes. Ptolemy speaks only of the Metanastæ, who were probably the most considerable of the three. The territory of this latter people, was, towards the decline of the empire, occupied by the Vandals, and afterwards became a part of the empire of the Goths. About the year 350 they were expelled by the Huns. It has since formed a part of Hungary, and of the Bannat of Temeswar.] Tacit. A. 12, c. 29.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 191.—Pont. 4, el. 7, v. 9.

IBERIA, [a country of Asia, bounded on the west by Colchis, on the north by Mount Caucasus, on the east by Albania, and on the south by Armenia. It answers now to Imeriti and Georgia. The name of Imeriti is an evident derivation from the ancient one; Georgia is called by the Russians Grusia, and by the Persians Gurgistan. According to some modern authors, who derive the name from the river Kur, the country ought rather to be called Korgia, or Kurgia.] Pompey invaded it, and made great slaughter of the inhabitants, and obliged them to surrender by setting fire to the woods where they had fled for safety. *Plut. in Luc. [IBERI, a powerful nation of Spain, situate along the Iberus, and who, mingling with Celtic tribes, took the name of Celtiberi. They are thought to have come originally from Iberia in Asia.]

IBERUS, [one of the largest rivers in Spain. It rises among the Cantabri, near the town of Juliobriga, and flows with a south-eastern course into the Mediterranean Sea. The chain of Mons Idubeda, along which it runs for a great part of its course, prevents it from taking a western course along with the other rivers of Spain. It is now the Ebro, and is in general very rapid and unfit for navigation, being full of rocks and shoals. This river was made the boundary between the Carthaginian and Roman possessions in this country after the close of the first Punic war. Lucan. 4, v. 335.—Plin. 3, c. 3.—Horat. 4, od. 14, v. 50.]—[A river of Iberia in Asia, flowing from Mount Caucasus into the Cyrus, probably the modern Iora.] Strab. 3.

IBIS, a poem of the poet Callimachus, in which he bitterly satirizes the ingratitude of his pupil the poet Apollonius. Ovid has also written a poem which bears the same name, and which, in the same satirical language, seems, according to the opinion of some, to inveigh bitterly against Hyginus, the supposed hero of the composition. Suidas.

IBYCUS, a lyric poet of Rhegium about 540 years before Christ. He was murdered by robbers, and at the moment of death he implored the assistance of some cranes which at that moment flew over his head. Some time after as the murderers were in the market-place, one of them observed some cranes in the air, and said to his companions, αἱ τιτανὸν ἐκδικοῦσι τὰ φόνον, there are the birds that are avengers of the death of Ibycus. These words, and the recent murder of Ibycus, raised suspicions in the people: the assassins were seized and tortured, and they confessed their guilt. Cic. Tusc. 4, c. 43.—Ælian. V. H.—The husband of Chloris, whom Horace ridicules, 3 od. 15.

ICARIA, a small island in the Ægean Sea, between Chios, Samos, and Myconus, where the body of Icarus was thrown by the waves, and buried by Hercules. [This island was deserted in Strabo's time, as it is said to be at the present day. Its modern name is Ni-caria.] Ptol. 5, c. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 10 and 14.

ICARIS and ICARIOTIS, a name given to Penelope as daughter of Icarus.

ICARIUM MARE, [a part of the Ægean Sea near the islands of Mycone and Gyaros. The ancient mythologists deduce the name from Icarus who fell into it and was drowned. Bochart, however, says that this part of the Ægean was so called from the isle Icaria or Icaure, which in the Phœnician tongue signifies fishy.]

ICARIUS, an Athenian, father of Erigone. He gave wine to some peasants who drank it with the greatest avidity, ignorant of its intoxicating nature. They were soon deprived of their reason, and the fury and resentment of their friends and neighbours were immediately turned upon Icarus, who perished by their hands. After death he was honoured with public festivals, and his daughter was led to discover the place of his burial by means of his faithful dog Mœra. Erigone hung herself in despair, and was changed into a constellation called Virgo. Icarus was changed into the star Bootes, and the dog Mœra into the star Canis. Hygin. fab. 130.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.—A son of Cœbalus of Lacedæmon. He gave his daughter Penelope in marriage to Ulysses king of Ithaca, but he was so tenderly attached to her, that he wished her husband to settle at Lacedæmon. Ulysses refused, and when he saw the earnest petitions of Icarus, he told Penelope, as they were going to embark, that she might choose freely either to follow him to Ithaca, or to remain with her father. Penelope blushed in the deepest silence, and covered her head with her veil. Icarus upon this permitted his daughter to go to Ithaca, and immediately erected a temple to the goddess of modesty, on the spot where Penelope had covered her blushes with her veil. Homer. Od. 16, v. 435.

ICARUS, a son of Dædalus, who, with his father, fled with wings from Crete to escape the resentment of Minos. His flight being too high proved fatal to him, the sun melted the wax which cemented his wings, and he fell into that part of the Ægean Sea which was called after his name. [Icarus and Dædalus, in escaping from the pursuit of Minos are thought to have elevated their cloaks on oars and thus used them as sails, whence the fable of wings. The son is imagined to have exercised less skill than the father in the management of his bark, and in consequence to have been wrecked on the coast of Icaria. But, vid. Icaria.] (vid. Dædalus.) Ovid. Met. 8, v. 178, &c.—A mountain of Attica.

ICÆLOS, one of the sons of Somnus, who changed himself into all sorts of animals, whence the name (ικελος, similis.) Ovid. Met. 11, v. 640.

ICENI, [a people of Britain, north of the Trinobantes. They inhabited what answers now to the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon. This nation is called by several different names, as Simeni by Ptolemy, Cenimagni by Cæsar, &c. They at first submitted to the Roman power, but afterwards revolting in the reign of Claudius, were defeated in a great battle by Ostorius Scapula, the second Roman governor of Britain, A. D. 50, and reduced to a state of subjection. They again revolted under the command of the famous Boadicea, but were entirely defeated with great slaughter by Suetonius Paulinus, A. D. 61, and totally subjugated. Their capital was Venta Icenorum, now Caister, about three miles from Norwich.] Tacit. Ann. 12, e. 31.—Cæs. G. 5, c. 21.

ICHTHYOPHAGI, a people of Æthiopia, [along the coast of the Sinus Arabicus,] who received this name from their eating fishes. C. 261, that forbade any man to oppose or interrupt a tribune while he was speaking in an assembly. Liv. 2, c. 58.—A tribune who signalized himself by his inveterate enmity against the Roman senate. management of affairs after the murder of Virginia, &c.

ICIUS, [vid. Itius Portus.]

ICONIUM, [the capital city of Lycaonia, now Koniak. It is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, 13, 51. The city derived its name, according to the ancients, from a small image (εικονιον) of Medusa, erected here by Perseus. In accordance with this idea, Stephanus Byzantinus asserts, that the name should be written in Greek with a diphthong ii, and we do in fact find it so written in Eustathius and in the Byzantine historians, as well as on medals.] Plin. 5, c. 27.

ICULISMA, a town of Gaul, now Angoulesme, on the Charante.

IDA, a nymph of Crete who went into Phrygia, where she gave her name to a mountain of that country. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 177. —A celebrated mountain, or more properly a ridge of mountains in Troas, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Troy. [Damm derives the name from idun, to see, a derivation which has reference to the view which this mountain affords of the circumjacent country. "That which the ancient geographers called Ida," observes Mr. Hobhouse, "is a chain of hills extending north-north-east from Baba, or Lectum, and divided into several ridges, two summits of which overlook the whole sloping country towards Tenedos." Gargarus, which is mentioned by Homer, seems to have been a height of Ida, the roots of which formed the promontory of Lectum.] The abundance of its waters became the source of many rivers, and particularly of the Simois, Scamander, Æsepus, Granicus, &c. It was on Mount Ida that the shepherd Paris adjudged the prize of beauty to the goddess Venus. It was covered with green woods, and the elevation of its top opened a fine extensive view of the Hellespont and the adjacent countries, from which reason the poets say that it was frequented by the gods during the Trojan war. Strab. 13.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—*Homer. IDÆA, the surname of Cybele, because she was worshipped on Mount Ida. Lucret. 2, v. 611.

IDÆIUS, the country round Mount Ida. Lycan. 3, v. 204.

IDALIUM, a mountain of Cyprus, at the foot of which is Idalium, a town with a grove sacred to Venus, who was called Idalæa. [In this grove, according to some, Adonis was killed. Idalium appears to have been situate to the north-west of the promontory Pedalium. "We think," says D'Anville, "that we discover Idalium, as well by the pleasantness of its situation, as by the analogous name of Dalim."] Virg. Æn. 1, v. 685.—Catull. 37 and 62.—Propert. 2, el. 13.

IDAS, a son of Aphareus and Arane, famous for his valour and military glory. He was among the Argonauts, and married Marpessa, the daughter of Evenus, king of Ætolia. Marpessa was carried away by Apollo, and Idas pursued his wife's ravisher with bows and arrows, and obliged him to restore her. (vid. Marpessa.) According to Apollodorus, Idas with his brother Lynceus associated with Pollux and Castor to carry away some flocks; but when they had obtained a sufficient quantity of plunder, they refused to divide it into equal shares. This provoked the sons of Leda: Lynceus was killed by Castor, and Idas, to revenge his brother's death, immediately killed Castor, and in his turn perished by the hand of Pollux. According to Ovid and Pausanias, the quarrel between the sons of Leda and those of Aphareus arose from a more tender cause: Idas and Lynceus, as they say, were going to celebrate their nuptials with Phœbe and Hilaria the two daughters of Leucippus; but Castor and Pollux, who had been invited to partake the common festivity, offered violence to the brides, and carried them away. Idas and Lynceus fell in the attempt to recover their wives. Homer. Il. 9.—Hygin. fab. 14, 100, &c.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 700.—Apollod. 1 and 3.—Paus. 4, c. 2, and 1. 5, c. 18.

IDISTAVISUS, a plain where Germanicus defeated Arminius. [The name appears to have some affinity to the German word wiese, signifying a meadow. Mannert supposes the field of battle to have been on the east of the Weser, south of the city of Minden. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 3, p. 85.]—Tacit. A. 2, c. 16.

IDMON, son of Apollo and Asteria, or, as some say, of Cyrene, was the prophet of the Argonauts. He was killed in hunting a wild boar in Bithynia, where his body received a magnificent funeral. He had predicted the time and manner of his death. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Orpheus.

IDOMENEUS, succeeded his father Deucalion on the throne of Crete, and accompanied the Greeks to the Trojan war with a fleet of 90 ships. During this celebrated war, he rendered himself famous by his valour, and slaughtered many of the enemy. At his return he made a vow to Neptune, in a dangerous tempest, that if he escaped from the fury of the seas and storms he would offer to the god whatever living creature first presented itself to his eye on the Cretan shore. This was no other than his son, who came to congratulate his father upon his safe return. Idomeneus performed his promise to the god, and the inhumanity and rashness of his sacrifice rendered him so odious in the eyes of his subjects, that he left Crete, and migrated in quest of a settlement. He came to Italy, and founded a city on the coast of Calabria, which he called Salentum. He died in an extreme old age, after he had had the satisfaction of seeing his new kingdom flourish, and his subjects happy. According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophron, v. 1217, Idomeneus, during his absence in the Trojan war, intrusted the management of his kingdom to Leucos, to whom he promised his daughter Clisithere in marriage at his return. Leucos at first governed with moderation; but he was persuaded by Naupilus, king of Eubœa, to put to death Meda, the wife of his master, with her daughter Clisithere, and to seize the kingdom. After these violent measures, he strengthened himself on the throne of Crete; and Idomeneus, at his return, found it impossible to expel the usurper. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 358.—Hygin. 92.—*Homer. IDŪME and IDŪMĒA, [a country of Asia on the confines of Palestine and Arabia, or rather comprehending parts of each, having Egypt on the west and Arabia Petrea on the south and east. Its extent varied at different periods of time. Esau or Edom, from whom it derived its name, and his descendants, settled along the mountains of Seir on the east and south of the Dead Sea, from whence they spread themselves by degrees through the western part of Arabia Petrea, and quite to the Mediterranean. In the time of Moses, Joshua, and even of the Jewish kings, they were hemmed in by the Dead Sea on one side, and the Sinus Ælanitis on the other; but during the Jewish captivity they advanced farther north into Judea, and spread themselves as far as Hebron in the tribe of Judah, till at length, going over to the religion of the Jews, they became incorporated with them as one nation. Strabo divides it into Eastern and Southern Idumœa, with reference to its situation from Palestine. The capital of the former was Bozra, or Bossra, and of the latter, Petra, or Jactael. Idumœa was famed for its palm-trees. In general, however, the country was hot, dry, mountainous, and in some parts barren. It is now inhabited by some tribes of wild Arabs. vid. Arabicus Sinus, and Erythræum Mare.] Lucan. 3, v. 216.—Sil. 5, v. 609.—Virg. G. 3, v. 12.

in the adjacent plain. Jericho was the first city of Canaan taken by Joshua, who destroyed it. A new city was afterwards built by Hiel of Bethel, but it would seem that before the time of Hiel there was another Jericho built near the site of the old.] Plin. 5, c. 14.—Strab.

IERNE, [one of the ancient names of Ireland. Pytheas, who, to his own personal acquaintance with this quarter of the globe, added much information respecting it which he had obtained from the early inhabitants of Gadez, in Spain, is the first who calls Ireland by the name of Ierne, (ἡ Ἰερνυ.) From Aristotle, a contemporary of his, we learn that what are now England and Ireland were then denominated Βρετανίας νησοί. In Cæsar's Commentaries a change of appellation appears. England is there styled Britannia, and Ireland, Hibernia. The idea very naturally suggests itself, that Cæsar may have given this name to the latter island of his own accord, for the purpose of denoting the severity of its climate, and that the meaning of the term is nothing more than Winter-land. Such a supposition, however, although it may wear a plausible appearance, seems to have no foundation whatever in fact. It is more than probable that Cæsar gives the name as he heard it from others, without associating with it any idea of cold. He merely places the island to the west of Britain. It was Strabo who made it lie far to the north, and, in consequence of this error, first gave rise to the opinion, if any such were ever in reality entertained, that the climate of Ireland was cold and rigorous. But a question here presents itself, whether Ierne or Hibernia be the true ancient appellation of this island. The latter we believe will, on examination, appear entitled to the preference. It is more than probable that Pytheas received the name Ierne from the mouths of the neighbouring nations, contracted from Hibernia. This supposition would approach to certainty, if we possessed any means of substantiating as a fact, that the appellation Hiberni, which is given to the inhabitants of the island, was used in the old accounts respecting it, and not first introduced by so late a writer as Avienus. A strong argument may be deduced, however, from what appears to have been the ancient pronunciation of the word Hibernia. The consonant b may have been softened down so as to resemble ou in sound, a change far from uncommon; and hence Hibernia would be pronounced as if written Iouegria, whence Ierne may very easily have been formed. In a similar way, the true pronunciation of Albion may have been Alouevr. The modern name Erin, which is sometimes applied to Ireland, is an evident derivative from Ierne, if not itself the ancient Erse root of that term. Ireland was known at a very early period to the ancient mariners of southern Europe, by the appellation of the Holy Island. This remarkable title leads to the suspicion that the primitive seat of the Druidical system of worship may have been in Ireland. Cæsar, it is true, found Druids in Gaul, but he states at the same time that they were always sent to complete their religious education in Britain, and we will perceive, if we compare later authorities, that the sanctuary of the Druids was not in Britain itself, but in the island of Anglesæa, between which and the adjacent coast of Ireland the distance across is only 35 miles. Had the Romans extended their enquiries on this subject to Ireland itself, we would evidently have received such accounts from them as would have substantiated what has just been advanced. As regards the early population of this island, it may, we believe, be safely assumed as a fact, that the northern half of the country was peopled by the Scoti; not only because in later years we find Scoti in this quarter as well as on the isle of Man, but because even at the present day the Erse language is not completely obliterated in some of the northern provinces. The southern half of the island seems to have had a Celtic population. It is a very curious fact, however, that the names of many places in ancient Ireland, as given by Ptolemy, bear no resemblance whatever either to Scottish or Celtic appellations. This has given rise to various theories, and in particular to one which favours the idea of migrations from the Spanish peninsula. Tacitus considers the Silures in Britain as of Spanish origin, but this supposition is merely grounded on an accidental resemblance in some national customs. Enquiries have been made in modern days into the Basque language, which is supposed to contain traces of the ancient Iberian, but no analogy has been discovered between it and the modern Irish. The Roman arms never reached Ireland, although merchants of that nation often visited its coasts. From the accounts of the latter Ptolemy obtained materials for his map of this island. It is worthy of remark that this geographer does not name a single place in northern Scotland, whereas in the same quarter of the sister island he mentions as many as 10 cities, one of them of considerable size, and three others of the number, situate on the coast. Is not this a proof that Ireland at this early period had attained a considerable degree of civilization? A barbarous people never found cities on the coast. In addition to what has thus far been remarked, it may be stated, that Herodotus was equally ignorant of Ireland and Britain. Eratosthenes gives a general and rude outline of the latter, but knew nothing of the former. Strabo had some knowledge, though very imperfect, of both. Pliny's information with regard to both Britain and Ireland greatly surpasses that of his predecessors. Diodorus Siculus calls the latter Iris or Irin, and copies a foolish story of the natives being cannibals.] Strab. 1.

IGNATIUS, [one of the apostolical fathers, and bishop of Antioch in Syria, towards the latter part of the first and the beginning of the second century of the Christian era. According to Eusebius and St. Jerome, he succeeded Euodius in the see of Antioch, having been ordained, says the former, in the year 69, after the death of Peter and Paul at Rome, or, as others say, by Peter himself; and hence we may conclude that he was acquainted with several of the apostles. Indeed St. Chrysostom says that he conversed familiarly with them, and was perfectly acquainted with their doctrine.] He was torn to pieces in the amphitheatre at Rome by lions, during a persecution, A. D. 107. [in the reign of Trajan.] His writings were letters to the Ephesians, Romans, &c. and he supported the divinity of Christ, and the propriety of the episcopal order. The best edition of his works is that of Oxon, in 8vo 1708.

The situation of this place near the foot of the Pyrenees, exposed it incessantly to the horrors of war, from the time that the Romans began to penetrate into Spain. It was celebrated for the resistance it made against Cæsar, under the lieutenants of Pompey, Afranius, and Petreius, who were, however, finally defeated. In the reign of Gallienus it was almost entirely destroyed by the barbarians, who, migrating from Germany, ravaged the western parts of the empire. ILIA, or RHEA, a daughter of Numitor, king of Alba, consecrated by her uncle Amulius to the service of Vesta, which required perpetual chastity that she might not become a mother to dispossess him of his crown. He was, however, disappointed; violence was offered to Ilia, and she brought forth Romulus and Remus, who drove the usurper from his throne, and restored the crown to their grandfather Numitor, its lawful possessor.

Iliā was buried alive by Amulius, for violating the laws of Vesta; and because her tomb was near the Tiber, some suppose that she married the god of that river. [But vid. Roma.] Horat. 1, od. 2.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 277.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 598.—A wife of Sylla.

ILLIACI LUDI, games instituted by Augustus, in commemoration of the victory he had obtained over Antony and Cleopatra. They are supposed to be the same as the Trojani ludi and the Actia; and Virgil says they were celebrated by Æneas, not only because they were instituted at the time when he wrote his poem, but because he wished to compliment Augustus, by making the founder of Lavinium solemnize games on the very spot which was many centuries after to be immortalized by the trophies of his patron. During these games were exhibited horse-races and gymnastic exercises. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 280.

ILLIÆDES, a surname given to Romulus, as son of Iliā. Ovid.—A name given to the Trojan women. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 484.

ILIÆS, a celebrated poem composed by Homer, upon the Trojan war. It delineates the wrath of Achilles, and all the calamities which befel the Greeks, from the refusal of that hero to appear in the field of battle. It finishes with the burial of Hector, whom Achilles had slain to avenge his friend Patroclus. It is divided into 24 books. [Modern critics differ very much in opinion with regard to the proper termination of the Iliad. Wolf and Heyne, with others, think that there is an excess of two books, and that the death of Hector is the true end of the poem. The 23d and 24th books, therefore, they consider as the work of another author. Granville Penn, however, has shown very conclusively, that the poem is to be taken as a whole, and that its primary and governing argument is the sure and irresistible power of the divine will over the most resolute and determined will of man, exemplified in the death and burial of Hector, by the instrumentality of Achilles, as the immediate preliminary to the destruction of Troy. vid. remarks under the article Homer.]—A surname of Minerva, from a temple which she had at Daullis in Phocis.

ILITHYIA, a goddess, called also Juno Lucina. Some suppose her to be the same as Diana. She presided over the travails of women; and in her temple, at Rome, it was usual to carry a small piece of money as an offering. This custom was first established by Servius Tullius, who, by enforcing it, was enabled to know the exact number of the Roman people. [This is not correct. It was in the temple of Libitina.] Horat. carm. sæcul.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 293.

ILLYRICUM, ILLYRIJS, and ILLYRIA, a country bordering on the Adriatic Sea, opposite Italy, whose boundaries have been different at different times. [It was wholly contained between the rivers Naro or Narentes and Drilo. Some authors, among whom are Pliny and Ptolemy, extend the limits of this country so as to include Liburnia and Dalmatia. D'Anville has assigned to Illyricum the whole country between Istria and the small river Arsia, as far as the mouth of the Drilo, but he observes that the Illyric nations extended much farther. They spread themselves at a very early period along the eastern coast of Italy, to the south of the Padus or Po, in which quarter traces of them were found even in the time of the Romans. They were very famous for their early acquaintance with, and subsequent skill in, navigation; and the light Liburnian galleys aided not a little in securing to Augustus the victory at Actium. Illyricum answers now in part to modern Albania.] It became a Roman province after Gentius its king had been conquered by the prætor Anicius. Strab. 2 and 7.—Paus. 4, c. 35.—Meta, 2, c. 2, &c.—Flor. 1, 2, &c.

ILUS, the 4th king of Troy, was son of Tros by Callirhoe. He married Eurydice the daughter of Adrastus, by whom he had Themis, who married Capys, and Laomedon the father of Priam. He built, or rather embellished, the city of Ilium, called also Troy, from his father Tros. Jupiter gave him the Palladium, a celebrated statue of Minerva, and promised that as long as it remained in Troy, so long would the town remain impregnable. When the temple of Minerva was in flames, Ilius rushed into the middle of the fire to save the Palladium, for which action he was deprived of his sight by the goddess, though he recovered it some time after. *Homer. IMÆUS, [the name of a large chain of mountains, which in a part of its course divided, according to the ancients, the vast region of Scythia into Scythia intra Imaum and Scythia extra Imaum. It is, in fact, merely a continuation of the great Tauric range. That part of the Tauric chain over which Alexander crossed, and whence the Indus springs, was called Paropamisus. Farther on were the Emodi Montes, giving rise to the Ganges; and still farther to the east the range of Imaus, extending to the eastern ocean. Imaus is generally thought to answer to the Himalah mountains of Thibet; strictly speaking, however, this name belongs to the Emodi Montes, and Imaus, in the early part of its course, is the modern Mustag, or the chain which branches off to the northwest from the centre of the Himalah range. All the names by which this chain is distinguished are derived from the Sanscrit term Hem, signifying snow. Hence have arisen the names Imaus and Emodus among the ancients, and Himalah, Hinadri, Himachal, and Himalaya, among the moderns. This old Indian root also brings to mind the Hemus of Thrace, the Hymettus of Attica, the Mons Imæus of Italy, and the different mountains called Himmel, in Saxony, Jutland, and other countries. It is the radix, also, of the German word himmel, denoting heaven. As the chain of Imaus proceeds on to the east, it ceases to be characterised as snowy, and, in separating the region of Scythia into its two divisions, answers to the modern range of Altai. The highest summit in the Himalah chain, is Dwalagheri, or, the white mountain. It is only of late that the height of the Himalah mountains on the north of India has been appreciated. In 1802 Col. Crawford made some measurements, which gave a much greater altitude to those mountains than had ever before been suspected; and Col. Colebrook, from the plains of Rhoilicund, made a series of observations, which gave a height of 22,000 feet. Lieut. Webb, in his journey to the source of the Ganges, executed measurements on the peak of Iamnavatari, which gave upwards of 25,000 feet. The same officer, in a subsequent journey, confirmed his former observations. This conclusion was objected to on account of a difference of opinion on the allowance which ought to be made for the deviation of the light from a straight direction, on which all conclusions drawn from the measurement of angles must depend. In a subsequent journey, however, this same officer confirmed his conclusions by additional measurements, and by observing the fall of the mercury in the barometer, at those heights which he himself visited. It was found by these last observations that the line of perpetual snow does not begin till at least 17,000 feet above the level of the sea, and that the banks of the Setledge at an elevation of nearly 15,000 feet, afforded pasturage for cattle and yielded excellent crops of mountain wheat. This mild temperature, however, at so great a height, is confined to the northern side of the chain. This probably depends on the greater height of the whole territory on the northern side, in consequence of which, the heat which the earth receives from the solar rays, and which warms the air immediately superincumbent, is not so much expanded by the time the ascending air reaches these greater elevations, as in that which has ascended from a much lower country. Mr. Frazer, in a later journey, inferred that the loftiest peaks of the Himalah range varied from 13,600 to 23,000 feet. But he had no instruments for measuring altitudes, and no barometer, and he probably did not make the due allowance for the extraordinary height of the snow line. Thus the Himalah mountains far exceed the Andes in elevation; Chimborazo, the highest of the latter, being only 21,470 feet above the level of the sea, while Dwalagheri is 26,862 feet high, and Iamootri, 25,500.] Plin. 6, c. 17.—Strab. 1.

INĀCHUS, a son of Oceanus and Tethys, father of Io, and also of Phoroneus and Ægialeus. He founded the kingdom of Argos, and was succeeded by Phoroneus, B. C. 1807, and gave his name to a river of Argos, of which he became the tutelary deity. He reigned 60 years. [Inachus, very probably, is a Greek form for the Oriental term Enak, denoting great, powerful, and this last is perhaps the root of the Greek ναξ, a king. INDIA, [an extensive country of Asia, divided by Ptolemy and the ancient geographers into India intra Gangem, and India extra Gangem, or India on this side, and India beyond the Ganges. The first division answers to the modern Hindoostan; the latter to the Birman Empir., and the dominions of Pegu, Siam, Laos, Cambodia, Cochin China, Tonquin, and Malacca. India took its name among the ancients from the Indus, which formed its western boundary. Herodotus is the first Greek writer who makes mention of this country, but he derived his information from the Persians, who at that time knew little of it themselves, and his account is consequently full of fables and incorrect statements. In a subsequent age Darius invaded India, and seems to have penetrated beyond the Indus, as far as what is now Little Thibet. Alexander ventured no farther than the Hyphasis. Seleucus Nicator penetrated even to Palimbothra, and in his reign and that of his successor, a friendly intercourse seems to have subsisted between the Greek and Indian princes. The rise of the Parthian power destroyed this, and cut off all communication. The Romans knew little of the country, yet their power was so universally dreaded, that the Indians paid homage by their ambassador to the emperors Antoninus, Trajan, &c. India has been known to every period of geography since the age of Herodotus. The writings of the father of history, those of Strabo, of Pliny, and of Ptolemy, exhibit the knowledge which the Greeks and Romans possessed of India, or, to speak more accurately, their acquaintance with its sea-coast, and with the banks of the Indus and the Ganges. The Sanscrit names for India are Djambou-Dwyp, or the "peninsula of the tree of life;" Midhiami, or "the middle dwelling;" and Bharatkand, or "the kingdom of the Bharat dynasty." The country is too extensive to have received one general name in the indigenous languages. But from the river which waters its western boundary, having the name of Sind or Hind, which, like the name Nyl-Ab, is derived from its blue colour, the adjoining country received among the Persians the name of Hindoostan, and the inhabitants were called Hindoos. From the Persian language these names passed into the Syrian, Chaldee, and Hebrew: they were imitated in the appellations given by the Greeks and Romans, but in the writings of the Indians, the name Sindhoostan denotes exclusively the countries on the river Sind. The oriental writers subsequent to the Mahometan era have admitted a distinction between the name Sindh, taken in the acceptation now mentioned, and Hindh, which they apply to the countries situated on the Ganges. This application of terms is equally foreign to the national geography of the Indians, with the appellation of Gentoos, which the English used to apply to the Hindoos, and which comes from the Portuguese term Gentios, signifying Gentiles or Pagans.] Diod. 1.—Strab. 1, &c.—Mela, 3, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 28.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Justin. 1, c. 2, l. 12, c. 7.

INDUS, [a celebrated river of India, falling after a course of 1300 miles, into the Indian Ocean. The sources of this river have not yet been fully explored. Its commencement is fixed, by the most probable conjecture, in the northern declivity of the Cailas branch of the Himalah mountains, about lat. 31° 30' N. and long. 80° 30' E. within a few miles of the source of the Selledge, and in a territory under the dominion of China. Its name in Sanscrit is Sindh or Hindh, an appellation which it receives from its blue colour. Under the name Sindus it was known even to the Romans, besides its more common appellation of Indus. In Lat. 28° 28', the Indus is joined by five rivers, the Hydaspes or Behat, the Acesines or Jenauh, the Hydraotes or Ravei, the Hyphasis or Biah, and the Xaradrus or Selledge. These five rivers have given to the province which they water the name of Pendjab, signifying in Persian the five rivers, and they come united in one stream, called the Punjnud. The longest of the five is the Selledge. The Hydaspes is the Behat of Abul Fazel, but many modern geographers term it the Ilyum. The Selledge is the Hesudrus of Pliny, the Zaradrus of Ptolemy, and the Saranges of Arrian; it is the largest river within the Himalah range between the Indus and the Burrom-pooter. The union of all the five rivers into one, before they reach the Indus, was a point in geography maintained by Ptolemy; but, owing to the obscurity of modern accounts, promoted by the splittings of the Indus, and the frequent approximation of streams running in parallel courses, we had been taught to correct this as a specimen of that author's deficiency of information, till very recent and more minute enquiries have re-established that questioned point, and, along with it, the merited credit of the ancient geographer. The Punjnud, previous to uniting with the Indus, flows parallel to it for 70 miles. The mouths of the Indus, Ptolemy makes seven in number, Mannert gives them as follows, commencing on the west: Sagapa now the river Pilty, Sinthos now the Darranay, Aureum Ostium now the Ritchel, Chariphus now the Fel-

ty, Sapara, Sabala, and Lonibare, of which three last he professes to know nothing with certainty. According, however, to other and more recent authorities, the Indus enters the sea in one volume, the lateral streams being absorbed by the sand without reaching the ocean. It gives off an easterly branch called the Fullaler, but this returns its waters to the Indus at a lower point, forming in its circuit the island on which Hydrabad stands. Alexander stopped on the banks of the Hyphasis, his wearied and discouraged troops refusing to proceed. Here he erected altars in memory of his progress, and descending the Indus, returned to Babylon.] *Cic. N. D. 2, c. 52.—Strab. 15.—Curt. 8, c. 9.—Diod. 2.—Ovid. INFERUM MARE, [vid. Tyrrenum Mare.]

INO, a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, who nursed Bacchus. She married Athamas, king of Thebes, after he had divorced Nephele, by whom he had two children, Phryxus and Helle. Ino became mother of Melicerta and Learchus, and soon conceived an implacable hatred against the children of Nephele because they were to ascend the throne in preference to her own. Phryxus and Helle were informed of Ino's machinations, and they escaped to Colchis on a golden ram. [vid. Phryxus.] Juno, jealous of Ino's prosperity, resolved to disturb her peace; and more particularly, because she was one of the descendants of her greatest enemy, Venus. Tisiphone was sent, by order of the goddess, to the house of Athamas, and she filled the whole palace with such fury, that Athamas, taking Ino to be a lioness, and her children whelps, pursued her, and dashed her son Learchus against a wall. Ino escaped from the fury of her husband, and from a high rock she threw herself into the sea, with Melicerta in her arms. The gods pitied her fate, and Neptune made her a sea-deity, which was afterwards called Leucothoe. Melicerta became also a sea-god, known by the name of Palæmon. *Homer. Od. 5.—Cic. Tusc. de Nat. INŌA, festivals in memory of Ino, celebrated yearly with sports and sacrifices at Corinth. An anniversary sacrifice was also offered to Ino at Megara, where she was first worshipped under the name of Leucothoe.—Another in Laconia, in honour of the same. It was usual at the celebration to throw cakes of flour into a pond, which, if they sunk, were presages of prosperity; but if they swam on the surface of the waters, they were inauspicious and very unlucky.

INŌPUS, a river of Delos, which the inhabitants supposed to be the Nile coming from Egypt under the sea. It was near its banks that Apollo and Diana were born. Plin. 2, c. 103.—Flacc. 5, v. 105.—Strab. 6.—Paus. 2, c. 4.

INSŪBRES, the inhabitants of Insubria, a country near the Po, supposed to be of Gallic origin. They were conquered by the Romans, and their country became a province, where the modern towns of Milan and Pavia were built. Strab. 5.—Tacit. A. 11, c. 23.—Plin. 3, c. 17.—Liv. 5, c. 34.—Ptol. 3, c. 1.

INTAPHERNES, one of the seven Persian noblemen who conspired against Smerdis who usurped the crown of Persia. He was so disappointed for not obtaining the crown, that he fomented seditions against Darius who had been raised to the throne after the death of the usurper. When the king had ordered him and all his family to be put to death, his wife, by frequently visiting the palace, excited the compassion of Darius, who pardoned her, and permitted her to redeem from death any one of her relations whom she pleased. She obtained her brother; and when the king expressed his astonishment, because she preferred him to her husband and children, she replied that she could procure another husband, and children likewise; but that she could never have another brother, as her father and mother were dead. Intaphernes was put to death. Herodot. 3.

INTEMELIUM, a town at the west of Liguria, on the sea-shore. Cic. Div. 8, c. 14.

INTERAMNA, an ancient city of Umbria, the birth-place of the historian Tacitus, and of the emperor of the same name. It is situate between two branches of the Nar, (inter amnes) whence its name. Varro L. L. 4, c. 5.—Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 64.—A colony on the confines of Samnium, on the Liris.

INTERREX, a supreme magistrate at Rome, who was entrusted with the care of the government after the death of a king, till the election of another. This office was exercised by the senators alone, and none continued in power longer than five days, or, according to Plutarch, only 12 hours. The first interrex mentioned in Roman history, was after the death of Romulus, when the Romans quarrelled with the Sabines concerning the choice of a king. [An interrex was often chosen under the Republic, when from contention between the patricians and plebeians, or any other cause, the comitia for electing magistrates could not be held in due time or before the end of the year. He was chosen by the patricians out of their own number, and his authority continued for 5 days, after which another was created to succeed him, and so on in succession new interreges were created every 5 days, till consuls were elected. The comitia were hardly ever held by the first interrex, sometimes by the second, sometimes by the third, and sometimes not even till the eleventh.] Liv. 1, c. 17.—Dionys. 2, c. 5.

INŪI CASTRUM. (vid. Castrum Inui.) It received its name from Inuus, a divinity supposed to be the same as the Faunus of the Latins, and worshipped in this city.

IO, daughter of Inachus, or, according to others, of Jasus or Pirenes, was priestess to Juno at Argos. Jupiter became enamoured of her; but Juno, jealous of his intrigues, discovered the object of his affection, and surprised him in the company of Io, though he had shrouded himself in all the obscurity of clouds and thick mists. Jupiter changed his mistress into a beautiful heifer; and the goddess, who well knew the fraud, obtained from her husband the animal, whose beauty she had condescended to recommend. Juno commanded the hundred-eyed Argus to watch the heifer; but Jupiter, anxious for the situation of Io, sent Mercury to destroy Argus, and to restore her to liberty. [vid. Argus.] Io, freed from the vigilance of Argus, was now persecuted by Juno; who sent one of the furies, or rather a malicious insect, to torment her. She wandered over the greatest part of the earth, and crossed over the sea, till at last she stopped on the banks of the Nile, still exposed to the unceasing torments of Juno's insect. Here she entreated Jupiter to restore her to her ancient form; and when the god had changed her from an heifer into a woman she brought forth Epaphus. Afterwards she married Telegonus king of Egypt, or Osiris, according to others, and she treated her subjects with such mildness and humanity, that, after death, she received divine honours, and was worshipped under the name of Isis. According to Herodotus, Io was carried away by Phœnician merchants, who wished to make reprisals for Europa, who had been stolen from them by the Greeks. She is sometimes called Phoronis, from her brother Phoroneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 748.—Paus. 1, c. 25, l. 3, c. 13.—Moschus.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 789.—Hygin. fab. 145.

IOBATES and JOBATES, a king of Lycia, father of Stenobæa, the wife of Prætus, king of Argos. He was succeeded on the throne by Bellerophon, to whom she had given one of his daughters, called Philonoe, in marriage. [vid. Bellerophon, Pelasgi, and remarks under the article Homerus.] Apollod. 2, c. 2.—Hygin. fab. 57.

JOCATA, a daughter of Menœceus, who married Laius, king of Thebes, by whom she had Œdipus. She afterwards married her son Œdipus, without knowing who he was, and had by him Eteocles, Polynices, &c. [vid. Laius, Œdipus.] When she discovered that she had married her own son, and had been guilty of incest, she hanged herself in despair. She is called Epicasta by some mythologists. *Stat. IOLATA, a festival at Thebes, the same as that called Heracleia. It was instituted in honour of Hercules, and his friend Iolas who assisted him in conquering the hydra. It continued during several days, on the first of which were offered solemn sacrifices. The next day horse-races and athletic exercises were exhibited. The following day was set apart for wrestling; the victors were crowned with garlands of myrtle, generally used at funeral solemnities. They were sometimes rewarded with tripods of brass. The place where the exercises were exhibited was called Iolaion, where there were to be seen the monument of Amphitryon, and the cenotaph of Iolas, who was buried in Sardinia. These monuments were strewed with garlands and flowers on the day of the festival.

IOLAS or IOLÆUS, a son of Iphiclus, king of Thessaly, who assisted Hercules in conquering the Hydra, and burnt with a hot iron the place where the heads had been cut off, to prevent the growth of others. [vid. Hydra.] He was restored to his youth and vigour by Hebe, at the request of his friend Hercules. Some time afterwards, Iolas assisted the Heraclidæ against Eurysthenes, and killed the tyrant with his own hand. According to Plutarch, Iolas had a monument in Bœotia and Phocis, where lovers used to go and bind themselves by the most solemn oaths of fidelity, considering the place as sacred to love and friendship. According to Diodorus and Pausanias, Iolas died and was buried in Sardinia, where he had gone to make a settlement at the head of the sons of Hercules by the fifty daughters of Thespius. *Ovid. IOLCHOS, [a town of Thessaly in the district of Magnesia, at the head of the Pelasgicus Sinus, and north-east of Demetrias. It was situate about seven stadia from the sea, on an eminence, and was the birth-place of Jason. The poets make the ship Argo to have set sail from Iolchos; this, however, must either be understood as referring in fact to Aphetæ, or else by Iolchos they mean the adjacent coast which, according to Strabo, was likewise called by that name. Strabo reckons this city in the number of those which were destroyed in order to people the town of Demetrias.] It was founded by Cretheus, son of Æolus and Enaretta. Paus. 4, c. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Lucan. 3, v. 192.

IOLÉ, a daughter of Eurytus, king of Œchalia. Her father promised her in marriage to Hercules, but he refused to perform his engagements, and Iole was carried away by force. [vid. Eurytus.] It was to extinguish the love of Hercules for Iole that Dejanira sent him the poisoned tunic which caused his death. [vid. Hercules and Dejanira.] After the death of Hercules, Iole married his son Hyllus, by Dejanira. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 279.

ION, [vid. Iones,] a tragic poet of Chios, whose tragedies, when represented at Athens, met with universal applause. He is mentioned and greatly commended by Aristophanes and Athenæus, &c. Athen. 10, &c.—A native of Ephesus, introduced in Plato's dialogues as reasoning with Socrates.

IÖNES, [one of the main original races of Greece. According to the relation of Coron, Hellen, the son of Deucalion, had three sons, Eolus, Dorus, and Xuthus. He made the first his successor in the kingdom which he had established between the Asopus and Enipeus. The inhabitants of the country were from him denominated Eolians. Dorus, the second brother, by order of his father, put himself at the head of a colony, and built at the foot of Parnassus the cities of Boëon, Cyteneon, and Erinea, to which Strabo adds the city of Pindus, these four cities forming the Doric Tetrapolis. Xuthus, the remaining brother, turned his eyes elsewhere. He was the founder of the Attic Tetrapolis, composed of the cities of Oenoe, Marathon, Probalinthus, and Tricorythus. He married Creusa, daughter of Eretheus, and became the father of Achæus and Ion. The elder of these, obliged to quit home on account of a murder he had committed, passed into the Peloponnesus, then called Apia, established himself in Laconia, and gave name to the Achæans. Ion, after the death of his maternal grandfather, was declared king of Attica, which country thereupon took the name of Ionia. Thus far Conon. But, according to another and more commonly received account, Ion did not succeed Eretheus, whose crown devolved on Cecrops. On the contrary, he led an Attic colony into the Peloponnesus, where they settled between Elis and Sicyonia. He was afterwards recalled to Athens, routed the Thracians under Eumolpus, was invested with a share of the government and gave his name to the Athenians. The Ionians from the Peloponnesus returned to Attica in the reign of Melanthus, being expelled, according to some, by the Heraclidæ, and, after the death of Codrus, they passed into Asia Minor. Nileus and Androclus, the younger sons of Codrus, were the leaders of this emigration, being dissatisfied probably with the change of government at home. They took with them, besides the Ionians from Peloponnesus, many refugees, and inhabitants of Attica, who complained that Attica was too limited and barren to support its increasing population. Both these accounts are unsatisfactory, and open to objection. We have already given what appears a more probable account of the early movements of the Grecian tribes, under the article Græcia. It remains only to make a few observations relative to the Ionians. The Grecian race was divided into two branches, the Hellenes in the north, and the Ionians in the south. In Bœotia their respective confines met. The Ionians were the first who made any progress in civilization, and seem to have been indebted for it to the Pelasgi who had settled among them. The Hellenes attained to civilization much later than their brethren of the south, and were wandering about in their native forests long after the latter had begun to direct their attention to the arts of social life. It is not true that Ion gave his name to the Ionians. They were called Iones long before his time: it was their original appellation. In the first place, we may be sure that no people, even in the earliest ages, ever changed a previous name for the purpose of assuming one derived from that of some prince or leader. The probability is that the exact reverse was the case. In the next place, the old Athenian traditions contradict the accounts we have just been considering. According to them, Ion was a son of Apollo, and Xuthus an Achæan and son of Æolus. The meaning of this evidently is that Xuthus, an Æolian, came to Athens with a band of Achæans, and that he took with him a body of Ionians from Attica, together with his own forces, in order to obtain settlements in Peloponnesus. He established himself in Ægialia, the northern coast of the peninsula, but did not extend his authority over a large part of the country, founding merely the city of Helice: and yet all the other cities along this coast, to which the power of Ion never reached, and whither, in fact, neither he nor his followers ever came, are acknowledged by all the Grecian writers to have been Ionian, and of the same race with the Athenians. But the strongest argument against the theory that we are combating, and the clearest proof in favour of the position that the Ionians existed as a nation long before the time when the Hellenes began to send out colonies into southern Greece, and consequently long before the time when Xuthus's son Ion existed, if indeed he were not in truth a mere fabled personage, is to be found in the Cynurii, a branch of the original inhabitants of Argolis in the Peloponnesus. Herodotus styles them Autocthonous and likewise Ionians. Among their brethren, the other Argives who dwell in the level country, the intermingling with Pelasgi, Danaïdes, and finally Achæi, had nearly effaced the original peculiarity of character and dialect: it remained, on the other hand, pure and uncorrupted among the Cynurii, who had been driven by successive invaders to the mountains in the western and southern parts of Argolis, so that in historical ages they were still known as Ionians. Of the other communities which occupied the Peloponnesus, the Arcadians, Elians, Laconians, we are told indeed by no one that they were of Ionian origin. And yet we know with certainty that the Arcadians, according to their own acknowledgment, were a native race, not a people who had emigrated into southern Greece. In Elis we find none other than Grecian inhabitants; in Laconia it is true the Leleges settled, but then by the side of them we find a Grecian race. All these existed before the Hellenes were heard of; they must therefore belong to a stock of whose existence no one knows anything, or they must be Ionians. As regards the origin of the name Ionians, it must be confessed that little certainty exists. It is generally thought to come from the Hebrew Iavan, or (if pronounced with the quiescent Vau) Ion; and in like manner the Hellenes are thought to be the same with Eliša, in the sacred writings, more especially their country Hellas. Hence Borchart makes Iavan, the son of Iaphet, the ancestor of the Iones. They who favour such etymologies should first determine whether the Hebrew is to be regarded as the primitive language or not; since, if the latter be the case, the names that are given in Hebrew Scripture to the early rulers and leaders in the family of Noah, are mere translations from the primitive tongue, and certainly can form no sure basis for the erection even of the slightest superstructure of etymology.]

IONIA, a country of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Æolia, on the west by the Ægean and Icarian seas, on the south by Caria, and on the east by Lydia and part of Caria. [It extended from Phocæa in the north to Miletus in the south, while its greatest breadth scarcely exceeded 40 miles.] It was founded by colonies from Greece, and particularly Attica, by the Ionians, or subjects of Ion. Ionia was divided into 12 small states, which formed a celebrated confederacy, often mentioned by the ancients. These twelve states were, Priene, Miletus, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Ephesus, Lebedos, Teos, Phocæa, Erythræ, Smyrna, and the capitals of Samos, and Chios. The inhabitants of Ionia built a temple, which they called Pan-Ionium, from the concourse of people that flocked there from every part of Ionia. [This was a place of general meeting, and was situate on Mount Mycale, near Priene.] After they had enjoyed for some time their freedom and independence, they were made tributary to the power of Lydia by Cræsus. The Athenians assisted them to shake off the slavery of the Asiatic monarchs; but they soon forgot their duty and relation to their mother country, and joined Xerxes when he invaded Greece, They were delivered from the Persian yoke by Alexander, and restored to their original independence. They were reduced by the Romans under the dictator Sylla. [Sylla treated them, together with the other Asiatic cities, with great severity, on account of the murder of so many thousand Romans, whom they had inhumanly put to death in compliance with the orders of Mithridates: Ephesus was treated with the greatest rigour, Sylla having suffered his soldiers to live there at discretion, and obliged the inhabitants to pay every officer 50 drachmæ, and every soldier 16 denarii a day. The whole sum which the revolted cities of Asia paid Sylla, was 20,000 talents, near 4 millions sterling. This was a most fatal blow, from which they never recovered.] Ionia has been always celebrated for the salubrity of the climate, the fruitfulness of the ground, and the genius of its inhabitants. Herodot. 1, c. 6 and 28.—Strab. 14.—Mela. 1, c. 2, &c.—Paus. 7, c. 1.—An ancient name given to Hellas, or Achaia, because it was for some time the residence of the Ionians.

IONUM MARE, a part of the Mediterranean, at the bottom of the Adriatic, lying between Sicily and Greece. That part of the Ægean Sea which lies on the coasts of Ionia, in Asia, is called the sea of Ionia, and not the Ionian Sea. According to some authors, the Ionian Sea receives its name from Io, who swam across there, after she had been metamorphosed into a heifer. [The statements of the ancient writers respecting the situation and extent of the Ionian Sea are very fluctuating and uncertain. Scylax makes it the same with the Adriatic; and he may be correct in so doing, since, according to Herodotus, the true and ancient name of the Adriatic was the Ionian Gulph. This last appellation was probably owing to the circumstance of its having been made known to the rest of the Greeks through the commerce carried on here by the Asiatic Ionians. Both the Adriatic and Ionian Gulph end, according to Scylax, at the straits near Hydruntum. Of the Ionian Sea he says nothing; Herodotus, however, makes it extend as far south as the Peloponnesus. Thucydides keeps up the distinction just alluded to, calling the Adriatic by the name of the Ionian Gulph, (being probably as ignorant as Herodotus of any other appellation for this arm of the sea,) and styling the rest as far as the western coast of Greece, the Ionian Sea. In later time a change of appellation took place. The limits of the Adriatic were extended as far as the southern coast of Italy and the western shores of Greece, and the Ionian Gulph was considered to be now only a part of it. (Strabo 2, p. 185.) Eustathius asserts that the more accurate writers of his day maintained this distinction. (ad Dionys. Perieg. v. 92.) Hence the remark of Ptolemy is rendered intelligible, who makes the Adriatic Sea extend along the whole western coast of Greece down to the southernmost extremity of the Peloponnesus.] Strab. 7, &c.—Dionys. Perieg.

IÖPE and JOPPA, [now Jaffa, a city of Palestine, situate on the coast, north-west of Jerusalem, and south of Cæsarea. According to tradition and fable, it was one of the most ancient cities in the world. Report says that it was built before the deluge: that here reigned Cepheus, the father of Andromeda; and the rock to which his daughter was chained, and from which she was delivered by Perseus, was shown here, together with the ribs of the sea-monster which would have devoured her. The history probably refers to a vessel of considerable bulk which ravaged the coast, and being driven on shore by a superior force, was here wrecked, and the country delivered from the exactions of the corsair or pirate who commanded it.]

JORDĀNES, [a famous river of Palestine, which, according to some, had its source in the lake of Phiala, about 10 miles north of Cæsarea of Samachon. This origin of the river was ascertained by Philip the tetrarch, who made the experiment of throwing some chaff or straw into the lake, which came out where the river emerges from the ground, after having run about 120 furlongs beneath the surface of the earth. Mannert deems this story fabulous, and makes the river rise in Mount Paneas. The Talmudists say that the Jordan rises out of the cave of Paneas. They assert moreover that Leshem is Paneas. Leshem was subdued by the Danites, and Jeroboam placed one of his golden calves in Dan, which is at the springs of Jordan. Josephus says that the springs of Jordan rise from under the temple of the golden calf. Possibly this temple might stand on a hill, so convenient and proper for such an edifice, that the temple of Augustus was afterwards built upon it. The course of the Jordan is mostly southward, inclining a few degrees to the east. It issues from the ground with a loud noise, resembling somewhat the roaring of a sea. Cæsarea Philippi stands near its source; from thence it flows on to the small lake Samochon or Merom, where it receives the Jordanes Minor, after which it proceeds onwards till it falls into the sea of Tiberias, or lake of Genesareth; emerging from thence, it flows through the valley of Aulon, and at last discharges itself into the Dead Sea. It constantly overflowed its banks in ancient times, about the period of early harvest, and in this respect differed from most other rivers, which commonly swell during the winter. Hence it was thought to have a subterraneous communication with the Nile. Its rise was probably owing to the melting of the snows at that time, and the early rains. It now no longer rises, either because its rapid current has deepened its channel, or its waters have been partly diverted another way. The etymology of its name has been variously assigned. It is thought by some to come from the Hebrew jarden, a descent, from its rapid descent through that country. Another class of etymologists deduce its name from the Hebrew and Syriac, importing the cauldron of judgment. Others make it come from Jor, a spring, and Dan, a small town near its source; and a third class deduce it from Jor and Dan, two rivulets. The Arabs call it Arden or Harden, the Persians Aerdun, and the Arabian geographer Edrisi, Zacchar, or swelling.]

JORNANDES, [called by some Jordanus, a Goth by birth, secretary to one of the kings of the Alans, and, as some believe, afterwards bishop of Ravenna. In the year 552 of our era, he wrote a history of the Goths. This is merely an abridgment of the history of Cassiodorus, and is written without judgment, and with great partiality. He composed also a work entitled De regnorum et temporum successione, or a Roman history from Romulus to Augustus. It is merely a copy of the history of Florus, but with such alterations and additions, however, as to enable us sometimes to correct by means of it the text of the Roman historian.]

IOS, now Nio, an island in the Myrtoan Sea, at the south of Naxos, celebrated, as some say, for the tomb of Homer, and the birth of his mother. Plin. 4, c. 12

JOSEPHUS FLAVIUS, a celebrated Jew, born in Jerusalem. [The date of his birth is A. D. 37. He was the son of Mathias, a priest, and was descended on the mother's side from the family of the Maccabees. After receiving a liberal education and entering the sect of the Pharisees, which then enjoyed the highest reputation, he proceeded to Rome in his 26th year, where he remained some considerable time. On his return home he found the Jews on the point of revolting against the power of Rome. After vainly endeavouring to oppose this rash determination, he at last joined their cause, and held various commands in the Jewish army.] At Jotapata, in Galilee, he signalized his military abilities in supporting a siege of forty-seven days against Vespasian and Titus, in a small town of Judæa. When the city surrendered there were not found less than 40,000 Jews slain, and the number of captives amounted to 1,200. Josephus saved his life by flying into a cave, where 40 of his countrymen had also taken refuge. He dissuaded them from committing suicide, and, when they had all drawn lots to kill one another, Josephus fortunately remained the last, and surrendered himself to Vespasian. He gained the conqueror's esteem by foretelling that he would become one day the master of the Roman empire. [I. G. Vossius (Hist. Gr. 2, c. 8.) thinks that Josephus, who, like all the rest of his nation, expected at this period the coming of the Messiah, applied to Vespasian the prophecies which announced the advent of our Saviour. He remarks that Josephus might have been the more sincere in so doing, as Jerusalem was not besieged. His prophecy having been accomplished two years afterwards, he obtained his freedom, and took the prænomens of Flavius, to indicate that he regarded himself as the freedman of the emperor.] Josephus was present at the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, and received all the sacred books which it contained from the conqueror's hands. He wrote the history of the wars of the Jews, first in Syriac, [or rather in Syro-Chaldaic,] and afterwards translated it into Greek. This composition so pleased Titus, that he authenticated it by placing his signature upon it, and by preserving it in one of the public libraries. He finished another work, which he divided into twenty books, containing the history of the Jewish antiquities, in some places subversive of the authority and miracles mentioned in the Scriptures. [The Jewish Antiquities of Josephus form a history of the chosen people from the creation to the reign of the emperor Nero. Josephus did not write this book for the use of his countrymen, nor even for the Hellenistic Jews: his object was to make his nation better known to the Greeks and Romans, and to remove the contempt in which it was accustomed to be held. The books of the Old Testament, and where these failed, traditions and other historical monuments were the sources whence he drew the materials for his work: but in making use of these he allowed himself an unparadonable license, in removing from his narrative all that the religion of the Jews regarded as most worthy of veneration, in order not to shock the prejudices of the nations to whom he wrote. He not only treats the Books of the New Testament as if they were mere human compositions, in explaining, enlarging, and commenting upon them, and thus destroying the native and noble simplicity and pathos which renders the perusal of the sacred volume so full of attraction, but he allows himself the liberty of often adding to the recital of an event circumstances which change its entire nature. In every part of the work in question, he represents his countrymen in a point of view calculated to conciliate the esteem of the masters of the world. Notwithstanding all this, however, the Antiquities of Josephus are extremely interesting, as affording us a faithful picture of Jewish manners in the time of the historian, and as filling up a void in ancient history of four centuries between the last books of the Old Testament and those of the New.] He also wrote two books to defend the Jews against Apion, their greatest enemy; besides an account of his own life, &c. Josephus has been admired for his lively and animated style, the bold propriety of his expressions, the exactness of his descriptions, and the persuasive eloquence of his orations. He has been called the Livy of the Greeks. Though, in some cases, inimical to the Christians, yet he has commended our Saviour so warmly, that St. Jerome calls him a Christian writer. [The commendation of our Saviour which is here alluded to occurs in a remarkable passage of the Jewish Antiquities, Book 18, chapter 3, and is as follows: "at this time lived Jesus, a wise man, if it be allowed us to call him a man: for he performed wonderful works, and instructed those who receive the truth with joy. He thus drew to him many Jews, and many of the Greeks. He was the Christ. Pilate having punished him with crucifixion, on the accusation of our leading men, those who had loved him before still remained faithful to him. For on the third day he appeared unto them, living anew, just as the prophets of God had pronounced, who had predicted of him a thousand other miraculous things. The nation of Christians, named after him, continues even to the present day." This passage, placed in the middle of a work written by a zealous Jew, has all the appearance of a marginal gloss which has found its way into the text: it is too long and too short to have formed a part of the original text. It is too long to have come from the pen of an infidel, and it is too short to have been written by a Christian. St. Justin, Tertullian, and St. Chrysostom have made no use of it in their disputes with the Jews; and neither Origen nor Photius make any mention of it. Eusebius, who lived before some of the writers just named, is the first who adduces it. These circumstances have sufficed to attach suspicion to it in the eyes of some critics, and especially of Richard Simon and the historian Gibbon. On the other hand, Henri de Valois, Huet Bishop of Avranches, Isaac Vossius and others have defended its authenticity. Lambecius, who advocates the same side, has pretended that the words of Josephus ought to be considered as expressing contempt for our Saviour, although, in order not to offend either party, the historian has concealed his real meaning in equivocal terms. However paradoxical this last opinion may seem, it has assumed an air of considerable probability, in consequence of a slight correction in the text and punctuation which has been proposed by Knittel, a German scholar. A celebrated protestant divine, Godfrey Less, after having carefully and critically examined both sides of the question, has pronounced the passage to be supposititious, and adds that the silence of the historian respecting our Saviour and the miracles which he wrought, affords a far more eloquent testimony in favour of the truth of our Redeemer's mission, than the most laboured statement could have yielded, especially when we consider that the father of Josephus, one of the priests of Jerusalem, could not but have known our Saviour, and since Josephus himself lived in the midst of the apostles. Had the latter been able he would have refuted the whole history of our Saviour's mission and works. His silence is conclusive in their favour. The efforts of Deistical writers, therefore, to invalidate the authenticity of this remarkable passage, have literally recoiled upon themselves, and Christianity has achieved a triumph by the very arms of infidelity.] Josephus died A. D. 93, in the 56th year of his age. The best editions of his works are Hudson's, 2 vols. fol. Oxon. 1720, Havercamp's, 2 vols. fol. Amst. 1726. Sutton. in Vesp. &c.

JOVIANUS Flavius Claudius, a native of Pannonia, elected emperor of Rome by the soldiers after the death of Julian. He at first refused to be invested with the imperial purple, because his subjects followed the religious principles of the late emperor; but they removed his groundless apprehensions, and when they assured him that they were warm for Christianity, he accepted the crown. He made a disadvantageous treaty with the Persians, against whom Julian was marching with a victorious army. Jovian died seven months and twenty days after his ascension, and was found in his bed suffocated by the vapours of charcoal which had been lighted in his room, A. D. 364. Some attribute his death to intemperance, and say that he was the son of a baker. He burned a celebrated library at Antioch. Marcellin

IPHICLUS, or IPHICLES, a son of Amphitryon and Almena, born at the same birth with Hercules. As these two children were together in the cradle, Juno, jealous of Hercules, sent two large serpents to destroy him. At the sight of the serpents Iphicles alarmed the house; but Hercules, though not a year old, boldly seized them, one in each hand, and squeezed them to death. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Theocrit.—A king of Phylace, in Phthiotis, son of Phylacus and Clymene. He had bulls famous for their bigness, and the monster which kept them. Melampus, at the request of his brother, [vid. Melampus] attempted to steal them away, but he was caught in the fact, and imprisoned. Iphiclus soon received some advantages from the prophetic knowledge of his prisoner, and not only restored him to liberty, but also presented him with the oxen. Iphiclus, who was childless, learned from the soothsayer how to become a father. He had married Automedusa, and afterwards a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes. He was father to Podarce and Protesilaus. Homer. Od. 11, ll. 13.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Paus. 4, c. 36.

IPHICRATES, a celebrated general of Athens, who, though son of a shoemaker, rose from the lowest station to the highest offices in the state. He made war against the Thracians, obtained some victories over the Spartans, and assisted the Persian king against Egypt. He changed the dress and arms of his soldiers, and rendered them more alert and expeditious in using their weapons. He married a daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace, by whom he had a son called Mnestheus, and died 380 B. C. When he was once reproached of the meanness of his origin, he observed, that he would be the first of his family, but that his detractor would be the last of his own. C. Nep. in Iphic.

IPHIGÉNIA, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When the Greeks, going to the Trojan war, were detained by contrary winds at Aulis, they were informed by one of the soothsayers, that to appease the gods, they must sacrifice Iphigenia, Agamemnon's daughter, to Diana. [vid. Agamemnon.] The father, who had provoked the goddess by killing her favourite stag, heard this with the greatest horror and indignation, and rather than to shed the blood of his daughter, he commanded one of his heralds, as chief of the Grecian forces, to order all the assembly to depart each to his respective home. Ulysses and the other generals interfered, and Agamemnon consented to immolate his daughter for the common cause of Greece. As Iphigenia was tenderly loved by her mother, the Greeks sent for her on pretence of giving her in marriage to Achilles. Iphigenia came to Aulis: here she saw the bloody preparations for the sacrifice; she implored the forgiveness and protection of her father, but tears and entreaties were unavailing. [According to Euripides, who has dramatised the story, Agamemnon frequently wavered in his cruel resolution, and even after notice had been sent to Clytemnestra directing her to bring her daughter to the camp, he sent other letters to her privately by a slave, ordering her not to come. But the slave was intercepted by Menelaus, who suspected what had been done.] Calchas took the knife in his hand, and, as he was going to strike the fatal blow, Iphigenia suddenly disappeared, and a goat of uncommon size and beauty was found in her place for the sacrifice. [According to the play of Euripides, the scheme of pretending to give away Iphigenia in marriage to Achilles, was known only to Agamemnon, Menelaus, Calchas, and Ulysses. When, therefore, Achilles, learns the use which had been made of his name, fired with anger, he defends the cause of the virgin against the united voices of the assembled Greeks, and like a true hero is about to make battle with them all when Diana interferes.] This supernatural change animated the Greeks, the wind suddenly became favourable, and the combined fleet set sail from Aulis. Iphigenia's innocence had raised the compassion of the goddess on whose altar she was going to be sacrificed, and she carried her to Taurica, where she intrusted her with the care of her temple. In this sacred office Iphigenia was obliged, by the command of Diana, to sacrifice all the strangers which came into that country. Many had already been offered as victims on the bloody altar, when Orestes and Pylades came to Taurica. Their mutual and unparalleled friendship, [vid. Pylades and Orestes] disclosed to Iphigenia that one of the strangers whom she was going to sacrifice was her brother; and, upon this, she conspired with the two friends to fly from the barbarous country, and carry away the statue of the goddess. They successfully effected their enterprise, and murdered Thoas, who enforced the human sacrifices. According to some authors, the Iphigenia who was sacrificed at Aulis was not a daughter of Agamemnon, but a daughter of Helen by Theseus. Homer does not speak of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, though very minute in the description of the Grecian forces, adventures, &c. The statue of Diana, which Iphigenia brought away, was afterwards placed in the grove of Aricia in Italy. Paus. 2, c. 22, l. 3, c. 16.—Ovid Met. 12, v. 31.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 116.—Æschyl.—Euripid.

IPHIS, son of Alector, succeeded his father on the throne of Argos. He advised Polynices, who wished to engage Amphiarus in the Theban war, to bribe his wife Eriphyle, by giving her the golden collar of Harmonia. This succeeded, and Eriphyle betrayed her husband. Apollod. 3.—Flacc. 1, 3 and 7.—A beautiful youth of Salamis, of ignoble birth. He became enamoured of Anaxarete, and the coldness and contempt he met with rendered him so desperate that he hung himself. Anaxarete saw him carried to his grave without emotion, and was instantly changed into a stone. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 703.

IPHITUS, a son of Eurytus, king of Echa-lia. When his father had promised his daughter Iole to him who could overcome him or his sons in drawing the bow, Hercules accepted the challenge and came off victorious. Eurytus refused his daughter to the conqueror, observing that Hercules had killed one of his wives in a fury, and that Iole might perhaps share the same fate. Some time after, Autolycus stole away the oxen of Eurytus, and Hercules was suspected of the theft. Iphitus was sent in quest of the oxen, and, in his search, he met with Hercules, whose good favours he had gained by advising Eurytus to give up Iole to the conqueror. Hercules assisted Iphitus in seeking the lost animals; but when he recollected the ingratitude of Eurytus, he killed Iphitus by throwing him down from the walls of Tirynthus. Homer. Od. 21.—Apollod. 2, c. 6.—A king of Elis, son of Praxonides, in the age of Lycurgus. He re-established the Olympic games 338 years after their institution by Hercules, or about 884 years before the Christian era. This epoch is famous in chronological history, as every thing previous to it seems involved in fabulous obscurity. Pater. 1, c. 8.—Paus. 5, c. 4.

IRUS, a town of Phrygia, [situate in a plain to the south-east of Synnada,] celebrated for a battle which was fought there about 301 years before the Christian era, between Antigonus and his son, and Seleucus, Ptolemy, Lysimachus, and Cassander. [Hence Plutarch says that "all the kings of the earth" were here engaged,] The former led into the field an army of above 70,000 foot and 10,000 horse, with 75 elephants. The latter's forces consisted of 64,000 infantry, besides 10,500 horse, 400 elephants, and 120 armed chariots. Antigonus and his son were defeated. [Antigonus lost his life in the action, Demetrius fled into Greece. The conquerors divided their possessions between them.] Plut. in Demetr.

IRA, a fortress of Messenia [in the north, towards the confines of Elis, and near the river Cyparissus,] which Agamemnon promised to Achilles if he would resume his arms to fight against the Trojans. [This is unquestionably a mistake, as Homer names the place to which Agamemnon alludes Ira and not Egea. Agamemnon promised Achilles seven cities of Messenia, of which Ira (not Ira) was one, and the poet describes all seven as lying near the sea, whereas Ira was inland.] This place is famous in history as having supported a siege of eleven years against the Lacedæmonians. Its capture, B. C. 671, put an end to the second Messenian war. Hom. Il. 9, v. 150 and 292.—Strab. 7.

IRENEUS, a native of Greece, disciple of Polycarp, and bishop of Lyons in France. [The time of his birth, and the precise place of his nativity, cannot be satisfactorily ascertained. Dodwell refers his birth to the reign of Nerva, A. D. 97, and thinks that he did not outlive the year 190. Grabe dates his birth about the year 108. Dupin says that he was born a little before the year 110, and died a martyr in 202.] He wrote on different subjects; but as what remains is in Latin, some suppose he composed in that language, and not in Greek. Fragments of his works in Greek are, however, preserved, which prove that his style was simple, though clear and often animated. His opinions concerning the soul are curious. He suffered martyrdom. [From the silence of Tertullian, Eusebius, and others, concerning the manner of his death, Cave, Basnage, and Dodwell, have inferred that he did not die by martyrdom, but in the ordinary course of nature. With these,

Lardner coincides.] The best edition of his works is that of Grabe, Oxon. fol. 1702.

IRÈNE, one of the seasons among the Greeks, called by the moderns Horæ. Her two sisters were Dia and Eunomia, all daughters of Jupiter and Themis. Apollod. 1, c. 3.

IRÉSUS, [a beautiful country in Lybia, not far from Cyrene. When Battus, in obedience to the oracle, was seeking a place for a settlement, the Lybians, who were his guides, managed so as to lead him through it by night. Milton calls the name Irassa, for which he has the authority of Pindar. Here Hercules contended with Antæus.] The Egyptians were once defeated here by the inhabitants of Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 158, &c.

IRIS, a daughter of Thaumas and Electra, one of the Oceanides, messenger of the gods, and more particularly of Juno. Her office was to cut the lock which seemed to detain the soul in the body of those that were expiring. She is the same as the rainbow, and, from that circumstance, she is represented with wings with all the variegated and beautiful colours of the rainbow, and appears sitting behind Juno, ready to execute her commands. She is likewise described as supplying the clouds with water to deluge the world. [The Greek term for the rainbow, iris, is supposed by some to be derived from ίρω, I speak, I tell, as being an appearance in the heavens that is supposed to foretell, or rather to declare, rain. The fable of Iris being the particular messenger of Juno may have relation to the circumstance of the latter goddess being the same as the air, according to some.] Hesiod. Theog. v. 266.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 271 and seq. l. 4, v. 481, l. 10, v. 585.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 694.—[A river of Pontus, rising on the confines of Armenia Minor, and flowing into the sea south-east of Amisus. It receives many tributaries, and near the end of its course, passes through the district of Phanaræa. The Turks call it the Kasalmack, and near its mouth, it is more usually styled Jehil-Ermak, or the Green River.]

IRUS, a beggar of Ithaca, who executed the commissions of Penelope's suitors. When Ulysses returned home, disguised in a beggar's dress, Irus hindered him from entering the gates, and even challenged him. Ulysses brought him to the ground with a blow, and dragged him out of the house. From his poverty originates the proverb Iro pauperior. Homer. Od. 8, v. 1 and 35.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 7, v. 42.—A mountain of India.

IS, [a city about eight days' journey from Babylon, according to Herodotus, near which flows a river of the same name, which empties into the Euphrates. With the current of this river, adds the historian, particles of bitumen descended towards Babylon, by means of which its walls were constructed. There are some curious fountains, says Renell, near Hiti, a town on the Euphrates, about 128 miles above Hillah, reckoning the distance along the banks of the Euphrates.

This distance answers to 8 ordinary journeys of a caravan of 16 miles direct. There can be no doubt that this Hit is the Is of Herodotus, which should have been written It.]

ISADAS, a Spartan, who, upon seeing the Thebans entering the city, stripped himself naked, and with a spear and sword engaged the enemy. [The Ephori honoured him with a chaplet for his gallant achievement, but at the same time fined him 1000 drachmas for having dared to appear without his armour.] Plut.

ISÆUS, an orator of Chalcis, in Eubœa, who came to Athens, and became there the pupil of Lysias, and soon after the master of Demosthenes. Some suppose that he reformed the dissipation and imprudence of his early years by frugality and temperance. Demosthenes imitated him in preference to Isocrates, because he studied force and energy of expression rather than floridness of style. [His style bears a great resemblance to that of Lysias. He is elegant and vigorous, but Dionysius of Halicarnassus does not find in him the simplicity of the other. He understands better than Lysias the art of arranging the several parts of a discourse, but he is less natural. When we read the exposition of a speech of Lysias, nothing appears artificial therein: on the contrary every thing is studied in the orations of Isæus. In his demonstrations of facts he is not so condensed as Lysias, but then he is more successful in exciting the passions. He opened the road which Demosthenes afterwards pursued with so much success. Eleven of his orations remain; before 1785 we were in possession of only ten. They are all of a legal nature, and relate to questions of inheritance and succession. Hence they are commonly cited by the title of λογια κληρικαι, discourses concerning inheritances. The best edition is contained in the Corpus Oratorum Græcorum of Reiske, Lips. 1770, 12 vols. 8vo. Sir W. Jones has written a valuable translation of Isæus. It appeared in 1779.] Juv. 3, v. 74.—Plut. de 10. Orat. Dem.—Another Greek orator, who came to Rome A. D. 17. He is greatly recommended by Pliny the younger, who observes, that he always spoke extempore, and wrote with elegance, unlaboured ease, and great correctness.

ISÆPIS, a river of Umbria. Lucan. 2, v. 406.

ISARA, the Isere, a river of Gaul, where Fabius routed the Allobroges. It rises at the east of Savoy, and falls into the Rhone near Valence. Plin. 3, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 399.—Another called the Oise, which falls into the Seine below Paris. [The Celtic name of Briva Isaræ, a place on this river, has been translated into Pont-Oise.]

ISAURA, (æ, or orum.) [the capital of Isauria, near the confines of Phrygia. Strabo and Stephanus Byzantinus used the term as a plural one; Ammianus Marcellinus, however, makes it of the first declension. It was a strong and rich place, and its inhabitants appear to have acquired their wealth in a great degree, by plundering the neighbouring regions. The city was attacked by the Macedonians under Perdiccas, the inhabitants having put to death the governor set over the province by Alexander. After a brave resistance, the Isaurians destroyed themselves and their city by fire. The conquerors are said to have obtained much gold and silver from the ruins of the place. During the contentions between Alexander's successors, the neighbouring mountaineers rebuilt the capital and commenced plundering anew until they were reduced by Servilius, hence styled Isauricus, and the city again destroyed. A new Isaura was afterwards built by Amyntas, king of Galatia, in the vicinity of the old city. D'Anville locates the old capital near a lake, about whose existence, however, the ancients are silent; the modern name he makes Bei-Shehri. New Isaura he places on another lake south-east of the former, and terms it Sidi-Shehri. Manneret opposes this position of the last, and is in favour of Serki-Serail, a small village east-north-east of Iconium. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 6. part 2, p. 188.]—Plin. 5, c. 27.

ISAURIA, [a country of Asia Minor, north of, and adjacent to, Pisidia. The inhabitants were a wild race, remarkable for the violence and rapine which they exercised against their neighbours. P. Servilius derived from his reduction of this people the surname of Isauricus. A conformity in the aspect of the country, which was rough and mountainous, caused Cilicia Trachea, in a subsequent age, to have the name of Isauria extended to it, and it is thus denominated in the notices of the eastern empire.] Flor. 3, c. 6.—Strab.—Cic. 15, Fam. 2.

ISAURICUS, a surname of P. Servilius, from his conquests over the Isaurians. Ovid. 1, Fast. 594.—Cic. 5, Att. 21.

ISCHENIA, an annual festival at Olympia, in honour of Ischenus, the grandson of Mercury and Hierea, who, in a time of famine, devoted himself for his country, and was honoured with a monument near Olympia.

ISCHOMACHUS, a noble athlete of Crotona, about the consulship of M. Valerius and P. Posthumius.

[ISELASTICA, a name applied to the athletic games among the Greeks, because the victors at them were conducted with great pomp into their respective cities, through a breach made in the walls for that purpose; intimating, says Plutarch, that a city which produced such brave citizens, had little occasion for the defence of walls. The name comes from εισελθειν, to enter.]

ISIA, certain festivals observed in honour of Isis, which continued nine days. It was usual to carry vessels full of wheat and barley, as the goddess was supposed to be the first who taught mankind the use of corn. These festivals were adopted by the Romans, among whom they soon degenerated into licentiousness. They were abolished by a decree of the senate, A. U. C. 696. They were introduced again by Commodus.

ISIDŌRUS, a native of Charax, in the age of Ptolemy Lagus, who wrote some historical treatises, besides a description of Parthia. —A disciple of Chrysostom, called Pelusiota, from his living in Egypt. Of his epistles 2012 remain, written in Greek with conciseness and elegance. The best edition is that of Paris, fol. 1638. —A Christian Greek writer who flourished in the 7th century. He is surnamed Hispalensis. His works have been edited, fol. de Breul, Paris, 1601.

ISIS, a celebrated deity of the Egyptians, daughter of Saturn and Rhea, according to Diodorus of Sicily. [The name, according to some, is synonymous with πλάταια, ancient, an expression, which, in the Egyptian theology, was applied to the moon on account of her eternal birth. According to others, and particularly Jablonski, Isis, in the Egyptian language, signified the cause of abundance; and it was applied by the Egyptian priests to the moon, because they supposed the moon to have a direct influence on the atmosphere, the winds, and the rains, and therefore they regarded it like the sun, which they called Osiris, as one of the sources of the inundation of the Nile.] Some suppose her to be the same as Io, who was changed into a cow, and restored to her human form in Egypt, where she taught agriculture, and governed the people with mildness and equity, for which reasons she received divine honours after death. According to some traditions mentioned by Plutarch, Isis married her brother Osiris, and was pregnant by him even before she had left her mother's womb. These two ancient deities, as some authors observe, comprehended all nature and all the gods of the heathens. Isis was the Venus of Cyprus, the Minerva of Athens, the Cybele of the Phrygians, the Ceres of Eleusis, the Proserpine of Sicily, the Diana of Crete, the Bellona of the Romans, &c. Osiris and Isis reigned conjointly in Egypt; but the rebellion of Typhon, the brother of Osiris, proved fatal to this sovereign. [vid. Osiris and Typhon.] The ox and cow were symbols of Osiris and Isis, because these deities, while on earth, had diligently applied themselves in cultivating the earth. [vid. Apis.] As Isis was supposed to be the moon and Osiris the sun, she was represented as holding a globe in her hand, with a vessel full of ears of corn. The Egyptians believed that the yearly and regular inundations of the Nile proceeded from the abundant tears which Isis shed for the loss of Osiris, whom Typhon had basely murdered. The word Isis, according to some, signifies ancient, and, on that account, the inscriptions on the statues of the goddess were often in these words: I am all that has been, that shall be, and none among mortals has hitherto taken off my veil. The worship of Isis was universal in Egypt; the priests were obliged to observe perpetual chastity, their head was closely shaved, and they always walked barefooted, and clothed themselves in linen garments. They never eat onions, they abstained from salt with their meat, and were forbidden to eat the flesh of sheep and of hogs. During the night they were employed in continual devotion near the statue of the goddess. Cleopatra, the beautiful queen of Egypt, was wont to dress herself like this goddess, and affected to be called a second Isis. Cic. de Div. 1.—Plut. de Isid. & Osirid.—Diod. 1.—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Herodot. 2, c. 59.—Lucan. 1, v. 831.

ISMĀRUS, (ISMĀRA, plur.) [a mountain of Thrace near the mouth of the Hebrus, covered with vineyards. This part of Thrace was famous for good wines. Ulysses, in the Odyssey, is made to speak in commendation of some wine given him by Maron, the priest of Apollo at Ismarus.] The word Ismarius is indiscriminately used for Thracian. Homer. Od. 9.—Virg. G. 2, v. 37. Æn. 10, v. 351.

ISMĒNE, a daughter of Œdipus and Jocasta, who, when her sister Antigone had been condemned to be buried alive by Creon, for giving burial to her brother Polynices against the tyrant's positive orders, declared herself as guilty as her sister, and insisted upon being equally punished with her. This instance of generosity was strongly opposed by Antigone, who wished not to see her sister involved in her calamities. Sophocl. in Antig.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.

ISMĒNIAS, a celebrated musician of Thebes. When he was taken prisoner by the Scythians, Atheas, the king of the country, observed, that he liked the music of Ismenias less than the neighing of his horse. Plut. in Apoph. —A Theban general sent to Persia with an embassy by his countrymen. As none were admitted into the king's presence without prostrating themselves at his feet, Ismenias had recourse to artifice to avoid doing an action which would prove disgraceful to his country. When he was introduced he dropped his ring, and the motion he made to recover it from the ground was mistaken for the most submissive homage, and Ismenias had a satisfactory audience of the monarch. —A river of Bœotia, falling into the Euripus, where Apollo had a temple, from which he was called Ismenius. A youth was yearly chosen by the Bœotians to be the priest of the god, an office to which Hercules was once appointed. Paus. 9, c. 10.—Ovid. Met. 2.—Strab. 9.

ISMENIDES, an epithet applied to the Theban women, as being near the Ismenus, a river of Bœotia. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 31.

ISMENIUS, a surname of Apollo at Thebes, where he had a temple on the borders of the Ismenus.

ISMĒNŪS, a son of Apollo and Melia, one of the Nereides, who gave his name to the Ladon, a river of Bœotia, near Thebes, falling into the Asopus, and thence into the Euripus. Paus. 9, c. 10.

ISŌCRĀTES, a celebrated orator, son of Theodorus, a rich musical instrument maker at Athens. He was taught in the schools of Gorgias and Prodicus, but his oratorical abilities were never displayed in public, and Isocrates was prevented by an unconquerable timidity [as well as by weakness of voice,] from speaking in the popular assemblies. He opened a school of eloquence at Athens, where he distinguished himself by the number, character, and fame of his pupils, and by the immense riches which he amassed. [The most famous orators of Greece, Isæus, Lycurgus, Hyperides and Demosthenes formed themselves in his school. Hence Cicero compares it to the wooden horse containing the princes of the Greeks.] He was intimate with Philip of Macedon, and regularly corresponded with him: and to his familiarity with that monarch the Athenians were indebted for some of the few peaceful years which they passed. The aspiring ambition of Philip, however, displeased Isocrates, and the defeat of the Athenians at Cheronæa had such an effect upon his spirits, that he did not survive the disgrace of his country, but died, after he had been four days without taking any aliment, in the 99th year of his age, about 338 years before Christ. The remains of his orations extant inspire the world with the highest veneration for his abilities as a moralist, an orator, and, above all, as a man. His merit, however, is lessened by those who accuse him of plagiarism from the works of Thucydides, Lysias, and others, seen particularly in his panegyric. He was so studious of correctness that his lines are sometimes poetry. The severe conduct of the Athenians against Socrates highly displeased him, and, in spite of all the undeserved unpopularity of that great philosopher, he put on mourning the day of his death. About 31 of his orations are extant. Isocrates was honoured after death with a brazen statue by Timotheus, one of his pupils, and Aphareus, his adopted son. The best editions of Isocrates are that of Battie, 2 vols. 8vo. Cantab. 1729, that of Augur, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1732, [and that of Lange, Hal. 1803.] *Plut. de 10 Orat. &c.—Cic. [ISSÉDONES, the principal nation in Serica, whose metropolis was Sera, now Kant-cheon, in the Chinese province of Shefi-Si, without the great wall. This city has been erroneously confounded with Pekin the capital of China, which is 300 leagues distant. They had also two towns, both called Issedon, but distinguished by the epithets of Serica and Scythica.]

ISSUS, now Aisse, a town of Cilicia, on the confines of Syria, famous for a battle fought there between Alexander the Great and the Persians under Darius their king, in October, B. C. 333, in consequence of which it was called Nicopolis. In this battle the Persians lost in the field 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, and the Macedonians only 300 foot and 150 horse, according to Diodorus Siculus. The Persian army, according to Justin, consisted of 400,000 foot and 100,000 horse, and 61,000 of the former and 10,000 of the latter, were left dead on the spot, and 40,000 were taken prisoners. The loss of the Macedonians, as he further adds, was no more than 130 foot and 150 horse. According to Cur-tius the Persian slain amounted to 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse; and those of Alexander to 32 foot, and 150 horse killed, and 504 wounded. This spot is likewise famous for the defeat of Niger by Severus, A. D. 194. Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 11, c. 9.—Curt. 3, c. 7.—Arrian.—Diod. 17.—Cic. 5, Att. 20. Fam. 2, ep. 10.

ISTHMA, sacred games among the Greeks, which received their name from the isthmus of Corinth, where they were observed. They were celebrated in commemoration of Melicerta, who was changed into a sea-deity, when his mother Ino had thrown herself into the sea with him in her arms. The body of Melicerta, according to some traditions, when cast upon the sea-shore, received an honourable burial, in memory of which the Isthmian games were instituted, B. C. 1326. They were interrupted after they had been celebrated with great regularity during some years, and Theseus at last re-instituted them in honour of Neptune, whom he publicly called his father. These games were observed every third, or rather fifth, year, and held so sacred and inviolable, that even a public calamity could not prevent the celebration. When Corinth was destroyed by Mummius, the Roman general, they were observed with the usual solemnity, and the Sicyonians were intrusted with the superintendance, which had been before one of the privileges of the ruined Corinthians. Combats of every kind were exhibited, and the victors were rewarded with garlands of pine leaves. Some time after the custom was changed, and the victor received a crown of dry and withered parsley. The years were reckoned by the celebration of the Isthmian games, as among the Romans from the consular government. Paus. 1, c. 44, l. 2, c. 1 and 2.—Plin. 4, c. 5.—Plut. in Thes.

ISTHMUS, a small neck of land which joins one country to another, and prevents the sea from making them separate, such as that of Corinth, called often the Isthmus by way of eminence, which joins Peloponnesus to Greece. [The Isthmus of Corinth is now called Heramili, from its being 6 modern Greek (nearly 5 British) miles in breadth. vid. Corinth.] Strab. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 2.—Plin. 4, c. 4.

ISTRIA, [a peninsula lying to the west of Liburnia, and bounded on the south and west by the Adriatic. ISTROPŌLIS, [a city of Thrace, situate on the coast of the Euxine below the mouth of the Ister, where a lagune, or salt lake, called Halmyris, formed by an arm of the Danube, has its issue into the sea. It appears to be succeeded at the present day by a place called Kara-Kerman, or, the black fortress. Isthropolis is said to have been founded by a Milesian colony.] Plin. 4, c. 11.

ITALIA, [a celebrated country of Europe, bounded on the north by the Alps, on the south by the Ionian Sea, on the north-east by the Adriatic or Mare Superum, and on the south-west by the Mare Tyrrhenum, or Inferum. It was called Hesperia by the Greeks, from its western situation in relation to Greece. The name Italia some derive from Italus, who reigned in that country; others deduce it from ιταλος, an ox, from the great abundance of those animals in this land; and others again, make the name to have belonged originally to a small canton in Calabria, and to have become gradually common to the whole country. The ancients differed from us in their application of names to countries. They regarded the name as belonging to the people not to the land itself, and in this they were more correct than we are, who call nations after the countries they inhabit. Asia Minor, for example, was an appellation unknown to the earlier classic writers, and only began to come into use after the country had fallen into the hands of the Romans. Previous to this the different nations which peopled that peninsula had their respective names, and were known by these. In the same way, a general name for what we now term Italy was not originally thought of. When the Greeks became first acquainted with this country, they observed it to be peopled by several distinct nations as they thought; and hence we find it divided by them about the time of Aristotle into six countries or regions, Ausonia or Opica, Tyrrhenia, Iapygia, Umbria, Liguria, and Hænetia. Thucydides, for instance, in speaking of Cumæ, says that it is situate in Opica, and Aristotle, cited by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, terms Latium a part of this same Opica. As regards the origin of the name Italia, the truth appears to be this. The appellation was first given by the early Greeks to what is now denominated Calabria ulterior. This was not done because the name was in strictness confined to that section of the country, but because the Greeks knew at that early period very little, comparatively speaking, of the interior, and were as yet ignorant of the fact, that most of the numerous nations which peopled the Italian peninsula were the descendants of one common race, the Itali, who originally were spread over the whole land even to the foot of the Alps. The nations in the south of Italy, with whom the Greeks first became acquainted, were found by them to be descended from the Itali, or rather they found this name in general use among them: hence they called their section of the country by the name of Italia. As their knowledge of the interior became more enlarged, other branches of the same great race were successively discovered, and the name Italia thus gradually progressed in its application until it reached the southern limits of Cisalpine Gaul. To this latter country the name was originally given, because it was peopled principally by Gauls who had settled in these parts and dislodged the ancient inhabitants. In confirmation of what has just been advanced, we find that in the time of Antiochus, a son of Xenophanes, who lived about the 320th year of Rome, and a little anterior to Thucydides, the appellation Italia was given to a part of Italy which lay south of a line drawn from the small river Laus to Metapontum. Towards the end of the 5th century of Rome, it designated all the countries south of the Tiber and Æsis. At length, in the pages of Polybius, who wrote about the 600th year of Rome, we find the name in question given to all Italy up to the foot of the Alps. The including of Cisalpine Gaul under this appellation was an act of policy on the part of the second triumvirate, who were afraid lest, if it remained a province, some future proconsul might imitate Cæsar, and overthrow with his legions the authority of the republic. At a still latter period, Augustus divided Italy into eleven regions, and extended its limits on the north-east as far as Pola, thus comprehending Istria. It is somewhat remarkable that the name Italia, after having gradually extended to the Alps, should at a subsequent epoch be limited in its application to the northern parts alone. When the emperor Maximian, towards the close of the third century of the Christian era, transferred his residence to Milan, the usage prevailed in the west of giving the name of Italy exclusively to the five provinces of Emilia, Liguria, Flaminia, Venetia, and Istria. It is in this sense that the kings of the Lombards were styled monarchs of Italy. As regards the other names sometimes applied to Italy, it may be observed that they are in strictness names only of particular parts, extended by poetic usage to the whole country. Thus Oenotria properly applies to a part of the south-eastern coast, and was given by the Greeks to this portion of the country from the numerous vines which grew there, the name importing "wine land." Thus too Saturnia in fact belongs to one of the hills of Rome, &c. Italy may be divided into three parts, the northern, or Gallia Cisalpina; the middle, or Italia Propria; and the southern, or Magna Græcia. Its principal states were Gallia Cisalpina, Etruria, Umbria, Picenum, Latium, Campania, Samnium and Hirpini, Apulia, Calabria, Lucania, and Bruttiorum Ager. Originally the whole of Italy appears to have been peopled by one common race, the Itali, who were spread from the Alps to the southernmost extremity of the land. This position receives very strong support from the fact that the name Italus was in general use among the various nations of the Italian peninsula. In the language of fable it was the appellation of an ancient monarch. We find mention made of a king Italus among the Ausones and Opici, and likewise among the Morgetes, Si-

culi, and Sabini. We find moreover all these early tribes using one common dialect, the Oscan. Now that such a being as Italus ever existed appears extremely improbable; and still more so the assertion that Italy was named after this ancient king. Daily experience proves that countries are called after the nations who inhabit them; and few, if any, examples can be adduced of nations taking an appellation from their rulers. In the present case it appears scarcely credible. We know of no period when the different Italian tribes were under the controul of a single ruler, and yet each have their Italus. Was there a monarch of this name in every district of Italy? and, still more, did each separate community form the resolution of deriving from their respective monarch a name for themselves and the region they inhabited, so that finally the common name for the whole land became Italia? Either supposition is absurd.—The name Italus then was the generic name of the whole race, and the land was called after it, each community being known at the same time by a specific and peculiar appellation, as Latini, Umbri, &c. The fact of the universal prevalence of the Oscan tongue is strongly corroborative of what has just been advanced. But, it may be contended, no proof exists that any king named Italus was acknowledged by the traditions of the Tuscii or Umbri. The answer is an easy one. Antiquity makes mention of these as the progenitors of the Latini, among whom a king Italus appears, and Scymnus records an old authority which makes the Umbri to have been descended from Latinus, the son of Ulysses and Circe. That these two nations, moreover, spoke a language based on the old Italic or Oscan form of speech, was discovered by the Romans in the case of the Rheti, a branch of the former, who had retired to the Alps upon the invasion of the Gauls. The original population of Italy then was composed of the Itali. To these came various nations, which we shall now enumerate in the order of history. The earliest of these new-comers appear to have been the Illyrian tribes, and in particular the Liburni, who may with truth be regarded as the earliest of European navigators. They extended themselves along the coast of the Adriatic as far as Iapygia. Next in the order of time were the Veneti, a branch of the great Slavonic race, (vid. Veneti,) who settled between the mouths of the Po and the Illyrian Alps. Were they the earliest possessors of this part of Italy, or did they expel the Tuscan Euganei? All is uncertainty. Of the origin of the great Etrurian nation we have already spoken under the article Hetruria. The Siculi, who appear to have been the original inhabitants of Latium, and who were subsequently driven out and retired to Sicily, (vid. Siculi) are falsely considered by some to have been of Iberian origin. A fourth people, however, who actually came into Italy were the Greeks. Before the time of the Trojan war there are no traces of any such emigration, but after the termination of that contest, accident threw many of the returning bands upon the Italian coast. We find them in Apulia; on the Sinus Tarentinus in Oenotria, at Pisæ, and in Latium, as the chief part of the population of Alba Longa. Their language, the Æolic Greek, for they were principally Achæi, operating upon the old Italic, or Oscan tongue then prevalent in Latium, and becoming blended at the same time with many peculiarities and forms of Pelasgic origin, gave rise to the Latin tongue. Trojan female captives were brought along with them by the Greeks, but no Trojan men or any prince named Æneas ever set foot in the Italian peninsula. The last ancient people who formed settlements at an early period in Italy were the Gauls. They entered during the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, and successive hordes made their appearance under the following kings. They seized upon what was called from them Cisalpine Gaul, and one division of them, the Senones, even penetrated far into the centre of Italy. They were finally subdued by the Romans more through want of union than of valour. The boundaries of Italy appeared to have been formed by nature itself, which seems to have been particularly careful in supplying this country with whatever may contribute not only to the support, but also to the pleasures and luxuries of life. It has been called the garden of Europe; and the panegyrics which Pliny bestows upon it seem not in any manner exaggerated. Italy has been the mother of arts as well as of arms, and the immortal monuments which remain of the eloquence and poetical abilities of its inhabitants are universally known. Ptol. 3, c. 1.—*Dionys. ITALICA, a town of Italy, called also Corfinium.—[A city of Spain, north of Hispania, and situate on the western side of the river Bætis. It was founded by Publius Scipio in the second Punic war, who placed here the old soldiers whom age incapacitated from the performance of military service. ITHACA, [a celebrated island in the Ionian sea, north-east of Cephallenia. "The Venetian geographers," observes Mr. Gell, "have in a great degree contributed to raise doubts concerning the identity of the modern with the ancient Ithaca, by giving in their charts the name of Val di Compare to this island. That name, however, is totally unknown in the country, where the isle is invariably called Ithaca by the upper ranks, and Theaki by the vulgar. It has been asserted in the north of Europe that Ithaca is too unconsiderable a rock to have produced any contingent of ships which could entitle its king to so much consideration among the neighbouring isles; yet the unrivalled excellence of its port has in modern times created a fleet of 50 vessels of all denominations which trade to every part of the Mediterranean, and from which four might be selected capable of transporting the whole army of Ulysses to the shores of Asia." The same writer makes the population of the island 8000. It is said to contain sixty-six square miles. Gell's Geography and Antiquities of Ithaca, p. 30.] It had a city of the same name. It is very rocky and mountainous, and measures about 25 miles in circumference. Homer. Il. 2, v. 139.—Od. 1, v. 186, l. 4, v. 601, l. 9, v. 20.—Strab. 1 and 8.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

ITHÔME, a town of Messenia, which surrendered, after ten years' siege, to Lacedæmon, 724 years before the Christian era. Jupiter was called Ithomates, from a temple which he had there, where games were also celebrated, and the conqueror rewarded with an oaken crown, Paus 4, c. 32.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 179.—Strab. 8.

ITIIUS PORTUS, [a harbour of Gaul, whence Cæsar set sail for Britain. Cæsar describes it no farther than by saying, that from it there is the most convenient passage to Britain, the distance being about 30 miles. Calais, Boulogne, and Etaples, have each their respective advocates for the honour of being the Itius Portus of antiquity. The weight of authority, however, is in favour of Witsand or Vissan. Cæsar landed at Portus Lemanis, or Lymne, a little below Dover. For a long time this was the principal crossing place. In a later age, however, the preference was given to Gessoriacum, or Boulogne, in Gaul, and Rutupia, or Richborough, in Britain.] Cæs. G. 4, c. 21, l. 1, c. 2 and 5.

ITYS, a son of Teretus king of Thrace, by Procne, daughter of Pandion, king of Athens.

He was killed by his mother when he was about six years old, and served up as meat before his father. He was changed into a pheasant, his mother into a swallow, and his father into an owl. vid. Philomela. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 620.—Amor. 2, el. 14, v. 29.—Horat. 4, od. 12.

JUBA, a king of Numidia, and Mauritania, who succeeded his father Hiempsal, and favoured the cause of Pompey against J. Cæsar. He defeated Curio, whom Cæsar had sent to Africa, and after the battle of Pharsalia he joined his forces to those of Scipio. He was conquered in a battle at Thapsus, and totally abandoned by his subjects. He killed himself with Petreius, who had shared his good fortune and his adversity. His kingdom became a Roman province, of which Sallust was the first governor. Plut. in Pomp. & Cæs.—Flor. 4, c. 12.—Suet. in Cæs. c. 35.—Dion. 41.—Mela, 1, c. 6.—Lucan. 3, &c.—Cæsar. de Bell. Civ. 2.—Patere. 2, c. 54.—The second of that name was the son of Juba the First. He was led among the captives to Rome, to adorn the triumph of Cæsar. His captivity was the source of the greatest honours, and his application to study procured him more glory than he could have obtained from the inheritance of a kingdom. He gained the heart of the Romans by the courteousness of his manners, and Augustus rewarded his fidelity by giving him in marriage Cleopatra, the daughter of Antony, and conferring upon him the title of king, and making him master of all the territories which his father once possessed. His popularity was so great, that the Mauritians rewarded his benevolence by making him one of their gods. The Athenians raised him a statue, and the Ethiopians worshipped him as a deity. Juba wrote an history of Rome in Greek, which is often quoted and commended by the ancients, but of which only a few fragments remain. [It was one of the principal sources of Plutarch, who praises its accuracy. It commenced with the origin of Rome, and was carried down to the time of Sylla.] He also wrote on the history of Arabia, and the antiquities of Assyria, chiefly collected from Berosus. [His geography of Africa and Arabia is cited by Pliny.] Besides these, he composed some treatises on the drama, Roman antiquities, the nature of animals, painting, grammar, &c. now lost. Strab. 17.—Suet. in Cal. 26.—Plin. 5, c. 25 and 32.—Dion. 51, &c.

JUDÆA, [a province of Palestine, forming the southern division. It did not assume the name of Judæa until after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity; though it had been denominated, long before, the kingdom of Judæa, in opposition to that of Israel. After the return, the tribe of Judah settled first at Jerusalem, but afterwards gradually spreading over the whole country, they gave it the name of Judæa. Judæa being the seat of religion and of government claimed many privileges. It was not lawful to intercalate the year out of Judæa.

JUGURTHA, the illegitimate son of Mastanabal, the brother of Micipsa. Micipsa and Mastanabal were the sons of Masinissa, king of Numidia. Micipsa, who had inherited his father's kingdom, educated his nephew with his two sons Adherbal and Hiempsal; but, as he was of an aspiring disposition, he sent him with a body of troops to the assistance of Scipio, who was besieging Numantia, hoping to lose a youth whose ambition seemed to threaten the tranquillity of his children. His hopes were frustrated; Jugurtha showed himself brave and active, and endeared himself to the Roman general. Micipsa appointed him successor to his kingdom with his two sons, but the kindness of the father proved fatal to the children. Jugurtha destroyed Hiempsal, and stripped Adherbal of his possessions, and obliged him to fly to Rome for safety. The Romans listened to the well-grounded complaints of Adherbal, but Jugurtha's gold prevailed among the senators, and the suppliant monarch, forsaken in his distress, perished by the snares of his enemy. [After Cirta was taken by Jugurtha, Asdrubal, who had fled thither for refuge, was tortured and put to death by the former, notwithstanding an express pledge had been given that he should not be injured.] Cæcilius Metellus was at last sent against Jugurtha after other commanders had failed, and his firmness and success soon reduced the crafty Numidian, and obliged him to fly among his savage neighbours for support. Marius and Sylla succeeded Metellus, and fought with equal success. Jugurtha was at last betrayed by his father-in-law Bocchus, from whom he claimed assistance, and he was delivered into the hands of Sylla, after carrying on a war of five years. He was exposed to the view of the Roman people, and dragged in chains to adorn the triumph of Marius. He was afterwards put in a prison, where he died six days after of hunger, B. C. 106. [From Lucan it appears to have been strangulation, (Phar. 9, v. 600,) and this is affirmed by Eutropius, (4, 27.)] The name and the wars of Jugurtha have been immortalized by the pen of Sallust. Sallust. in Jug.—Plut. in Mar. & Syll.

JULIA LEX, prima de provinciis, by J. Cæsar, A. U. C. 691. It confirmed the freedom of all Greece; it ordained that the Roman magistrates should act there as judges, and that the towns and villages through which the Roman magistrates and ambassadors passed should maintain them during their stay; that the governors, at the expiration of their office, should leave a scheme of their accounts in two cities of their province, and deliver a copy of it at the public treasury; that the provincial governors should not accept of a golden crown unless they were honoured with a triumph by the senate; that no supreme commander should go out of his province, enter any dominions, lead an army, or engage in a war, without the previous approbation and command of the Roman senate and people.—Another, de sumptibus, in the age of Augustus. It limited the expense of provisions on the dies profesti, or days appointed for the transaction of business, to 200 sesterces; on common calendar festivals to 300; and on all extraordinary occasions, such as marriages, births, &c. to 1000. [By a subsequent edict of Augustus or Tiberius, the allowance for an entertainment was raised from 300 to 2000 sesterces.—Another, de provinciis, by J. Cæsar, Dictator. It ordained that no prætorian province should be held more than one year, and a consular province more than two years. [Cicero praises this law. It was abrogated, however, by Antony.]—Another, called also Campana agraria, by the same, A. U. C. 691, [for distributing the lands of Campania and Stëlla to 20,000 poor citizens, who had each three children or more.]—Another, de civitate, by L. J. Cæsar, A. U. C. 664. It rewarded with the name and privileges of citizens of Rome all such as, during the civil wars, had remained the constant friends of republican liberty. When that civil war was at an end, all the Italians were admitted as free denizens, and composed eight new tribes.—Another, de judicibus, by J. Cæsar. It confirmed the Pompeian law in a certain manner, requiring the judges to be chosen from the richest people in every century, allowing the senators and knights in the number, and excluding the tribuni ærarii.—Another, de ambitu, by Augustus. It restrained the illicit measures used at elections, and restored to the comitia their ancient privileges which had been destroyed by the ambition and bribery of J. Cæsar.—Another, by Augustus, de adulterio et pudicitia. It punished adultery with death. It was afterwards confirmed and enforced by Domitian. Juvenal. Sat. 2, v. 30, alludes to it.—Another, called also Papia, or Papia Poppea, which was the same as the following, only enlarged by the consuls Papius and Poppæus, A. U. C. 762.—Another, de maritandis ordinibus, by Augustus. It proposed rewards to such as engaged in matrimony of a particular description. [vid. Papia Poppea Lex.] It inflicted punishment on celibacy, and permitted the patricians, the senators, and sons of senators excepted, to intermarry with the children of those that had been liberti, or servants manumitted. Horace alludes to it when he speaks of lex marita.—Another, de majestate, by J. Cæsar. It punished with aque et ignis interdictio all such as were found guilty of the crimen majestatis, or treason against the state.

JULIA, a daughter of Julius Cæsar, by Cornelia, famous for her personal charms and for her virtues. She married Corn. Cæpio, whom her father obliged her to divorce to marry Pompey the Great. Her amiable disposition more strongly cemented the friendship of the father and of the son-in-law ; but her sudden death in child-bed, B. C. 53, broke all ties of intimacy and relationship, and soon produced a civil war. Plut.—The mother of M. Antony, whose humanity is greatly celebrated in saving her brother-in-law from the cruel prosecutions of her son.—Aunt of J. Cæsar, who married C. Marius. Her funeral oration was publicly pronounced by her nephew.—The only daughter of the emperor Augustus, remarkable for her beauty, genius, and debaucheries. She was tenderly loved by her father, who gave her in marriage to Marcellus ; after whose death she was given to Agrippa, by whom she had five children. She became a second time a widow, and was married to Tiberius. Her lasciviousness and debaucheries so disgusted her husband, that he retired from the court of the emperor ; and Augustus, informed of her lustful propensities and infamy, banished her from his sight, and confined her in a small island on the coast of Campania. She was starved to death, A. D. 14, by order of Tiberius, who had succeeded to Augustus as emperor of Rome. Plut.—A daughter of Julia, the wife of Agrippa, who married Lepidus, and was banished for her licentiousness.—A daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina, born in the island of Lesbos, A. D. 17. She married a senator, called M. Vinucius, at the age of 16, and enjoyed the most unbounded favours in the court of her brother Caligula, who is accused of being her first seducer. She was banished by Caligula, on suspicion of conspiracy. Claudius recalled her ; but she was soon after banished by the powerful intrigues of Messalina, and put to death about the 24th year of her age. She was no stranger to the debaucheries of the age, and she prostituted herself as freely to the meanest of the people as to the nobler companions of her brother's extravagance. Seneca, as some suppose, was banished to Corsica for having seduced her.—A celebrated woman, born in Phœnicia. She is also called Donna. She applied herself to the study of geometry and philosophy, &c. and rendered herself conspicuous, as much by her mental, as by her personal charms. She came to Rome, where her learning recommended her to all the literati of the age. She married Septimius Severus, who, twenty years after this matrimonial connection, was invested with the imperial purple. Severus was guided by the prudence and advice of Julia, but he was blind to her foibles, and often punished with the greatest severity those vices which were enormous in the empire. She is even said to have conspired against the emperor, but she resolved to blot, by patronizing literature, the spots which her debauchery and extravagance had rendered indelible in the eyes of virtue. Her influence, after the death of Severus, was for some time productive of tranquillity and cordial union between his two sons and successors. Geta, at last, however, fell a sacrifice to his brother Caracalla, and Julia was even wounded in the arm while she attempted to screen her favourite son from his brother's dagger. According to some, Julia committed incest with her son Caracalla, and publicly married him. She starved herself when her ambitious views were defeated by Marcianus, who aspired to the empire in preference to her, after the death of Caracalla.

JULIANUS, a son of Julius Constantius, the brother of Constantine the Great, born at Constantinople. The massacre which attended the elevation of the sons of Constantine the Great to the throne, nearly proved fatal to Julian and to his brother Gallus. The two brothers were privately educated together, and taught the doctrines of the Christian religion, and exhorted to be modest, temperate, and to despise the gratification of all sensual pleasures. Gallus received the instructions of his pious teachers with deference and submission, but Julian showed his dislike for Christianity by secretly cherishing a desire to become one of the votaries of Paganism. He gave sufficient proofs of this propensity when he went to Athens in the 24th year of his age, where he applied himself to the study of magic and astrology. He was some time after appointed over Gaul, with the title of Cæsar, by Constans, and there he showed himself worthy of the imperial dignity by his prudence, valour, and the numerous victories he obtained over the enemies of Rome in Gaul and Germany. His mildness, as well as his condescension, gained him the hearts of his soldiers ; and when Constans, to whom Julian was become suspected, ordered him to send him part of his forces to go into the east, the army immediately mutinied, and promised immortal fidelity to their leader, by refusing to obey the orders of Constans.

They even compelled Julian, by threats and intreaties, to accept the title of independent emperor and of Augustus ; and the death of Constans, which soon after happened, left him sole master of the Roman empire, A. D. 361. Julian then disclosed his religious sentiments, and publicly disavowed the doctrines of Christianity, and offered solemn sacrifices to all the gods of ancient Rome. This change of religious opinion was attributed to the austerity with which he received the precepts of Christianity, or, according to others, to the literary conversation and persuasive eloquence of some of the Athenian philosophers. From this circumstance, therefore, Julian has been called Apostate. After he had made his public entry at Constantinople, he determined to continue the Persian war, and check those barbarians who had for 60 years derided the insolence of the Roman emperors. When he had crossed the Tigris, he burned his fleet, and advanced with boldness into the enemy's country. His march was that of a conqueror. He met with no opposition from a weak and indigent enemy ; but the country of Assyria had been left desolate by the Persians, and Julian, without corn or provisions, was obliged to retire. As he could not convey his army again over the streams of the Tigris, he took the resolution of marching up the sources of the river, and imitate the bold return of the ten thousand Greeks. As he advanced through the country he defeated the officers of Sapor, the king of Persia; but an engagement proved fatal to him, and he received a deadly wound as he animated his soldiers to battle. He expired the following night, the 27th of June, A. D. 363, in the 32d year of his age. His last moments were spent in a conversation with a philosopher about the immortality of the soul, and he breathed his last without expressing the least sorrow for his fate, or the suddenness of his death. Julian's character has been admired by some, and censured by others; but the malevolence of his enemies arises from his apostasy. As a man and as a monarch he demands our warmest commendation, but we must blame his idolatry and despise his bigoted principles. He was moderate in his successes, merciful to his enemies, and amiable in his character. He abolished the luxuries which reigned in the court of Constantinople, and dismissed with contempt the numerous officers which waited upon Constantius, to anoint his head or perfume his body. He was frugal in his meals, and slept little, reposing himself on a skin spread on the ground. He awoke at midnight, and spent the rest of the night in reading or writing, and issued early from his tent to pay his daily visits to the guard around the camp. He was not fond of public amusements, but rather dedicated his time to study and solitude. When he passed through Antioch in his Persian expedition, the inhabitants of the place, offended at his religious sentiments, ridiculed his person, and lampooned him in satirical verses. The emperor made use of the same arms for his defence, and rather than destroy his enemies by the sword, he condescended to expose them to derision, and unveil their follies and debaucheries in an humorous work, which he called Misopogon, or beard-hater. He imitated the virtuous example of Scipio and Alexander, and laid no temptation for his virtue by visiting some female captives that had fallen into his hands. In his matrimonial connexions, Julian rather consulted policy than inclination, and his marriage with the sister of Constantius arose from his unwillingness to offend his benefactor rather than to obey the laws of nature. He was buried at Tarsus, and afterwards his body was conveyed to Constantinople. He distinguished himself by his writings as well as by his military character. Besides his misopogon he wrote the history of Gaul. He also wrote two letters to the Athenians; and besides, there are now extant sixty-four letters on various subjects. His Cæsars is the most famous of all his compositions, being a satire upon all the Roman emperors from J. Cæsar to Constantine. It is written in the form of a dialogue, in which the author severely attacks the venerable character of M. Aurelius whom he had proposed to himself as a pattern, and speaks in a scurrilous and abusive language of his relation Constantine. It has been observed of Julian, that, like Cæsar, he would employ at the same time his hand to write, his ear to listen, his eyes to read, and his mind to dictate. [The emperor Julian adopted every means by which, without openly persecuting Christianity, he might degrade it, and cause its followers to fall into contempt. A philosopher himself, he believed that there existed no surer mode of restoring paganism at the expense of the new religion, than by confounding the latter through the means of a work full of strong arguments, and in which satire should not be spared. A man of letters, he wanted not a large portion of self-complacency and conceit; and it appeared to him that no one was more proper to be the author of such a work than he who had studied the spirit of the two contending systems of religion, and who had publicly declared himself the patron of a form of worship fast sinking into oblivion, and the enemy of a religion, to the triumph of which the safety and the dignity of his own family appeared so intimately attached. Such, no doubt, were the reasons which induced Julian to enter the lists against Christianity. He wrote his work during the winter evenings which he spent at Antioch, in the last year of his life. Surrounded by pagan philosophers, who expected from this prince the complete re-establishment of the religion of their fathers, with which in their blindness they connected the renovation of the splendour and power of the Roman empire, the imperial author was encouraged by their suffrages, and no doubt aided by their abilities. Apollinarius of Laodicea repulsed the attack of Julian by the arms of reason alone; exposing, in a treatise which he wrote "on Truth," the dogmas of the heathen philosophers respecting God, and that, too, without calling in the aid of the Holy Scriptures at all. This work of Apollinarius must have been composed in a very short time after the appearance of the emperor's treatise, since Julian appears to have read it before he quitted Antioch, March 5th, A. D. 363. Julian pretended to contemn his opponent, and wrote to certain bishops of the Church this paltry jeu de mots; Ανεργων, εργων, κατεργων. "I have read, comprehended, and condemned it." To this, one of them, probably St. Basil, replied; Ανεργως, αλλ' ουκ εργως: ει γαρ εργως, ουκ αν κατεργως. "Thou hast read, but not comprehended it; for if thou hadst comprehended it thou would not have condemned it." Fifty years, however, elapsed before the work of Julian was completely refuted by productions carefully composed, and entering into a detail of the sophisms which had been advanced against Christianity and the person of its founder. Either the subject was considered in the interval as completely exhausted, or else the dreadful catastrophe which terminated the reign of Julian, and which was viewed as a punishment inflicted by divine vengeance, had caused his writings to fall into neglect. After the period of time above alluded to, Philip of Side, St. Cyrill of Alexandria, and Theodoret, undertook the task of completely prostrating the arguments of the Apostate emperor, and it is to the work of St. Cyrill that we owe our knowledge of a part of that of Julian. From this source we learn that it was divided into seven books, each of small extent; and that the first three bore this title, Ἀναστροφή των Ευαγγελίων, "the overthrow of the Gospels." These are the only ones which St. Cyrill has taken the trouble to refute. It is easy to perceive that an adroit Sophist, such as Julian was, could easily give to his work a specious appearance, calculated to impose on weak and shallow minds, especially when the author himself was surrounded with all the adventitious circumstances of rank and power. The mode adopted by Julian of appearing to draw his arguments against Christianity from the Scriptures themselves, gives an air of candour and credibility to a work; but it requires no great acumen to show that Julian either did not understand, or else affected to misunderstand the doctrines which he combated; and that he has perverted facts, and denied indubitable truths. It was by the aid of the refutation of St. Cyrill, mentioned above, that the Marquis D'Argens undertook in the 18th century to restore the lost work of Julian. It was published in Greek and French. Had the object of this individual been to manifest to the world the errors of the Roman apostate, and to teach the pretended philosophers of the day, how little philosophy has to advance that is worthy of reliance, when religion is the theme, his undertaking would have been a laudable one. But such was not the end which the Marquis D'Argens had in view. If he did not dare to declare openly for Julian, he yet could find a thousand reasons for excusing his conduct. The consequence has been that the French philosopher has been completely refuted by two German scholars, Meier and Crichton, especially the latter. Meier's work was published at Halle in 1764, and Crichton's at the same place, in 1765. The best edition of his works is that of Spanheim, fol. Lips. 1696; and of the Cæsars, that of Heusinger, 8vo. JUNIUS D. Silanus, a Roman who committed adultery with Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus, &c. Tacit. Ann. 3, c. 24.—Brutus. [vid. Brutus.]

JUNO, a celebrated deity among the ancients, daughter of Saturn and Ops. She was sister to Jupiter, Pluto, Neptune, Vesta, Ceres, &c. She was born at Argos, or, according to others, in Samos, and was intrusted to the care of the Seasons, or, as Homer and Ovid mention, to Oceanus and Tethys. Some of the inhabitants of Argolis supposed that she had been brought up by the three daughters of the river Asterion; and the people of Stymphalus, in Arcadia, maintained that she had been educated under the care of Temenus, the son of Pelasgus. Juno was devoured by Saturn, according to some mythologists; and, according to Apollodorus, she was again restored to the world by means of a potion which Metis gave to Saturn, to make him give up the stone which his wife had given him to swallow instead of Jupiter. [vid. Saturnus.] Jupiter was not insensible to the charms of his sister: and the more powerfully to gain her confidence, he changed himself into a cuckoo, and raised a great storm, and made the air unusually chill and cold. Under this form he went to the goddess, all shivering. Juno pitied the cuckoo and took him into her bosom. When Jupiter had gained these advantages, he resumed his original form, and obtained the gratification of his desires, after he had made a solemn promise of marriage to his sister. The nuptials of Jupiter and Juno were celebrated with the greatest solemnity: the gods, all mankind, and all the brute creation, attended. Chelone, a young woman, was the only one who refused to come, and who derided the ceremony. For this impiety, Mercury changed her into a tortoise, and condemned her to perpetual silence; from which circumstance the tortoise has always been used as a symbol of silence among the ancients. By her marriage with Jupiter, Juno became the queen of all the gods, and mistress of heaven and earth. Her conjugal happiness, however, was frequently disturbed by the numerous amours of her husband, and she showed herself jealous and inexorable in the highest degree. Her severity to the mistresses and illegitimate children of her husband was unparalleled. She persecuted Hercules and his descendants with the most inveterate fury; and her resentment against Paris, who had given the golden apple to Venus in preference to herself, was the cause of the Trojan war, and of all the miseries which happened to the unfortunate house of Priam. Her severities to Alcmena, Ino, Athamas, Semele, &c. are also well known. Juno had some children by Jupiter. According to Hesiod, she was mother of Mars, Hebe, and Ilithya, or Lucina; and besides these, she brought forth Vulcan, without having any commerce with the other sex, but only by smelling a certain plant. This was in imitation of Jupiter, who had produced Minerva from his brain. According to others, it was not Vulcan, but Mars, or Hebe, whom she brought forth in this manner, and this was after eating some lettuces at the table of Apollo. The daily and repeated debaucheries of Jupiter at last provoked Juno to such a degree, that she retired to Eubœa and resolved for ever to forsake his bed. Jupiter procured a reconciliation, after he had applied to Cithæron for advice, and after he had obtained forgiveness by fraud and artifice. [vid. Dædala.] This reconciliation, however cordial it might appear, was soon dissolved by new offences; and to stop the complaints of the jealous Juno, Jupiter had often recourse to violence and blows. He even punished the cruelties which she had exercised upon his son Hercules, by suspending her from the heavens by a golden chain, and tying a heavy anvil to her feet. Vulcan was punished for assisting his mother in this degrading situation, and he was kicked down from heaven by his father, and broke his leg by the fall. This punishment rather irritated than pacified Juno. She resolved to revenge it, and she engaged some of the gods to conspire against Jupiter and to imprison him, but Thetis delivered him from this conspiracy, by bringing to his assistance the famous Briareus. Apollo and Neptune were banished from heaven for joining in the conspiracy, though some attribute their exile to different causes. The worship of Juno was universal, and even more than that of Jupiter, according to some authors. Her sacrifices were offered with the greatest solemnity. She was particularly worshipped at Argos, Samos, Carthage, and afterwards at Rome. The ancients generally offered on her altars an ewe lamb and a sow the first day of every month. No cow was ever immolated to her, because she assumed the nature of that animal when they went into Egypt in their war with the giants. Among the birds, the hawk, the goose, and particularly the peacock, often called Junonia avis, vid. Argus, were sacred to her. The dittany, the poppy, and the lily, were her favourite flowers. The latter flower was originally of the colour of the crocus; but, when Jupiter placed Hercules to the breasts of Juno while asleep, some of the milk fell down upon earth, and changed the colour of the lilies from purple to a beautiful white. Some of the milk also dropped in that part of the heavens which from its whiteness, still retains the name of the milky way, lactea via. As Juno's power was extended over all the gods, she often made use of the goddess Minerva as her messenger. The goddess Iris, however, was the one most commonly employed. Her temples were numerous, the most famous of which were at Argos, Olympia, &c. At Rome no woman of debauched character was permitted to enter her temple, or even to touch it. The surnames of Juno are various; they are derived either from the function, or things over which she presided, or from the place where her worship was established. She was the queen of the heavens; she protected cleanliness, and presided over marriage and childbirth, and particularly patronized the most faithful and virtuous of her sex, and severely punished incontinence and lewdness in matrons. She was the goddess of all power and empire, and she was also the patroness of riches. She is represented sitting on a throne with a diadem on her head, and a golden sceptre in her right hand. Some peacocks generally sat by her, and a cuckoo often perched on her sceptre, while Iris behind her displayed the thousand colours of her beautiful rainbow. She is sometimes carried through the air in a rich chariot drawn by peacocks. The Roman consuls, when they entered upon office were always obliged to offer her a solemn sacrifice. The Juno of the Romans was called Matrona or Romana. She was generally represented as veiled from head to foot, and the Roman matrons always imitated this manner of dressing themselves, and deemed it indecent in any married woman to leave any part of her body but her face uncovered. She has received the surname of Olympia, Samia, Lacedæmonia, Argiva, Telchinia, Candrena, Rescintes, Prosymna, Imbrasia, Acreea, Cithæronia, Bunea, Ammonia, Fluonia, Anthea, Migale, Gemelia, Tropeia, Boopis, Teleia, Zera, Egophage, Hyperchinia, Juga, Ilithyia, Lucina, Pronuba, Caprotina, Mena, Pupulonia, Lacinia, Sospita, Moneta, Curis, Domiduca, Febura, Opigenia, &c. *Cic. de Nat. JŪPITER, the most powerful of all the gods of the ancients. [vid. the end of this article.]

According to Varro, there were no less than 300 persons of that name; Diodorus mentions two; and Cicero three, two of Arcadia, and one of Crete. To that of Crete, who passed for the son of Saturn and Ops, the actions of the rest have been attributed. According to the opinion of the mythologists, Jupiter was saved from destruction by his mother, and intrusted to the care of the Corybantes. Saturn, who had received the kingdom of the world from his brother Titan on condition of not raising male children, devoured all his sons as soon as born; but Ops, offended at her husband's cruelty, secreted Jupiter, and gave a stone to Saturn, which he devoured on the supposition that it was a male child. Jupiter was educated in a cave on Mount Ida in Crete, and fed upon the milk of the goat Amalthæa, or upon honey according to others. He received the name of Jupiter, quasi juvenis pater. [vid. the end of this article.] His cries were drowned by the noise of cymbals and drums, which the Corybantes beat at the express command of Ops. [vid. Corybantes.] As soon as he was a year old, Jupiter found himself sufficiently strong to make war against the Titans, who had imprisoned his father because he had brought up male children. The Titans were conquered, and Saturn set at liberty by the hands of his son. Saturn, however, soon after, apprehensive of the power of Jupiter, conspired against his life, and was for this treachery driven from his kingdom, and obliged to fly for safety into Latium. Jupiter, now become the sole master of the empire of the world, divided it with his brothers. He reserved for himself the kingdom of heaven, and gave the empire of the sea to Neptune, and that of the infernal regions to Pluto. The peaceful beginning of his reign was soon interrupted by the rebellion of the giants, who were sons of the earth, and who wished to revenge the death of their relations the Titans. They were so powerful that they hurled rocks, and heaped up mountains upon mountains, to scale heaven, so that all the gods to avoid their fury fled to Egypt, where they escaped from the danger by assuming the form of different animals. Jupiter, however, animated them, and by the assistance of Hercules, he totally overpowered the gigantic race, which had proved such tremendous enemies. [vid. Gigantes.] Jupiter, now freed from every apprehension, gave himself up to the pursuit of pleasures. He married Metis, Themis, Euronyme, Ceres, Mnemosyne, Latona, and Juno. [vid. Juno.] He became a Proteus to gratify his passions. He introduced himself to Danae in a shower of gold, he corrupted Antiope in the form of a satyr, and Leda in the form of a swan. He became a bull to seduce Europa, and he enjoyed the company of Ægina in the form of a flame of fire. He assumed the habit of Diana to corrupt Callisto, and became Amphitryon to gain the affections of Alcmena. His children were also numerous as well as his mistresses. According to Apollodorus, 1, c. 3, he was father of the Seasons. Irene. Eu-

nomia, the Fates, Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, by Themis; of Venus, by Dione; of the Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia, by Euronyme, the daughter of Oceanus; of Proserpine, by Styx; of the nine Muses, by Mnemosyne, &c. (vid. Niobe, Laodamia, Pyrrha, Protogenia, Electra, Maia, Semele, &c.) The worship of Jupiter was universal; he was the Ammon of the Africans, the Belus of Babylon, the Osiris of Egypt, &c. His surnames were numerous, many of which he received from the place or function over which he presided. He was severally called Jupiter Feretrius, Inventor, Elicius, Capitulinus, Latialis, Pistor, Sponsor, Herceus, Anxurus, Victor, Maximus, Optimus, Olympius, Fluvialis, &c. The worship of Jupiter surpassed that of the other gods in solemnity. His altars were not, like those of Saturn and Diana, stained with the blood of human victims, but he was delighted with the sacrifice of goats, sheep, and white bulls. The oak was sacred to him because he first taught mankind to live upon acorns. He is generally represented as sitting upon a golden or ivory throne, holding in one hand, thunderbolts, just ready to be hurled, and in the other, a sceptre of cypress. His looks express majesty, his beard flows long and neglected, and the eagle stands with expanded wings at his feet. He is sometimes represented with the upper parts of his body naked, and those below the waist carefully covered, as if to show that he is visible to the gods above, but that he is concealed from the sight of the inhabitants of the earth. Jupiter had several oracles, the most celebrated of which were at Dodona, and Ammon in Lybia. As Jupiter was the king and father of gods and men, his power was extended over the deities, and every thing was subservient to his will, except the Fates. From him mankind received their blessings and their miseries, and they looked upon him as acquainted with every thing past, present, and future. He was represented at Olympia with a crown like olive branches, his mantle was variegated with different flowers, particularly by the lily, and the eagle perched on the top of the sceptre which he held in his hand. The Cretans represented Jupiter without ears, to signify that the sovereign master of the world ought not to give a partial ear to any particular person, but be equally candid and propitious to all. At Lacedæmon he appeared with four heads, that he might seem to hear with greater readiness the different prayers and solicitations which were daily poured to him from every part of the earth. It is said that Minerva came all armed from his brains when he ordered Vulcan to open his head. [According to most mythologists, the fable of Jupiter is to be explained by the history of an ancient monarch, or rather by that of several princes who bore the appellation, the best known of whom was a king of Crete, whose history is filled with the adventures of the rest. Jupiter of Crete, say the expounders of ancient fable, having banished from that island his father Saturn, and having overthrown the Titans and Giants, determined to make his subjects happy. He became possessed in the course of time of a vast empire, which he divided into different vicerealties. Atlas governed the frontiers of Africa; Pluto was appointed governor of the west of Gaul and of Spain; which command was transferred, on his death, to Mercury. Mercury having greatly signalized himself became the great deity of the Celtæ. Neptune was ruler of the maritime forces of this mighty empire, while Jupiter reserved for his own controul, Greece, the isles of the Archipelago, together with that part of Asia whence his progenitors came. According to Hesiod, he was seven times married, and the last of his wives was named Juno. He is said to have lived to the age of 120 years, during 62 of which he reigned, and to have been buried in Crete, where his tomb was for a long time shown near Gnossus, with this epitaph, "Here lies Zan, who was called Jupiter." Banier reckons his reign to have begun B. C. 1842, and to have terminated B. C. 1780. Thus far the explanation of modern mythologists. Unfortunately for this solution, the foundation on which it rests appears to be entirely visionary. The Cretans were notorious in the ancient world for their propensity to falsehood. They were openly stigmatized by the advocates and supporters of the pagan system of belief, for their utter disregard of truth, in affirming that Jupiter reigned over them prior to his Apotheosis, and in showing strangers the tomb where the remains of this deified mortal reposed, to the great scandal of all true believers. To this trait in the character of his countrymen, Epimenides, as quoted by St. Paul, (1 Titus, v. 12.) directly alludes when he says Κρητες αι ψευσται, "The Cretans are always liars." As he passed for a prophet among them, they dared not contradict his assertion. Let us now consider the subject in its etymological relations. The name Jupiter, as Salmasius observes, is not directly derived from the Greek Ζευ πατερ, but is formed in imitation of it, the oblique cases coming from Ζευς, with a change of ζ into j, as jugum from ζυγον. The primitive Greeks appear to have called the Deity by a name of oriental origin, Ζευς; or rather, according to the Doric form of speech, Σευς; and, according to the Æolic, Δευς, whence the Latin Deus. As regards this variation in dialect it may be observed, that the letter Z was, as is well known, no other than ΣΔ, or ΔΣ, expressed by one character; and, in the refinement of the language and variation of dialects, the Σ was frequently dropped, as appears from the very ancient medals of Zancle in Sicily, inscribed ΔΑΝΚΔΕ. In the genuine parts, moreover, of the Iliad and Odyssey, there is no instance of a vowel continuing short before ΔΕΟΣ, ΔΕΙΝΟΣ, ΔΕΙΔΩ, &c.; so that the initial was originally a double consonant, probably ΣΔ; which at first became ΔΔ, and afterwards Δ, though the metre of the old

bards has preserved the double time in the utterance. We have said above that the name Ζεὺς, i. e. Δεὺς, is of Oriental origin. It appears in fact to be only a varied form of the term Δις, which in the old Persian denoted "the Heavens," as Herodotus (1, 131.) informs us. In the mythology of India, the lord of the air is styled Divespiter, as in that of the Latins, Diespiter. (Horat. Carm. 1, 34, 5.—Varro L. L. 4, 10.—Gellius. 5, 12.) This name comes in the latter language from dies and pater; and dies, "day," i. e. the light of heaven, will come from the Oriental dis, "the heavens," whence the expression in Latin, Sub deo, "beneath the sky." Again, from the Oriental Dis, or perhaps a form of it more nearly analogous to Δεὺς, appears to have been derived the Egyptian Theuth or Thoth. Of the same origin appears to be the Gothic Thiut, "good," whence the term good itself is no doubt to be deduced, and from this last, God. In like manner Θεὸς may be regarded as a derivative from Theuth. The Greeks, however, ignorant of its Oriental origin, sought to discover a source for it in their own tongue. Hence they either derived it from Θεῶν, "I run," in reference to the perpetual motion of the sun and stars, with which the deity was confounded; or from Θεῶν, "I place," from his placing in order the universe. The first of these derivations, fanciful as they both are, bears a curious resemblance to the probable origin of the Greek term σεβόμενοι, "I worship," which points to Sabaism, or the worship of the heavenly bodies, as the early religious system of Greece. The primitive religion of the Greeks may be divided into four distinct periods. 1. The empire of Uranus: 2. that of Kronos: 3. that of Jupiter: and 4. that of Dionysus or Bacchus. During the first of these periods, the heavens were the object of human worship and contemplation, Uranus being nothing more than the Greek Οὐρανός, "heaven." Hence the early Greek religion appears to have been nothing else but Sabaism. This is confirmed by the fact of the Titans being nearly all personifications of the heavenly bodies. Thus Hyperion implies "the one who moves on high," i. e. the Sun; and the Latin poets frequently put Titan for the sun, as also Orpheus in his Argonautics, v. 510. Κοῖος imports "the one who burns;" he is the father of Asterio, (αστήρ, "a star.") and the husband of Phæbe, i. e. "the bright-shining." Κριός means "the ram," i. e. Aries, one of the constellations of the zodiac; his sons are, Pallas, "he that moves to and fro;" Perseus, "he who destroys," alluding perhaps to the inauspicious influence of the dog-star; and Astræus, of the same derivative origin with the term Astræa. The prevalence of Sabaism among the early Greeks is also distinctly pointed out by the etymology of the word αστήρ, "a star," which appears to be only an abbreviation, in fact, of the term Astarte, the famed Syrian goddess, "the queen of heaven," as she is styled by Milton; or, as others pretend, the moon.

The second great period in the religion of Greece, was the empire of Kronos. Human worship consisted no longer in the mere contemplative adoration of the heavens and the splendid luminaries which moved on high; but the universe was divided into distinct and separate existences, and the gods of the earlier mythology, with altered appellations, became blended with this new creation of celestial intelligences. This was a change from the eternal heavens to what was comparatively temporal, and hence it was styled the empire of Kronos, (a name importing "time," χρόνος). In other words, mythology now assumed a physical character. The offspring of Kronos were, Zeus (the upper regions of the atmosphere, Aether.) Herè (Juno, the lower regions of the atmosphere, Aer;) Poseidon (Neptune, the waters of the sea;) Hestia (Vesta, the earth;) Demeter (Ceres, the surface of the earth, the nourishing mother;) Proserpina (the corn shooting forth from the surface, seges proserpens;) Hades (the invisible place, the under-world). The third period is the reign of Zeus, or Jupiter. The dethronement of Saturn by Jupiter is merely a figurative mode of expressing that the system of religion just detailed was superseded by a later one. In the progressive refinement of the human mind, an attempt was made to reconcile and blend together the two earlier systems of Uranus and Kronos. To the worship of the mere natural divisions of the universe were now attempted to be joined feelings of a contemplative and more elevated character. Zeus, the Aether, became the supreme deity, who not only manifested his power, in a physical sense, by Thunder and Lightning, but likewise, in a moral sense, by Wisdom (Metis) and Justice (Themis). The twin-children which Jupiter begat by Leto (Latona, i. e. concealment, night;) were Apollo or Phœbus, and Artemis or Diana, originally the Sun and Moon, (in the kingdom of Uranus, Koios and Phœbe.) The first of these now denoted the male or generating, the second, the female or producing, principle. In the gradual development of this idea, Apollo, or the Sun, the creative, animating, supporting and nourishing principle of our system, was represented in poetic imagery as the god of poetry, of music, of medicine, of prophecy, and as feeding in the character of a shepherd the flocks of Admetus. Artemis, or Diana, on the other hand, as the Moon, (whose course through the heavens regulated the months of the early lunar year, and whose influence was regarded by the ancients, in common with that of the Sun, as one of the fertilizing principles of nature, and as exerted chiefly amid woods and wilds, at a distance from the habitations of men,) became with the poets the aiding and help-bringing goddess, she who presided over child-birth, (the period of gestation in the womb being computed by a certain number of revolutions of the moon) and the goddess also of the chase. Herè, (Juno) the majestic, powerful, but quick tempered and unattractive wife of Jove, as symbolical of the powerful, stormy, and mutable nature of the atmosphere, serves as a connecting link between what is ethereal and what is earthly. In a moral sense she was emblematic of the external might of Jupiter, while Pallas or Minerva represented his internal might, that is, his wisdom and creative energies. Hence the nature of Pallas, a lofty, high-minded, pure virgin, sprung into being from the brain of the father of the Gods. The external might of Jupiter was next considered as subdividing itself into two separate classes, with reference to the distinctive qualities of manhood and womanhood, becoming in the former case, wild and lawless might, in the latter female grace and loveliness: hence, in accordance with the best mythological authorities, Jupiter and Juno became the parents of Mars and of Venus. Jupiter having produced Pallas of himself, the jealous Juno, desirous of manifesting her own individual power, became the mother of Hephæstus, (Vulcan, the symbol of fire) by merely smelling of a certain plant. But external might, acting by itself, without any controuling law (i. e. without Jupiter) and in direct opposition to the dictates of wisdom (i. e. Juno being jealous of the origin and existence of Pallas) can only produce what is deformed and worthy of being ridiculed. Hence the personal defects of Vulcan, and hence too, partaking of the changeable nature of his mother, although not possessing himself a perfect form, he can represent all forms by the powers of his art. In other words, the air produced from itself the elementary fire. Being an artist, Vulcan naturally seeks for beauty (Venus) whom he espouses, but who, loathing his person, prefers the embraces of the god Mars; in other words, female beauty and loveliness find their most natural and congenial union with the highest graces of manhood. The agent, attendant, and messenger of the gods in the kingdom of Jupiter is Mercury, a son of Jupiter and Maia, for speech is the offspring of the divinity, and when applied to earthly things changes into eloquence. Maia, in Sanscrit, denotes "delusion, deceiving:" hence Mercury became the god of eloquence, of traffic, and even of thieves. The fourth and last period of which we have to treat is the empire of Dionysus or Bacchus. Men regarded no longer with the same exclusive reverence the mere external representations and symbols of deity; religion began to assume more of an ideal character, and mythology became, in a great degree, converted into mysticism. This state of things took its rise when the poetical systems of the pagan faith had yielded to the more philosophical dogmas of the later Pythagoreans and Platonists. It was not, however, in fact the production of these times themselves, but the revival of a dormant principle of the earlier religion of Greece, and its component elements appear to have been the mythology or popular system of belief, which had for so long a time been prevalent, and the philosophical religion, or mystic system, of an earlier age. It is more than probable that the Greeks received both of these constituent elements of their religion from the countries of the east. The latter seems to have come from India by the way of the Caspian Sea, and thence through Thrace. Their mythology, or symbolical and popular religion, must have been derived immediately from Egypt, in which country Sabaism had been carried to such an extent as to have become material in its nature, and to have changed into an animal-worship, taking its rise from the constellations of the zodiac, and into what may be termed a calendar-religion. The imaginative and poetic spirit of the Greeks converted these animal into graceful human forms; but the animals which accompany the statues of the Grecian deities, as the owl of Minerva, the eagle of Jupiter, the peacock of Juno, &c. clearly point to the existence of an animal worship in earlier times. Hence may be explained the remark of Herodotus where he makes the names of the Grecian divinities partly Egyptian and partly Pelasgic. As regards the northern or Thracian origin of a part of the religion of the Greeks, it may be observed that it was in Thrace the Muses first showed themselves; and it was from this same country that a tradition which loses itself in the most remote antiquity, makes to have come the mysteries, a part of their religion entirely national, as well as their sacred poetry. All appears plain if we assume as a fact that the Pelasgi were a sacerdotal race, and a people who came from the north. The mountains of Thessaly, Olympus, Helicon, Parnassus and Pindus, were the sanctuaries of this sacred poetry. There the lyre and harp were invented. In Thessaly and in Bœotia, two provinces which, in after days, were so barren of men of genius, there is not a brook, not a river, not a hill, not even a forest, to which poetry has not attached some enchanting or moving recollection. There flowed the gassy waters of the Peneus, there was the vale of Tempe, there Apollo, banished from the skies, shrouded the glories of his godhead, and lived as a shepherd in the midst of a happy race, and there too the Titans warred with the divinities of Olympus.] Paus. 1, 2, &c.—Liv. 1, 4, 5, &c.—Diod. 1 and 3.—Homer. Il. 1, 5, &c. Od. 1, 4, &c.—*Hymn. ad. JUSTINUS M. JUNIANUS, a Latin historian in the age of Antoninus, who epitomized the history of Trogus Pompeius. This epitome, according to some traditions, was the cause that the comprehensive work of Trogus was lost. [vid. remarks under the article Trogus Pompeius.] It comprehends the history of the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, Macedonian, and Roman empires, &c. in a neat and elegant style. It is replete with many judicious reflections, and animated harangues; but the author is often too credulous, and sometimes examines events too minutely, while others are related only in a few words too often obscure. The indecency of many of his expressions is deservedly censured. The best editions of Justin are that of Ab. Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1719, that of Hearne, 8vo. Oxon. 1703, and that of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1770. — Martyr, a Greek father, formerly a Platonic philosopher, born in Palestine. He died in Egypt, and wrote two apologies for the Christians, besides his dialogue with a Jew, two treatises, &c. in a plain and unadorned style. The best editions of Justin Martyr are that of Paris, fol. 1742. [Of his first apology that of Grabe, Oxon. 1700, in 8vo. and of his second that of Hutchin, Oxon. 1703; of his dialogue with Tryphon, that of Jebb, Lond. 1719.] — An emperor of the east who reigned nine years, and died A. JUTURNA, a sister of Turnus, king of the Rutuli. She heard with contempt the addresses of Jupiter, or, according to others, she was not unfavourable to his passion, so that the god rewarded her love with immortality. She was afterwards changed into a fountain of the same name near the Numicus, falling into the Tiber. The waters of that fountain were used in sacrifices, and particularly in those of Vesta. They had the power to heal diseases. Varro de L. L. 1, c. 10. — Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 708. l. 2, v. 585. — Virg. Æn. 12, v. 139 — Cic. Cluent. 36.

JUVENĀLIS, Decius Junius, a poet born at Aquinum in Italy. He came early to Rome and passed some time in declaiming; after which he applied himself to write satires. 16 of which are extant. He spoke with virulence against the partiality of Nero for the pantomime Paris, and though all his satire and declamation were pointed against this ruling favourite of the emperor, yet Juvenal lived in security during the reign of Nero. After the death of Nero, the effects of the resentment of Paris were severely felt, and the satirist was sent by Domitian as governor on the frontiers of Egypt. [This is incorrect. Juvenal composed his first satire in the reign of Domitian: it was directed against a comedian named Paris, an individual all powerful under that prince. Juvenal, however, did not dare to publish his productions until a long time after this. Thus Quintilian, who wrote his Institutes of the orator in the year 92 of our era, makes no mention of Juvenal among the Latin satirists, though it is thought by some that he had him in view when he says, "we possess at the present day some distinguished ones, who will be named hereafter." It was under Trajan that he wrote most of his satires. The 13th and 15th were composed under Adrian. At this period he recited his works in public and gained universal applause. In the 7th, however, where mention is made of Paris, Adrian thought that a favourite comedian of his was aimed at, and under the pretence of conferring an honour upon the aged satirist, named him prefect of a legion stationed at Syene in Upper Egypt. According to others he was sent to Pentapolis in Africa; according to a third account, to one of the Oases, an ordinary abode of exiles. He died there a few years after. We have 16 of his satires remaining. In some editions they are divided into five books, of which the first contains five satires; the second, one; the third, three; the fourth, as many; and the fifth, the last four.] Juvenal was then in the 80th year of his age. His writings are fiery and animated, and they abound with humour. He is particularly severe upon the vice and dissipation of the age he lived in; but the gross and indecent manner in which he exposes to ridicule the follies of mankind, rather encourages than disarms the debauched and licentious. He wrote with acrimony against all his adversaries, and whatever displeased or offended him was exposed to his severest censure. It is to be acknowledged that Juvenal is far more correct than his contemporaries, a circumstance which some have attributed to his judgment and experience, which were uncommonly mature, as his satires were the productions of old age. He may be called, and with reason, perhaps, the last of the Roman poets. After him poetry decayed, and nothing more claims our attention as a perfect poetical composition. The best editions are those of Caubon, 4to. L. Bat. 1695, with Persius, and of Hawkey, Dublin, 12mo. 1746, and of Gravii cum notis variorum, 8vo. L. Bat. 1684. [By far the best edition now is that of Rupertii, Lips. 1819, 2 vols. 8vo.]

JUVENTAS or JUVENTUS, a goddess at Rome, who presided over youth and vigour. She is the same as the Hebe of the Greeks, and represented as a beautiful nymph, arrayed in variegated garments. Liv. 5, c. 54, l. 21, c. 62, l. 36, c. 36. — Ovid. ex Pont. 1, ep. 9, v. 12.

IXION, a king of Thessaly, son of Phlegas, or, according to Hyginus, of Leontes, or, according to Diodorus, of Antion by Perimela, daughter of Amythaon. He married Dia, daughter of Eioneus or Deioneus, and promised his father-in-law a valuable present for the choice he had made of him to be his daughter's husband. His unwillingness, however, to fulfil his promises, obliged Deioneus to have recourse to violence to obtain it, and he stole away some of his horses. Ixion concealed his resentment under the mask of friendship; he invited his father-in-law to a feast at Larissa, the capital of his kingdom, and when Deione-us was come according to the appointment, he threw him into a pit which he had previously filled with wood and burning coals. This premeditated treachery so irritated the neighbouring prince, that all of them refused to perform the usual ceremony, by which a man was then purified of murder, and Ixion was shunned and despised by all mankind. Jupiter had compassion upon him, and he carried him to heaven, and introduced him at the tables of the gods. Such a favour, which ought to have awakened gratitude in Ixion, served only to inflame his lust; he became enamoured of Juno, and attempted to seduce her. Juno was willing to gratify the passion of Ixion, though, according to others, she informed Jupiter of the attempts which had been made upon her virtue. Jupiter made a cloud in the shape of Juno, and carried it to the place where Ixion had appointed to meet Juno. Ixion was caught in the snare, and from his embrace with the cloud, he had the Centaurs, or, according to others, Centaurus. [vid. Centauri.] Jupiter, displeased with the insolence of Ixion, banished him from heaven; but when he heard that he had seduced Juno, the god struck him with his thunder, and ordered Mercury to tie him to a wheel in hell which continually whirls round. The wheel was perpetually in motion, therefore the punishment of Ixion was eternal. Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 62.—Pindar. 2. Pyth. 2.—Virg. G. 4, v. 434.—Æn. 6, v. 601.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 210 and 338.—Philostr. ic. 2, c. 3.—Lactant. in Th. 2.—One of the Heraclidæ, who reigned at Corinth for 57 or 37 years. LABARUM, [the banner or standard borne before the Roman emperors in war. It consisted of a long lance or pike, with a staff at the top crossing it at right angles, from which hung a rich streamer of a purple colour adorned with precious stones, and curiously wrought with the images of the reigning monarch and his children. Until the time of Constantine this standard had an eagle painted upon it, but that emperor introduced in lieu of it a mysterious monogram at once expressive of the figure of the cross and the two initial letters of the names of Christ. vid. Constantine. The safety of the Labarum was entrusted to 50 guards of approved valour and fidelity, their station was marked by honours and emoluments, and some fortunate accidents soon introduced the opinion that as long as the guards of the Labarum were engaged in the execution of their office, they were secure and invulnerable amid the darts of the enemy. The name is derived by some from labor, by some from λαβαια, reverence, by some from λαμβανειν, to take, and by some from λαφυρα, spoils. The form of the Labarum and monogram may be seen on the medals of the Flavian family.]

LABDÆCUS, a son of Polydorus by Nycteis, the daughter of Nycteus, king of Thebes. His father and mother died during his childhood, and he was left to the care of Nycteus, who at his death left his kingdom in the hands of Lycus, with orders to restore it to Labdacus as soon as of age. He was father to Laius. It is unknown whether he ever sat on the throne of Thebes. According to Statius his father's name was Phoenix. His descendants were called Labdacides. *Stat. LÆBO, Antistius, a celebrated lawyer in the age of Augustus, whose views he opposed, and whose offers of the consulship he refused. His works are lost. He was wont to enjoy the company and conversation of the learned for six months, and the rest of the year was spent in writing and composing. [He wrote a number of books, chiefly relating to Jurisprudence. Aulus Gellius refers frequently to the commentaries of Læbo, on the twelve tables. vid. Antistius.] His father, of the same name, was one of Cæsar's murderers. He killed himself at the battle of Philippi. He assisted Terence in composing his comedies, according to some.—Actius, an obscure poet who recommended himself to the favour of Nero by an incorrect translation of Homer into Latin. The work is lost, and only this curious line is preserved by an old scholiast, Perseus, 1, v. 4, Crudum manducis Priamum, Priamicus Pisinno.

LÆBERIUS, J. Decimus, a Roman knight famous for his poetical talents in writing pantomimes. J. Cæsar, in the height of his power, urged him to act one of his characters on the stage. The poet consented with great reluctance, but he showed his resentment during the acting of the piece, by throwing severe aspersions upon J. Cæsar, by warning the audience against his tyranny, and by drawing upon him the eyes of the whole theatre. [Læberius was sixty years of age when this occurrence took place. He seems to have had no alternative left, and to have acted in obedience to the commands of the Dictator, who wished to make the Romans forget their civil dissensions amid the amusements of scenic exhibitions. The office of comedian was regarded at Rome as disgraceful for a free man, and above all for a knight. Laberius, in assuming this revolting character, addressed to the audience a justification of his conduct, in a prologue which may be regarded as one of the finest monuments of Roman literature, and which causes us deeply to regret the loss of his mimes. Laberius expressed himself with the spirit of a freeman and republican, and no one can read the composition in question without a feeling of admiration for the man who, in the midst of a character which would have degraded another, preserves his own dignity so fully unimpaired. We know not the subject of the piece in which he appeared, but Macrobius, who has preserved this anecdote and the prologue, cites some verses of it, one of which is become a proverb. Necesse est multos timent, quem multi timent, said the author, and in an instant all eyes were turned upon Cæsar—Whether offended at the freedom of Laberius, or whether prompted by a sense of justice, Cæsar awarded the prize to Publius Syrus, who had contended with the aged knight.] Cæsar, however, restored him to the rank of knight, which he had lost by appearing on the stage; but to his mortification, when he went to take his seat among the knights no one offered to make room for him, and even his friend Cicero said, Recepissem te nisi angustè sederem. Laberius was offended at the affectation and insolence of Cicero, and reflected upon his unsettled and pusillanimous behaviour during the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, by the reply of Mirum si angustè sedes, qui soles duobus sellis sedere. Liborius died ten months after the murder of J. Cæsar. Some fragments remain of his poetry. Macrob. Sat. 2, c. 3 and 7.—Horat. 1, Sat. 10.—Senec. de Controv. 18.—Suet. in Cæs. 39.

LÄBYRINTHUS, a building whose numerous passages and perplexing windings render the escape from it difficult, and almost impracticable. [Suidas derives the term παγα του μη λαβιν θυρα.] There were four very famous among the ancients, one near the city of crocodiles or Arsinoe, another in Crete, a third at Lemnos, and a fourth in Italy built by Porsenna. That of Egypt was the most ancient, and Herodotus, who saw it, declares that the beauty and the art of the building were almost beyond belief. It was built by twelve kings who at one time reigned in Egypt, and it was intended for the place of their burial, and to commemorate the actions of their reign. [Diodorus Siculus says, that it was built as a sepulchre for Mendes; Strabo states that it was near the sepulchre of the king who built it, which was probably Ismandes. Pomponius Mela speaks of it as built by Psammitichus; but as Menes or Ismandes is mentioned by several, possibly he might be one of the 12 kings of greatest influence and authority, who might have the chief ordering and directing of this great building, and as a peculiar honour, might have his sepulchre apart from the others.] It was divided into 12 halls, or, according to Pliny, into 16, or, as Strabo mentions, into 27. The halls were vaulted according to the relation of Herodotus. They had each six doors, opening to the north, and the same number to the south, all surrounded by one wall. The edifice contained 3000 chambers, 1500 in the upper part, and the same number below. The chambers above were seen by Herodotus, and astonished him beyond conception, but he was not permitted to see those below, where were buried the holy crocodiles, and the monarchs whose munificence had raised the edifice. The roofs and wall were incrustated with marble, and adorned with sculptured figures. The halls were surrounded with stately and polished pillars of white stone, and, according to some authors, the opening of the doors was artfully attended with a terrible noise like peals of thunder. The labyrinth of Crete was built by Dædalus, in imitation of that of Egypt, and it is the most famous of all in classical history. It was the place of confinement for Dædalus himself, and the prison of the Minotaur. According to Pliny, the labyrinth of Lemnos surpassed the others in grandeur and magnificence. It was supported by forty columns of uncommon height and thickness, and equally admirable for their beauty and splendour. [Larcher, after a long investigation of the subject, finally determines the position of the Egyptian labyrinth to have been at Sennour, in opposition to the authority of Pococke, the Abbé Banier, Savary, and others. The word Labyrinth, taken in its literal sense, signifies a circumscribed place intersected by a number of passages, some of which cross each other in every direction like those in quarries and mines, and others make larger or smaller circuits around the place from which they depart, like the spiral lines that are visible on certain shells. Hence, it has been applied in a figurative sense to obscure and captious questions, to indirect and ambiguous answers, and to those discussions which, after long digressions, bring us back to the point from which we set out.] Mela, 1, c. 9.—Plin. 36, c. 13.—Strab. 10.—Dioid. 1.—Herodot. 2, c. 148.—*Virg. It was also called Hecatompolis from the hundred cities which the whole province once contained. His descendants, 13 in number, reigned successively after him, till the reign of the sons of Orestes, when the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponnesus, about 80 years after the Trojan war. C. 1102, their successors in the family of Procles were called Proclidæ, and afterwards Eurypontidæ, and those of Eurysthenes, Eurysthenidæ, and afterwards Agidæ. The successors of Procles on the throne began to reign in the following order: Sous, 1069 B. C. after his father had reigned 42 years: Eurypon, 1023: Prytanis, 1021: Eunomus, 986: Polydectes, 907: Lycurgus, 898: Charilaus, 873: Nicander, 809: Theopompus, 770: Zeuxidamus, 723: Anaxidamus, 690: Archidamus, 651: Agasicles, 605: Ariston, 564: Demaratus, 529: Leotychides, 491: Archidamus, 469: Agis, 427: Agesilaus, 397: Archidamus, 361: Agis 2d, 338: Eudamidas, 330: Archidamus, 295: Eudamidas 2d, 268: Agis, 244: Archidamus, 230: Euclidas, 225: Lycurgus, 219.—The successors of Eurysthenes were Agis, 1059: Echestratus, 1058: Labotas, 1023: Doryssus, 986: Agesilaus, 957: Archelaus, 913: Teleclus, 853: Alcamenes, 813: Polydorus, 776: Eurycrates, 724: Alexander, 687: Eurycrates 2d, 644: Leon, 607: Anandrides, 563: Cleomenes, 530: Leonidas, 491: Plistarchus, under guardianship of Pausanias, 480: Plistoanax, 466: Pausanias, 408: Agesipolis, 397:

Cleombrotus, 380: Agesipolis 2d, 371: Cleomenes 2d, 370: Arteus or Areus, 309: Acrotatus, 265: Areus 2d, 264: Leonidas, 257: Cleombrotus, 243: Leonidas restored, 241: Cleomenes, 235: Agesipolis, 219. Under the two last kings, Lycurgus and Agesipolis, the monarchical power was abolished, though Machanidas the tyrant made himself absolute, B. C. 210, and Nabis, 206, for 14 years. In the year 191 B. C. Lacedæmon joined the Achæan league, and about three years after the walls were demolished by order of Philopœmen. The territories of Laconia shared the fate of the Achæan confederacy, and the whole was conquered by Mummius, 147 B. C. and converted into a Roman province. The inhabitants of Lacedæmon have rendered themselves illustrious for their courage and intrepidity, for their love of honour and liberty, and for their aversion to sloth and luxury. They were inured from their youth to labour, and their laws commanded them to make war their profession. They never applied themselves to any trade, but their only employment was arms, and they left every thing else to the care of their slaves. [vid. Helotæ.] They hardened their body by stripes and other manly exercises; and accustomed themselves to undergo hardships, and even to die without fear or regret. From their valour in the field, and their moderation and temperance at home, they were courted and revered by all the neighbouring princes, and their assistance was severally implored to protect the Sicilians, Carthaginians, Thracians, Egyptians, Cyreneans, &c. They were forbidden by the laws of their country [vid. Lycurgus,] to visit foreign states, lest their morals should be corrupted by an intercourse with effeminate nations. The austere manner in which their children were educated, rendered them undaunted in the field of battle, and from this circumstance, Leonidas with a small band was enabled to resist the millions of the army of Xerxes at Thermopylæ. The women were as courageous as the men, and many a mother has celebrated with festivals the death of her son who had fallen in battle, or has coolly put him to death if, by a shameful flight or loss of his arms, he brought disgrace upon his country. As to domestic manners, the Lacedæmonians as widely differed from their neighbours at in political concerns, and their noblest women were not ashamed to appear on the stage hired for money. In the affairs of Greece, the interest of the Lacedæmonians was often powerful, and obtained the superiority for 500 years. Their jealousy of the power and greatness of the Athenians is well known. The authority of their monarchs was checked by the watchful eye of the Ephori, who had the power of imprisoning the kings themselves if guilty of misdemeanors. [vid. Ephori.] The Lacedæmonians are remarkable for the honour and reverence which they paid to old age. The names of Lacedæmon and Sparta are promiscuously applied to the capital of Laconia, and often confounded together. The latter was applied to the metropolis, and the former was reserved for the inhabitants of the suburbs, or rather of the country contiguous to the walls of the city. This propriety of distinction was originally observed, but in process of time it was totally lost, and both appellatives were soon synonymous, and indiscriminately applied to the city and country. [The Lacedæmonians, after having for nearly 500 years controuled the politics of Greece, had their supremacy wrested from them by Epaminondas in the battles of Leuctra and Mantinea. After this, by refusing to take part in the Achæan league, they fell under the power of domestic tyrants, and finally into the hands of the Romans. Augustus allowed them to retain the name of freedom, and to be exempt from tribute. Vespasian deprived them of this privilege, and added their country to the province of Achai. The Eleuthero-Lacones, the Spartans to whom Augustus had granted the favour above named, and who were composed partly of the inhabitants dwelling around the capital, and of Helots, possessed at one period 24 cities. In the time of Justinian Slavonic tribes had found their way into Laconia; the Milengi and Ezeritæ settled themselves in this country, and maintained their independence amid the mountains of Taygetus. The old inhabitants, however, did not intermingle with these new-comers, but retired from their approach, and are at the present day known by the name of Mainotes from their chief fortress Maina. During the middle ages Albanian hordes came in, settled in the land, and became blended into one people with the Slavi. The Peloponnesus at this time was held by petty princes of the imperial family at Constantinople, who made Misitra their residence. The Turks succeeded them as masters of Greece. It is very remarkable that the Jews, who were, as a nation, extremely reserved, should claim kindred with the Lacedæmonians, and that these in return should allow the kindred, after examining their archives. Bryant supposes that the Lacedæmonians were originally emigrants from the same country as Abraham. Stephanus quotes Claudius Iolaus as deriving the Jews from an ancestor named Judæus Spartan; or the family styled Sparti. If this means a people who were dispersed, or pilgrims, or emigrants, there is no doubt but the character belongs to the descendants of Abraham. Besides, a possibility exists that some of the early kinsmen of the Jewish patriarchs, instead of going east to settle, might establish themselves in the west. If Ishmael, for instance, had done so, his posterity nevertheless would have been related to the sons of Isaac; or, if Esau had done so, his descendants might have claimed kin to the sons of Jacob. We have no history of such an occurrence, observes Dr. Wells, from whom the above is taken; but if Esau, or part of his family settled in Rome, as the Rabbins affirm, it is not improbable that some other branch of Abraham's posterity should settle in Greece. If there be any truth in the story above related, and on which Dr. Wells has rather too fancifully, and, we may add, loosely commented, it may perhaps consist in making the Pelasgi (an oriental people, and evidently a sacerdotal caste) the connecting link between the people of Lacedæmon and Judea. Josephus has preserved the letter which passed on the occasion above alluded to, between the Jewish high-priest and the Spartans.] Liv. 34, c. 33, l. 45, c. 28.—Strab. 8.—Thucyd. 1.—Paus. 3.—Justin. 2, 3, &c.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Plut. in Lyc. &c.—Diod.—Mela. 2.—There were some festivals celebrated at Lacedæmon, the names of which are not known. LACEDÆMONI and LACEDÆMONES, the inhabitants of Lacedæmon. [vid. Lacedæmon.]

LACEDÆMŌNIUS, a son of Cimon by Clitoria. He received this name from his father's regard for the Lacedæmonians. Plut.

LACHESIS, one of the Parcæ, whose name is derived from λαχων, to measure out by lot. She presided over futurity, and was represented as spinning the thread of life, or, according to others, holding the spindle. She generally appeared covered with a garment variegated with stars, and holding spindles in her hand. (vid. Parcæ.) Stat. Theb. 2, v. 249.—Martial. 4, ep. 54.

LACIDAS. [vid. Lacides.]

LACIDES, a village near Athens, which derived its name from Lacijs, an Athenian hero, whose exploits are unknown. Here Zephyrus had an altar sacred to him, and likewise Ceres and Proserpine a temple. Paus. 1, c. 37.

LACINIA, a surname of Juno, from her temple at Lacinium in Italy, which the Grotonians held in great veneration. [It was held in high veneration likewise by all the surrounding nations. The entire territory adjacent to the temple was sacred to the goddess, and in it herds of cattle fed without any keepers. From the produce of these the inhabitants of Crotona obtained enough to procure a column of gold which they offered up in honour of the goddess. It was said that Annibal ascertained by actual boring the solidity of this column. This sanctuary seems to have been venerated also by both Carthaginians and Romans. It was reserved for the Roman censor, Fulvius Flaccus to be guilty of the first profanation of so sacred a place. Being engaged in erecting a splendid temple at Rome to Fortuna Equestris, he stripped off one half of the marble tiles which covered the temple of Juno, and adorned with them his new edifice. In the following year he went crazy and hung himself. This was regarded as a visitation from heaven for the sacrilege which he had committed, and the senate ordered the tiles to be restored: but no artist could be found to replace them in their former order and beauty. The Romans in succeeding ages were less scrupulous, and the vengeance of the goddess less active. The riches of the temple gradually disappeared, by whom or when is not known. Large ruins remain of the sacred building at the present day, and one large column, standing on the promontory, gives the cape the name of Capo delle Colonne.] Strab. 6.—Ovid. 15, Met. v. 12 and 702.—Liv. 42, c. 3.—*Val. LACINIUM [Promontorium, a promontory of Italy, at the south-eastern extremity of the territory of the Brutii. Here Juno Lacinia had a famous temple. vid. Lacinia.]

LACOBRIÇA, [a town of Lusitania, near the Sacrum Promontorium, now Lagos.] Here Sertorius was besieged by Metellus.

LACŌNIA, [a country of Peloponnesus, situate at its southern extremity, having Messenia on the west, and Arcadia and Argolis on the north. The extent of Laconia from east to west, where it reached farthest, was 1° 45', but it became narrower towards the north, and its extent from north to south was about 50 miles. As the southern parts were encompassed by the sea, and the east and north-east parts by the Sinus Angolicus, it had a great number of promontories, the chief of which were those of Malea and Tænarus, now Capes Malio and Matapan. The sea-coast of Laconia was furnished with a considerable number of sea-ports, towns, and commodious harbours, the chief of which were Trinassus, Acria, Gythium, and Epidaurus. The Laconian coasts were famous for yielding a shell-fish, whence was obtained a beautiful purple dye, inferior only to that which was brought from the Red Sea and Phœnicia. The mountains of Laconia were numerous, the most famous was Tægetus. Its principal river was the Eurotas, on which stood the capital, Sparta or Lacedæmon. The soil was very rich, especially in the low grounds, and, being well watered, was excellent for pasture; but the number of its mountains and hills prevented its being tilled so well as it might otherwise have been. The term Laconic is often applied to the peculiar mode of speaking adopted by the ancient Spartans, namely, of expressing themselves in short and pithy sentences. [vid. remarks at the end of the article Lacedæmon.]

LACTANTIUS, a celebrated Christian writer, [generally called Lucius Cælius, or Cæcilius Firmianus, the most eloquent of the Latin Fathers. He flourished towards the close of the third and beginning of the fourth century. Some have conjectured that he was born at Firmum in Italy, and hence called Firmianus; but as he was a disciple of Arnobius, who taught rhetoric at Sicca in Africa, this was probably the country of his nativity. During the greater part of his life he was in very indigent circumstances, often wanting the necessaries of life.] His principal works are de irâ divinâ, de Dei operibus, and his divine institutions, in seven books, in which he proves the truth of the Christian religion, refutes the objections and attacks the illusions and absurdities of Paganism. The expressive purity, elegance, and energy of his style have gained him the name of the Christian Cicero. He died A. D. 325.—The best editions of his works are that of Sparke, 8vo. Oxon. 1684, that of Bineman, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1789, and that of Du Fresnoy, 2 vols, 4to. Paris, 1748.

LACŪDES, [a philosopher of Cyrene, who filled the chair of the Platonic school at Athens after the death of Arcesilaus. He assumed this office in the 4th year of the 134th Olympiad. He is said to have been the founder of a new school, not because he introduced any new doctrines, but because he changed the place of instruction, and held his school in the garden of Attalus, still, however, within the limits of the Academic grove. He died of a palsy, occasioned by excessive drinking, in the second year of the 141st Olympiad.]

LADON, a river of Arcadia falling into the Alpheus. [According to Mr. Gell, it receives the waters of the lakes of Orchomenos and Pheneos.] The metamorphosis of Daphne into a laurel, and of Syrinx into a reed, happened near its banks. Strab. 1.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Paus. 8, c. 25.—*Ovid. LÆLAPS, one of Actæon's dogs. Ovid. Met. 3.—The dog of Cephalus, given him by Procris. (vid. Lelaps, &c.) Id. Met. 7.

LÆLIANUS, a general, proclaimed emperor in Gaul by his soldiers, A. D. 268, after the death of Gallienus. His triumph was short; he was conquered and put to death after a few months' reign by another general called Posthumus, who aspired to the imperial purple as well as himself.

C. LÆLIUS, a Roman consul, A. U. C. 614, surnamed Sapiens, so intimate with Africanus the younger, that Cicero represents him in his treatise De Amicitia, as explaining the real nature of friendship, with its attendant pleasures. He made war with success against Viriathus. It is said, that he assisted Terence in the composition of his comedies. His modesty, humanity, and the manner in which he patronized letters, are celebrated as his greatness of mind and integrity in the character of a statesman. Cic. de Orat.—Another consul who accompanied Scipio Africanus the elder in his campaign in Spain and Africa.—Archelaus, a famous grammarian. Suet.

LÆNA and LEÆNA, the mistress of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Being tortured because she refused to discover the conspirators, she bit off her tongue, totally to frustrate the violent efforts of her executioners.—A man who was acquainted with the conspiracy formed against Cæsar.

LÆRTEES, a king of Ithaca, son of Arce-sius and Chalcomedusa, who married Anticlea, the daughter of Autolycus. Anticlea was pregnant by Sisyphus when she married Laertes, and eight months after her union with the king of Ithaca she brought forth a son called Ulysses. [vid. Anticlea.] Ulysses was treated with paternal care by Laertes, though not really his son, and Laertes ceded to him his crown and retired into the country, where he spent his time in gardening. He was found in this mean employment by his son at his return from the Trojan war, after 20 years' absence, and Ulysses, at the sight of his father, whose dress and old age declared his sorrow, long hesitated whether he should suddenly introduce himself as his son, or whether he should, as a stranger, gradually awaken the paternal feelings of Laertes, who had believed that his son was no more. This last measure was preferred, and when Laertes had burst into tears at the mention which was made of his son, Ulysses threw himself on his neck, exclaiming, "O father, I am he whom you weep." This welcome declaration was followed by a recital of all the hardships which Ulysses had suffered, and immediately after the father and son repaired to the palace of Penelope, the wife of Ulysses, whence all the suitors who daily importuned the princess were forcibly removed. Laertes was one of the Argonauts, according to Apollodorus, 1, c. 9.—Homer. Od. 11 and 24.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 32.—Heroid. 1, v. 98.—A city of Cilicia which gave birth to Diogenes, surnamed Laertius, from the place of his birth.

LÆSTRYGONES, the most ancient inhabitants of Sicily. Some suppose them to be the same as the people of Leontium, and to have been neighbours to the Cyclops. They fed on human flesh, and when Ulysses came on their coasts, they sunk his ships and devoured his companions. [vid. Antiphates.] They were of a gigantic stature, according to Homer, who however does not mention their country, but only speaks of Lamus as their capital. [Bochart explains this fable, by supposing that the Læstrygons were anciently called Leontini, a name derived from their barbarous and cruel manners. The location of the Læstrygones, however, in Sicily, seems to have been a mere arbitrary arrangement on the part of those who pretended to elucidate the mythological narratives of Homer. The poet, on the contrary, places the Læstrygones and the Cyclops at a wide distance from each other. Equally fabulous is the account given by some of the ancient writers, that a colony of Læstrygones passed over into Italy, with Lamus at their head, and built the city of Formiæ. When once the respective situations of Circe's island and that of Æolus were thought to have been ascertained, it became no very difficult matter to advance a step farther, and, as the Læstrygones lay, according to Homer, between these two islands, to make Formiæ on the Italian coast a city of that people. Formiæ was, however, in truth of Pelasgic origin, and seems to have owed a large portion of its prosperity to a Spartan colony. The name appears to come from the Greek 'Oguzai, and to have denoted a good harbour.] Plin. 3, c. 5.—*Ovid. LÆTORIA LEX, ordered [that the plebeian magistrates should be elected at the Comitia Tributa: passed A. U. C. 292.]—[Another, A. U. C. 490, against the defrauding of Minors. By this law the years of minority were limited to twenty-five, and no one below that age could make a legal bargain.] Cic. de Offic. 3.

LÆVINUS, a Roman consul sent against Pyrrhus, A. U. C. 474. He informed the monarch that the Romans would not accept him as an arbitrator in the war with Tarentum, and feared him not as an enemy. He was defeated by Pyrrhus.

LAGUS, a Macedonian of mean extraction. He received in marriage Arsinoe the daughter of Meleager, who was then pregnant of king Philip, and being willing to hide the disgrace of his wife, he exposed the child in the woods. An eagle preserved the life of the infant, fed him with her prey, and sheltered him with her wings against the inclemency of the air. This uncommon preservation was divulged by Lagus, who adopted the child as his own, and called him Ptolemy, conjecturing, that as his life had been so miraculously preserved, his days would be spent in grandeur and affluence. This Ptolemy became king of Egypt after the death of Alexander. According to other accounts, Arsinoe was nearly related to Philip king of Macedonia, and her marriage with Lagus was not considered as dishonourable, because he was opulent and powerful. The first of the Ptolemies is called Lagus, to distinguish him from his successors of the same name. Ptolemy, the first of the Macedonian kings of Egypt, wished it to be believed that he was the legitimate son of Lagus, and he preferred the name of Lagides to all other appellations. It is even said that he established a military order in Alexandria, which was called Lageion. The surname of Lagides was transmitted to all his descendants on the Egyptian throne till the reign of Cleopatra, Antony's mistress. Plutarch mentions an anecdote, which serves to show how far the legitimacy of Ptolemy was believed in his age. A pedantic grammarian, says the historian, once displaying his great knowledge of antiquity in the presence of Ptolemy, the king suddenly interrupted him with the question of, Pray tell me, sir, who was the father of Peleus? Tell me, replied the grammarian, without hesitation, tell me if you can, O king! who the father of Lagus was? This reflection on the meanness of the monarch's birth did not in the least excite his resentment, though the courtiers all glowed with indignation. Ptolemy praised the humour of the grammarian, and showed his moderation and the mildness of his temper, by taking him under his patronage. Paus. Attic.—Justin. 13.—Curt. 4.—Plut. de virâ cohob. —Lucan. 1, v. 684.—Ital. 1, v. 196.

LAGÿRA, a city of Taurica Chersonesus.

LAIÆDES, a patronymic of Œdipus son of Laius. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 18.

LAIUS, a celebrated courtesan, daughter of Timandra the mistress of Alcibiades, born at Hyccara in Sicily. She was carried away from her native country into Greece, when Nicias the Athenian general invaded Sicily. She first began to sell her favours at Corinth for 10,000 drachmas, and the immense number of princes, noblemen, philosophers, orators, and plebeians who courted her embraces, show how much commendation is owed to her personal charms. The expenses which attended her pleasures gave rise to the proverb of Non cuius homini contingit adire Corinthum. Even Demosthenes himself visited Corinth for the sake of Lais, but when he was informed by the courtesan, that admittance to her bed was to be bought at the enormous sum of about 200l. English money, the orator departed, and observed, that he would not buy repentance at so dear a price. The charms which had attracted Demosthenes to Corinth had no influence upon Xenocrates. When Lais saw the philosopher unmoved by her beauty, she visited his house herself; but there she had no reason to boast of the licentiousness or easy submission of Xenocrates. Diogenes the cynic was one of her warmest admirers, and though filthy in his dress and manners, yet he gained her heart and enjoyed her most unbounded favours. The sculptor Mycon also solicited the favours of Lais, but he met with coldness; he, however, attributed the cause of his ill reception to the whiteness of his hair, and dyed it of a brown colour, but to no purpose; Fool that thou art, said the courtesan, to ask what I refused yesterday to thy father. Lais ridiculed the austerity of philosophers, and laughed at the weakness of those who pretend to have gained a superiority over their passions, by observing that the sages and philosophers of the age were not above the rest of mankind, for she found them at her door as often as the rest of the Athenians. The success which her debaucheries met at Corinth encouraged Lais to pass into Thessaly, and more particularly to enjoy the company of a favourite youth called Hippostratus. She was, however, disappointed; the women of the place, jealous of her charms, and apprehensive of her corrupting the fidelity of their husbands, assassinated her in the temple of Venus, about 340 years before the Christian era. Some suppose that there were two persons of this name, a mother and her daughter. Cic. ad Fam. 9, ep. 26.—Ovid. Amor. 1, el.—Plut. in Alcib.—Paus. 2, c. 2.

LAIUS, a son of Labdacus, who succeeded to the throne of Thebes, which his grandfather Nycteus had left to the care of his brother Lycus, till his grandson came of age. He was driven from his kingdom by Amphion and Zethus, who were incensed against Lycus for the indignities which Antiope had suffered. He was afterwards restored, and married Jocasta the daughter of Creon. An oracle informed him that he should perish by the hand of his son, and in consequence of this dreadful intelligence he resolved never to approach his wife. A days spent in debauch and intoxication made him violate his vow, and Jocasta brought forth a son. The child, as soon as born, was given to a servant, with orders to put him to death. The servant was moved with compassion, and only exposed him on Mount Cithæron, where his life was preserved by a shepherd. The child, called Œdipus, was educated in the court of Polybus, and an unfortunate meeting with his father in a narrow road proved his ruin. Laius ordered his son to make way for him, without knowing who he was; Œdipus refused, and, in the contest which ensued, slew his father. [*vid. LÆMIA, a town of Thessaly, at the bottom of the Sinus Maliacus or Lamiacus, and north of the river Sperchius, famous for a siege it supported after Alexander's death. [vid. Lamiacum.] Diod. 16, &c.—Paus. 7, c. 6.—A river of Greece, opposite Mount Œta.

LÆMIA and AUXESIA, two deities of Crete, whose worship was the same as at Eleusis. The Epidaurians made them two statues of an olive tree given them by the Athenians, provided they came to offer a sacrifice to Minerva at Athens. Paus. 2, c. 30, &c.

LAMIACUM BELLUM happened after the death of Alexander, when the Greeks, and particularly the Athenians, incited by their orators, resolved to free Greece from the garriſons of the Macedonians. Leosthenes was appointed commander of a numerous force, and marched against Antipater, who then presided over Macedonia. Antipater entered Thessaly at the head of 13,000 foot, and 600 horse, and was beaten by the superior force of the Athenians and of their Greek confederates. Antipater, after this blow, fled to Læmia, B. C. 323, where he resolved, with all the courage and sagacity of a careful general, to maintain a siege with about the 8 or 9000 men that had escaped from the field of battle. Leosthenes, unable to take the city by storm, began to make a regular siege. His operations were delayed by the frequent sallies of Antipater; and Leosthenes being killed by the blow of a stone, Antipater made his escape out of Læmia, and soon after, with the assistance of the army of Craterus brought from Asia, he gave the Athenians battle near Crannon, and though only 500 of their men were slain, yet they became so dispirited, that they sued for peace from the conqueror. Antipater at last with difficulty consented, provide they raised taxes in the usual manner, received a Macedonian garrison, defrayed the expenses of the war, and lastly delivered into his hands Demosthenes and Hyperides, the two orators whose prevailing eloquence had excited their countrymen against him. These disadvantageous terms were accepted by the Athenians, yet Demosthenes had time to escape and poison himself. Hyperides was carried before Antipater, who ordered his tongue to be cut out, and afterwards put him to death. Plut. in Demost.—Diod. 17.—Justin. 11. &c.

LAMIAE, small islands of the Ægean, opposite Troas. Plin. 5. c. 31.—A celebrated family at Rome, descended from Lamus.—Certain monsters of Africa, who had the face and breast of a woman, and the rest of the body like that of a serpent. They allured strangers to come to them, that they might devour them, and though they were not endowed with the faculty of speech, yet their hissings were pleasing and agreeable. Some believe them to be witches, or rather evil spirits, who, under the form of a beautiful woman, enticed young children and devoured them. According to some, the fable of the Lamia is derived from the amours of Jupiter with a certain beautiful woman called Lamia, whom the jealousy of Juno rendered deformed, and whose children she destroyed; upon which Lamia became insane, and so desperate that she ate up all the children that came in her way. They are also called Lemures (vid. Lemures.) Philostr. in Ap.—Horat. Art. Poet. v. 340.—Plut de Curios.—Dion.

LAMPÉDO, a woman of Lacedæmon, who was daughter, wife, sister, and mother of a king. She lived in the age of Alcibiades, Agrippina, the mother of Claudius, could boast the same honours. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 22 and 37.—Plut. in Age.—Plato in 1, Alc.—Plin. 7, c. 41.

LAMPETIA, a daughter of Apollo and Nææra. She, with her sister Phæusa, guarded her father's flocks in Sicily when Ulysses arrived on the coasts of that island. These flocks were fourteen in number, seven herds of oxen and seven flocks of sheep, consisting each of fifty. They fed by night as well as by day, and it was deemed unlawful and sacrilegious to touch them. The companions of Ulysses, impelled by hunger, paid no regard to their sanctity, or to the threats and intreaties of their chief; but they carried away and killed some of the oxen. The watchful keepers complained to their father, and Jupiter, at the request of Apollo, punished the offence of the Greeks. The hides of the oxen appeared to walk, and the flesh which was roasting by the fire began to bellow, and nothing was heard but dreadful noises and loud lowings. The companions of Ulysses embarked on board their ships, but here the resentment of Jupiter followed them. A storm arose, and they all perished except Ulysses, who saved himself on the broken piece of a mast. Homer od. 12, v. 113.—Propert. 3, el 12.—According to Ovid. Met. 2, v. 349. Lampetia is one of the Heliades, who was changed into a poplar tree at the death of her brother Phaeton.

LAMPÉTO and LAMPEDO, a queen of the Amazons, who boasted herself to be the daughter of Mars. She gained many conquests in Asia, where she founded many cities. She was surprised afterwards by a band of barbarians, and destroyed with her female attendants. Justin. 2, c. 4.

LAMPRIIDIUS ÆLIUS, a Latin historian in the fourth century, who wrote the lives of some of the Roman emperors. His style is unequalled, and his arrangement injudicious. His life of Commodus, Heliogabalus, Alexander Severus, &c. is still extant, and to be found in the works of the Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores. [The style and arrangement of Lampriidius will not allow him a place among historians of a superior class, yet he is valuable for his facts. He is thought by many critics to be the same with Ælius Spartianus.]

LAMPŒCUS and LAMPŒCUM, [now Lampsaki, a city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, situate on the Hellespont, where it begins to open into the Propontis, and north-east of Abydos. The early name of the spot where Lampæcus stood, was Pityusa, from the number of pine trees which grew there. A Phocæan colony is said to have founded this city, and given it its name, being directed by the oracle to settle wherever they saw lightning first. This took place in the district Pityusa, and hence the name of the city, from λαμπω, luc-o. Another account, however, makes the city to have existed prior to the arrival of the Phocæans, and merely the name to have been changed by them. They aided, it seems, Mandro, king of the Bebryces, against the neighbouring barbarians, and were persuaded by him to occupy a part of his territory. Their successes in war, however, and the spoils they had obtained, excited the envy of the Bebrycians, and the Phocæans would have been secretly destroyed, had not Lampæce, the king's daughter, apprised them of the plot. Out of gratitude to her, they called the city Lampæcus, having destroyed the former inhabitants. The neighbouring country was termed Aparnis, because Venus, who here was delivered of Priapus, was so disgusted with his appearance, that she disowned (ἀρνήσατο) him for her offspring.] Priapus was the chief deity of the place. His temple there was the asylum of lewdness and debauchery, and exhibited scenes of the most unnatural lust, and hence the epithet Lampæcus is used to express immodesty and wantonness. Alexander resolved to destroy the city on account of the vices of its inhabitants, or more probably for its firm adherence to the interest of Persia. It was, however, saved from ruin by the artifice of Anaximenes, vid. Anaximenes. The wine of Lampsacus was famous, and therefore a tribute of wine was granted from the city by Xerxes to maintain the table of Themistocles. Mela, 1, c. 19.—Strab. 13.—Paus. 9, c. 31.—Herodot. 5, c. 117.—*C. LAMPŒRIA, a festival at Pellene in Achaia, in honour of Bacchus, who was surnamed Lampter from λαμπειν, to shine, because during this solemnity, which was observed in the night, the worshippers went to the temple of Bacchus with lighted torches in their hands. It was also customary to place vessels full of wine in several parts of every street in the city. Paus. 4, c. 21.

LAMUS, a king of the Læstrygones, who is supposed by some to have founded Formiæ in Italy. The family of the Lamie at Rome was, according to the opinion of some, descended from him. Horat. 3, od. 17.—A son of Hercules and Omphale, who succeeded his mother on the throne of Lydia. Ovid. Heroid. 9, v. 54.—Virg.—[A river in the western part of Cilicia Campestris, now the Lanuzo. It gave to the adjacent district the name of Lamotis.]—A town near Formiæ, built by the Læstrygones.

LANCIA, [the name of a town in Lusitania, distinguished by the appellations of Oppidana and Transcudana. The first was on the frontiers of the Lusitani, near the sources of the river Munda, or Mondego. It is now La Guarda. The latter lay to the east of the former, and is now Ciudad Rodrigo. It was called Transcudana, because it lay beyond the Cuda.]

LANGOBARDI, [a people of Germany, located by most writers on the Albis, or Elbe, and the Viadrus, or Oder, in part of what is now called Brandenburg. According to the account, however, of Paulus Diaconus, himself one of this nation, they originally came from Scandinavia, under the name of Wilini, and were called by the German nations, Long Beards, from their appearance. The German term Lang Baerd, latinised, became Langobardi. They seem to have settled on the Elbe, probably in the eastern part of the Dutchy of Lunenburgh. They are the same with the Lombards who overran Italy in a later age, Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 3, p. 170.]

LANUVIUM, a town of Latium, about 16 miles from Rome, on the Appian road. Juno had there a celebrated temple which was frequented by the inhabitants of Italy, and particularly by the Romans, whose consuls, on first entering upon office, offered sacrifices to the goddess. The statue of the goddess was covered with a goat's skin, and armed with a buckler and spear, and wore shoes which were turned upwards in the form of a cone. Cic. pro Mur. de Nat. D. 1, c. 29. pro Milon. 10.—Liv. 8, c. 14.—Ital. 18, v. 364.

LAOBŒTAS or LÄBŒTAS, a Spartan king, of the family of Agidæ, who succeeded his father Echestratus, B. C. 1023. During his reign, war was declared against Argos by Sparta. He sat on the throne for 37 years, and was succeeded by Doryssus, his son. Paus. 3, c. 2.

LÄŒŒŒON, a son of Priam and Hecuba, or, according to others, of Antenor, or of Capys. As being priest of Apollo, he was commissioned by the Trojans to offer a bullock to Neptune to render him propitious. During the sacrifice two enormous serpents issued from the sea, and attacked Laocoon's two sons who stood next the altar. The father immediately attempted to defend his sons, but the serpents falling upon him squeezed him in their complicated wreaths, so that he died in the greatest agonies. This punishment was inflicted upon him for his temerity in dissuading the Trojans to bring into the city the fatal wooden horse which the Greeks had consecrated to Minerva, as also for his impiety in hurling a javelin against the sides of the horse as it entered within the walls. Hyginus attributes this to his marriage against the consent of Apollo, or, according to others, for his polluting the temple by his commerce with his wife Antiope, before the statue of the god. [The famous Laocoon groupe, a piece of statuary representing the death of Laocoon and his children, was executed by Agesander the Rhodian, and Athenodorus and Polidorus, who are believed to have been his sons. The former artist made the figure of Laocoon, the two latter those of the children. It appears that the children were executed separately, and joined to the principal figure, though it was done with such nicety, that in Pliny's time they seemed to be all formed of one block. This celebrated piece of statuary was found in the baths, or rather the palace of Titus, on the very spot where it is described by Pliny to have stood. One arm of the principal figure, (the right) was wanting; but it has been so ably restored, though only in plaster, that the deficiency is said to be scarcely a blemish. It is not certain what modern artist has the merit of this restoration, though it is thought that the arm it now bears was the plaster model of Michael Angelo, who was charged with the task of adding a marble arm, but left the one he had destined for this object unfinished, in a fit of despair.] Virg. Æn. 2, v. 41 and 201.—Hygin. fab. 135.

LÄŒŒÄMIA, a daughter of Acastus and Asytidamia, who married Protesilaus, the son of Iphiclus, king of a part of Thessaly. The departure of her husband for the Trojan war was the source of grief to her, but when she heard that he had fallen by the hand of Hector her sorrow was increased. To keep alive the memory of a husband whom she had tenderly loved, she ordered a wooden statue to be made and regularly placed in her bed. This was seen by one of her servants, who informed Iphiclus, that his daughter's bed was daily defiled by an unknown stranger. Iphiclus watched his daughter, and when he found that the intelligence was false, he ordered the wooden image to be burned, in hopes of dissipating his daughter's grief. He did not succeed. Laodamia threw herself into the flames with the image, and perished. This circumstance has given occasion to fabulous traditions related by the poets, which mention that Protesilaus was restored to life, and to Laodamia, for three hours, and that when he was obliged to return to the infernal regions he persuaded his wife to accompany him. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 447.—Ovid. Her. ep. 13.—Hygin. fab. 104.—Propert. 1, el. 19.—A daughter of Bellerophon by Achemone the daughter of king Iobates. She had a son by Jupiter, called Sarpedon. She dedicated herself to the service of Diana, and hunted with her, but her haughtiness proved fatal to her, and she perished by the arrows of the goddess. Homer. Il. 6, 12 and 16.

LAÖDICE, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba, who became enamoured of Acamas, son of Theseus, when he came with Diomedes from the Greeks to Troy with an embassy to demand the restoration of Helen. She obtained an interview and the gratification of her desires at the house of Philebia, the wife of a governor of a small town of Troas which the Greek ambassador had visited. She had a son by Acamas, whom she called Munitus. She afterwards married Helicon son of Antenor, and Telephus king of Mysia. Some call her Astyoche. According to the Greek scholiast of Lycophron, Laodice threw herself down from the top of a tower and was killed when Troy was sacked by the Greeks. Dic. t. Cret. 1.—Paus. 13, c. 26.—Homer. Il. 3 and 6.—A sister of Mithridates who married Ariarathes king of Cappadocia, and afterwards her own brother Mithridates. During the secret absence of Mithridates, she prostituted herself to the servants, in hopes that her husband was dead: but when she saw her expectations frustrated, she attempted to poison Mithridates, for which she was put to death.—A sister and wife of Antiochus 2d.—The mother of Seleucus. Nine months before she brought forth she dreamt that Apollo had introduced himself into her bed, and had presented her with a precious stone, on which was engraved the figure of an anchor, commanding her to deliver it to her son as soon as born. This dream appeared the more wonderful when in the morning she discovered in her bed a ring answering the same description. Not only the son that she brought forth, called Seleucus, but also all his successors of the house of the Seleucidæ, had the mark of an anchor upon their thigh. Justin.—Appian. in Syr. mentions this anchor, though in a different manner.

LAÖDICEA, now Ladik, [a city of Phrygia, in the south-western angle of the country. It was situate on the river Lycus, and stood on the borders of Phrygia, Caria, and Lydia. Its situation coincides exactly with that of Cydrara mentioned by Herodotus. (vid. Cydrara.) Pliny, however, makes its early name to have been Diopolis, changed subsequently to Rhoas. It contained three boundary stones, as being on the borders of three provinces, and hence is commonly called by the ecclesiastical writers Trimetaria. Its name of Laodicea was given to it by Antiochus Theos, in honour of his wife Laodice. He re-established it. Under the Romans, it became a very flourishing commercial city.]—[Scabiosa, a city of Syria, west of Emesa and of the Orontes. It is sometimes, though erroneously, styled Laodicea Cabiosa. The epithet Scabiosa must have reference to the leprosy, or some cutaneous complaint very prevalent here in the time of the Roman power. Its previous name under the Greeks was Laodicea ad Libanum.]—[Ad Mare, a maritime city of Syria, on an eminence, near the coast. It lay opposite the eastern extremity of Cyprus, and is now Latikië.]—[Combusta, a city of Asia Minor or Lycaonia, north-west of Iconium. Its name is supposed to be owing to the frequent breaking forth of subterranean fires. Strabo mentions this as peculiarly the case in the parts of Phrygia to the west of Laodicea, which were hence termed Catacecaumene, (κατασκευαυμένη), which is also the Greek term for Combusta.]—[A town of Asia, on the confines of Media and Persis.—A town of Mesopotamia, &c.]

LAÖDICEËNE, a province of Syria, which receives its name from Laodicea, its capital.

LAÖDÖCUS, a son of Antenor, whose form Minerva borrowed to advise Pandarus to break the treaty which subsisted between the Greeks and Trojans. Homer. Il. 4.

LAÖMEDON, son of Ilus, king of Troy, married Strymo, called by some Placia, or Leucippe, by whom he had Podarces, afterwards known by the name of Priam, and Hesione. He built the walls of Troy, and was assisted by Apollo and Neptune, whom Jupiter had banished from heaven, and condemned to be subservient to the will of Laomedon for one year. When the walls were finished, Laomedon refused to reward the labours of the gods, and soon after his territories were laid waste by the god of the sea, and his subjects were visited by a pestilence sent by Apollo. Sacrifices were offered to the offended divinities, but the calamities of the Trojans increased, and nothing could appease the gods, according to the words of the oracle, but annually to expose to a sea-monster a Trojan virgin. Whenever the monster appeared, the marriageable maidens were assembled, and the lot decided which of them was doomed to death for the good of her country. When this calamity had continued for five or six years, the lot fell upon Hesione, Laomedon's daughter. The king was unwilling to part with a daughter whom he loved with uncommon tenderness, but his refusal would irritate more strongly the wrath of the gods. In the midst of his fears and hesitation, Hercules came and offered to deliver the Trojans from this public calamity, if Laomedon promised to reward him with a number of fine horses. The king consented, but when the monster was destroyed, he refused to fulfil his engagements, and Hercules was obliged to besiege Troy, and take it by force of arms. Laomedon was put to death after a reign of 29 years, his daughter Hesione was given in marriage to Telamon, one of the conqueror's attendants, and Podarces was ransomed by the Trojans, and placed upon his father's throne. [vid. Priamus.] According to Hyginus, the wrath of Neptune and Apollo was kindled against Laomedon, because he refused to offer on their altars, as a sacrifice, all the first-born of his cattle, according to a vow he had made. [The meaning of the fable appears to be simply this. Laomedon employed in erecting the walls of Troy certain sums of money consecrated to the use of Apollo and Neptune, and which had been delivered to him by the priests of these deities on his promising to restore the amount. This promise he never fulfilled. Hence he was said to have defrauded the Gods.] Homer. Il. 21.—Virg. Æn. 2 and 9.—Ovid. Met. 11. fab. 6.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Paus. 7, c. 20.—Horat. 3, od. 3.—Hygin. 89.

LĀOMĒDONTIĀDĒ, a patronymic given to the Trojans from Laomedon their king. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 248.

LAPHRIA, a surname of Diana at Patræ in Achaia, where she had a temple with a statue of gold and ivory, which represented her in the habit of a huntress. The statue was made by Menechmus and Soidas, two artists of celebrity. This name was given to the goddess from Laphrius, the son of Delphus, who consecrated the statue to her. There was a festival of the goddess there, called also Laphria, of which Paus. 7, c. 18, gives an account.

LAPHYSTIUM, a mountain in Bœotia, where Jupiter had a temple, whence he was called Laphystius. It was here that Athamas prepared to immolate Phryxus and Helle, whom Jupiter saved by sending them a golden ram, whence the surname and the homage paid to the god. Paus. 9, c. 34.

LĀRĪTĒ, a people of Thessaly. (vid. Laphithus.)

LĀRĪTHUS, a son of Apollo, by Stilbe. He was brother to Centaurus, and married Orsinoe, daughter of Euronymus, by whom he had Phorbos and Periphas. The name of Lapithæ was given to the numerous children of Phorbos and Periphas, or rather to the inhabitants of the country of which they had obtained the sovereignty. The chief of the Lapithæ assembled to celebrate the nuptials of Pirithous, one of their number, and among them were Theseus, Dryas, Hopleus, Mopsus, Phalerus, Exadius, Prolochus, Titaresius, &c. The Centaurs were also invited to partake the common festivity, and the amusements would have been harmless and innocent.

had not one of the intoxicated Centaurs offered violence to Hippodamia, the wife of Pirithous. The Lapithæ resented the injury, and the Centaurs supported their companions, upon which the quarrel became universal, and ended in blows and slaughter. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and they at last were obliged to retire. Theseus among the Lapithæ showed himself brave and intrepid in supporting the cause of his friends, and Nestor also was not less active in the protection of chastity and innocence. This quarrel arose from the resentment of Mærs, whom Pirithous forgot or neglected to invite among the other gods, at the celebration of his nuptials, and therefore the divinity punished the insult by sowing dissension among the festive assembly. (vid. Centauri.) Hesiod has described the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, as also Ovid, in a more copious manner. The invention of bits and bridles for horses is attributed to the Lapithæ. *Virg. G. 3, v. 115. Æn. 6, v. 601, l. 7, v. 305.—Ovid. LARA or LARANDA, one of the Naiads, daughter of the river Almon in Latium, famous for her beauty and her loquacity, which her parents long endeavoured to correct, but in vain. She revealed to Juno the amours of her husband Jupiter with Juturna, for which the god cut off her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her to the infernal regions. The messenger of the gods fell in love with her by the way, and gratified his passion. Lara became mother of two children, to whom the Romans have paid divine honours, according to the opinion of some, under the name of Lares. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 599.

LARENTIA and LAURENTIA, a courtesan in the first ages of Rome. (vid. Acca.)

LARES, gods of inferior power at Rome, who presided over houses and families. They were two in number, sons of Mercury by Lara. (vid. Lara.) In process of time their power was extended not only over houses, but also over the country and the sea, and we find Lares Urbani to preside over the cities, Familiares over houses, Rustici over the country, Campitales over cross roads, Marini over the sea, Viales over the roads, Patellarii, &c. According to the opinion of some, the worship of the gods Lares, who are supposed to be the same as the manes, arose from the ancient custom among the Romans and other nations, of burying their dead in their houses, and from their belief that their spirits continually hovered over the house for the protection of its inhabitants. [The ancients differ extremely about the origin of the Lares. Varro and Macrobius say that they were the children of Mania. Ovid's opinion given above, makes them to have been the offspring of Mercury and the Naiad Lara, whom Lactantius and Ausonius call Larunda. Apuleius affirms that they were the posterity of the Lemures. Nigradius, according to Arnobius, makes them sometimes the guardians and protectors of houses, and sometimes the same with the Curetes of Samothracia, or Idæi Dactyli. Nor was Varro more consistent in his opinion of these gods, sometimes making them the same as heroes, and sometimes gods of the air. Titus Tatius, king of the Sabines, was the first who built a temple to the Lares.]

The statues of the Lares, covered with the skin of a dog, were placed in a niche behind the doors of the houses, or around the hearths.

At the feet of the Lares was the figure of a dog barking, to imitate their care and vigilance. Incense was burnt on their altars, and a sow was also offered on particular days.

[In private, they offered them wine, incense, a crown of wool, and a little of what was left at the table.] Their festivals were observed at Rome in the month of May, when their statues were crowned with garlands of flowers, [particularly violets, myrtle, and rosemary,] and offerings of fruit presented. The word Lares seems to be derived from the Etruscan word Lars, which signifies a prince or leader. *Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 129.—Juv. 8, v. 3.—Plut. in Quest. Rom.—Varro de L. LARGUS, a Latin poet, who wrote a poem on the arrival of Antenor in Italy, where he built the town of Padua. He composed with ease and elegance. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, ep. 16, v. 17.

LARISSA, a daughter of Pelasgus, who gave her name to some cities in Greece. Paus. 2, c. 23.—[A town of Syria, on the Orontes, south-east of Apamea. It was re-established by Seleucus Nicator. Its Syriac name, according to Stephanus Byzantinus, was Sizara. Abulfeda and the other Arabian writers call it Schaizar. It is now Shizar.]—[A city of Assyria, on the banks of the Tigris. The ten thousand found it deserted and in ruins. Xenophon says that it had been destroyed under the Medes.]—[A town of Æolia, in Asia Minor, lying east of Phocæa on the Hermus. Xenophon calls it the Egyptian Larissa, because it was one of the towns which Cyrus the elder gave the Egyptians who had fought against him in the army of Cræsus.]—[A city of Thessaly, on the right bank of the Peneus, and the capital of the country. It is sometimes styled Cremaste, (Κρεμαστή) hanging, from its situation on an eminence. It was the capital of the Pelasgi, and appears to have some analogy in its name to the Etrurian Lar, a prince or leader. To this city Acrisius retired, in order to avoid the death with which an oracle had menaced him; but taking part in the games here celebrated, he was killed by a blow from the discus of Perseus. Larissa declined in importance from the time of Lucan. It still subsists, however, under the same name, and contains about 25,000 inhabitants. The Turks call it Genisahar, or Jengischahar. Virgil applies the term Larissæus to Achilles; an epithet, according to Heyne, equivalent to Thessalus, since it would be incorrect to apply it in a special sense, Larissa in the time of Achilles not being under his sway, but possessed by the Pelasgi.] *Ovid. LARIUS, [now the Lake of Como or Lago di Como, a lake of Cisalpine Gaul, north of the Po and east of the Lacus Verbanus. It receives the Addua or Adda, which again emerges from it and pursues its course to the Po. At the southern extremity of this lake stood the city of Comum, now Como, the birth-place of the younger Pliny. The lake is 35 miles long. The surrounding country is highly picturesque, being covered with vineyards, interspersed with beautiful villas and skirted by lofty mountains.]

LARS TOLUMNIUS, a king of the Veientes, conquered by the Romans, and put to death, A. U. C. 329. [vid. Spolia Opima.] Liv. 4, c. 17 and 19.

LARTIUS FLORUS, a consul, who appeared a sedition raised by the poorer citizens, and was the first dictator ever chosen at Rome, B. C. 498. He made Spurius Cassius his master of horse. Liv. 2, c. 18.—Spurius, one of the three Romans who alone withstood the fury of Porcenna's army at the head of a bridge while the communication was cutting down behind them. His companions were Cocles and Herminius. [vid. Cocles.] Liv. 2, c. 10 and 18.—Dionys. Hal.—Val. Max. 3, c. 2.—The name of Lartius has been common to many Romans.

LARVÆ, a name given to the wicked spirits and apparitions which, according to the notions of the Romans, issued from their graves in the night, and came to terrify the world. As the word larva signifies a mask, whose horrid and uncouth appearance often serves to frighten children, that name has been given to the ghosts or spectres which superstition believes to hover around the graves of the dead. Some call them Lemures. [Some derived the name from the Etruscan term lar, which signifies a prince or leader, and having reference to the mischievous power exercised by these larvæ. Mr. Farmer urges the etymology of this word to prove that the heathen demons were deified human ghosts.] Servius in Virg. Æn. 5, v. 64, l. v. 152.

LASSUS or LASUS, a dithyrambic poet born at Hermione in Peloponnesus, about 500 years before Christ, and reckoned among the wise men of Greece by some. He is particularly known by the answer he gave to a man who asked him what could best render life pleasant and comfortable? Experience. He was acquainted with music. Some fragments of his poetry are to be found in Athenæus. He wrote an ode upon the Centaurs, and an hymn to Ceres, without inserting the letter S in the composition. Athen. 10.

LATERANUS PLAUTUS, a Roman consul elect A. D. 65. A conspiracy with Piso against the emperor Nero proved fatal to him. He was led to execution, where he refused to confess the associates of the conspiracy, and did not even frown at the executioner who was as guilty as himself, but when a first blow could not sever his head from his body, he looked at the executioner and shaking his head he returned it to the hatchet with the greatest composure and it was cut off [This name descended to an ancient palace in Rome, and to the buildings since erected in its place, particularly a church called St. John of Lateran, which is the principal see of the pope-dom.]

LATIANS, a surname of Jupiter, who was worshipped by the inhabitants of Latium upon Mount Albanus at stated times. The festivals which were first instituted by Tarquin the proud lasted 15 days. Liv. 21. [vid. Fera Latina.]

LATINI, the inhabitants of Latium. [vid. Latium.]

LATINUS, a son of Faunus by Marica, king of the Aborigines in Italy, who from him were called Latini. He married Amata by whom he had a son and a daughter. The son died in his infancy, and the daughter, called Lavinia, was secretly promised in marriage by her mother to Turnus king of the Rutuli, one of her most powerful admirers. The gods opposed this union, and the oracles declared that Lavinia must become the wife of a foreign prince. The arrival of Æneas in Italy seemed favourable to this prediction, and Latinus, by offering his daughter to the foreign prince and making him his friend and ally, seemed to have fulfilled the commands of the oracle. Turnus, however, disapproved of the conduct of Latinus; he claimed Lavinia as his lawful wife, and prepared to support his cause by arms. Æneas took up arms in his own defence, and Latium was the seat of the war. After mutual losses, it was agreed that the quarrel should be decided by the two rivals, and Latinus promised his daughter to the conqueror. Æneas obtained the victory, and married Lavinia. Latinus soon after died and was succeeded by his son-in-law. [Æneas never was in Italy; vid. remarks under the article Italia.] Virg. Æn. 9, &c.—Ovid. Met. 13, &c.—Fast. 2, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 13.—Liv. 1, c. 1, &c.—Justin. 43, c. 1.—A son of Sylvius Æneas, surnamed also Sylvius. He was the 5th king of the Latins, and succeeded his father. He was father to Alba his successor. Dionys. 1, c. 15.—Liv. 2, c. 3.

LATIUM, a country of Italy, near the river Tiber. It was originally very circumscribed extending only from the Tiber to Circeii, but afterwards it comprehended the territories of the Volsci, Æqui, Hernici, Ausones, Umbri, and Rutuli. The first inhabitants were called Aborigines, and received the name of Latini from Latinus their king. According to others the word is derived from lateo, to conceal, because Saturn concealed himself there when flying the resentment of his son Jupiter. [Latium was first possessed by the Siculi, who were driven out by the Pelasgi and Aborigines. The two last settled there and gave the country the name of Latium, calling themselves Latini. vid. remarks under Italia, Pelasgi, Sicilia. M. Gebelin, in his Oriental Allegories, suggests that the primitive lat signifies to conceal, and that terra also alludes to the application of the soil for the concealment of the seed that was sown in it. Hence he says Latium might have signified the country where seed was sown, in contradistinction to that part which was uncultivated and mountainous. The most ancient limit of Latium to the south was Circeii. After the Romans, however, had conquered the Æqui, Volsci, and Hernici, the Liris or Garigliano became its southern limit.] Laurentum was the capital of the country in the reign of Latinus, Lavinium under Æneas, and Alba under Ascanius. [vid. Alba.] The Latins, though originally known only among their neighbours, soon arose in consequence when Romulus had founded the city of Rome in their country. *Virg. LATMUS, a mountain of Caria near Miletus. It is famous for the residence of Endymion, whom the Moon regularly visited in the night, whence he is often called Latmius Heros [vid. Endymion.] [In the vicinity of this mountain stood the city of Heraclea, commonly termed Ἡρακλεία ἢ ὕπο Λατμου, "Heraclea below or at the foot of Latmus." The mountain gave to the adjacent bay the name of Latmicus Sinus.] Mela, 1, c. 17.—Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 299. Art. Am. 3, v. 83.—Plin. 5, c. 29.—Strab. 14.—Cic. 1, Tus. 28.

LATOBIRGI, [a people of Belgic Gaul, in the vicinity of the Tulingi, Rauraci, and Helvetii, whose country lay on the banks of the Rhine about 90 miles to the west of the Lacus Brigantinus, or Lake of Constance. If they are the nation called by Ptolemy Latobici, they must have changed their settlements before that geographer wrote, as he includes their territories in Pannonia near Noricum.]

LATŌIS, a name of Diana as being the daughter of Latona.

LATOMIÆ. vid. Lautumia.

LATŌNA, a daughter of Cœus the Titan and Phœbe, or, according to Homer, of Saturn. She was admired for her beauty, and celebrated for the favours which she granted to Jupiter. Juno, always jealous of her husband's amours, made Latona the object of her vengeance, and sent the serpent Python to disturb her peace and persecute her. Latona wandered from place to place in the time of her pregnancy, continually alarmed for fear of Python. She was driven from heaven, and Terra, influenced by Juno, refused to give her a place where she might find rest and bring forth. Neptune, moved with compassion, struck with his trident, and made immovable the island of Delos, which before wandered in the Ægean, and appeared sometimes above and sometimes below the surface of the sea. Latona, changed into a quail by Jupiter, came to Delos, where she resumed her original shape, and gave birth to Apollo and Diana, leaning against a palm tree or an olive. He repose was of short duration, Juno discovered the place of her retreat, and obliged her to fly from Delos. She wandered over the greatest part of the world, and in Caria, where her fatigue compelled her to stop, she was insulted and ridiculed by peasants of whom she asked for water, while they were weeding a marsh. Their refusal and insolence provoked her, and she entreated Jupiter to punish their barbarity. They were all changed into frogs. She was exposed to repeated insults by Niobe, who boasted herself greater than the mother of Apollo and Diana, and ridiculed the presents which the piety of her neighbours had offered to Latona. [vid. Niobe.] Her beauty proved fatal to the giant Tityus, whom Apollo and Diana put to death. [vid. Tityus.] At last, Latona, though persecuted and exposed to the resentment of Juno, became a powerful deity, and saw her children receive divine honours. Her worship was generally established where her children received adoration, particularly at Argos, Delos, &c. where she had temples. She had an oracle in Egypt, celebrated for the true decisive answers which it gave. Diod. 5.—Herodot. 2, c. 155.—Paus. 2 and 3.—Homer. Il. 21. Hymn. in Ap. & Dian.—Hesiod. Theog.—Apollod. 3, c. 5 and 10.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 160.—Hygin. fab. 140.

LATOPŌLIS, [a city of Egypt in the Thebaid, between Thebes and Apollinopolis magna. It derived its Greek name from the fish Latos there worshipped. It is now Asna, a term which signifies illustrious.]

LATŌUS, a name given to Apollo as son of Latona. Ovid. Met. 6, fab. 9.

LAVERNA, the goddess of thieves and dishonest persons at Rome. She did not only preside over robbers, called from her Laverniones, but she protected such as deceived others, or formed their secret machinations in obscurity and silence. Her worship was very popular, and the Romans raised her an altar near one of the gates of the city, which, from that circumstance, was called the gate of Laverna. She was generally represented by a head without a body. Horat. 1, ep. 16, v. 60.—Varro de L. L. 4.—A place mentioned by Plut. &c.

LAVERNIUM, a temple of Laverna, near Formiæ. Cic. 7, Att. 8.

LAVINIA, a daughter of king Latinus and Amata. She was betrothed to her relation king Turnus, but because the oracle ordered her father to marry her to a foreign prince, she was given to Æneas after the death of Turnus. [vid. Latinus.] At her husband's death she was left pregnant, and being fearful of the tyranny of Ascanius her son-in-law, she fled into the woods where she brought forth a son called Æneas Sylvius. Dionys. Hal. 1.—Virg. Æn. 6 and 7.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 507.—Liv. 1, c. 1.

LAVINIUM, or LAVINUM, a town of Italy, built by Æneas, and called by that name in honour of Lavinia, the founder's wife. It was the capital of Latium during the reign of Æneas. [It was situate near the coast, on the river Numicus, west of Ardea.] Virg. Æn. 1, v. 262.—Strab. 5.—Dionys. Hal. 1.—Liv. 1, c. 2.—Justin. 43, c. 2.

LAUREACUM, [the station of a Roman fleet on the Danube, to the east of the junction of the Ænus or Inn with that river. It is now a small village called Loren.]

LAURENTALIA, certain festivals celebrated at Rome in honour of Larentia, on the last day of April and the 23d of December. They were, in process of time, part of the Saturnalia. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 57.

LAURENTES AGRI, the country in the neighbourhood of Laurentum. Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 41.

LAURENTIA. [vid. Acca.]

LAURENTINI, the inhabitants of Latium. They received this name from the great number of laurels which grew in the country. King Latinus found one of uncommon largeness and beauty, when he was going to build a temple to Apollo, and the tree was consecrated to the god and preserved with the most religious ceremonies. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 59.

LAURENTUM, now Paterna, the capital of the kingdom of Latium in the reign of Latinus. It is on the sea-coast, [south-east of Ostia.] [vid. Laurentini.] Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Liv. 1, c. 1.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 171.

LAURION, a place of Attica, [near the promontory of Sunium,] where were [silver] mines, from which the Athenians drew considerable revenues, and with which they built their fleets by the advice of Themistocles. These mines failed before the age of Strabo. ["One or two of the shafts of the ancient silver mines," observes Hobbouse, "for which this mountainous region was so celebrated, have been discovered in a small shrubby plain not far from the sea on the eastern coast: and a specimen of ore, lately found, was shown to me at Athens." Hobbouse's Journey, vol. 1, p. 343.]—Thucyd. 2.—Paus. 1, c. 1.—Strab. 9.

LAURON, [a town of Spain, towards the eastern limits of Bætica. It lay probably not far from the sea, among the Bastitani. It has been supposed by some to be the modern Liria, five leagues from Valentia. It was this city of which Sertorius made himself master in the face of Pompey's army; and in its vicinity, at a subsequent period, Cneius Pompeius, son of Pompey the Great, was slain after the battle of Munda.]

LAUS, now Laino, a town on a river of the same name, which forms the southern boundary of Lucania. Strab. 6.

LAUS POMPEIA, a town of Italy, founded by a colony sent thither by Pompey.

LAUSUS, a son of Numitor, and brother of Ilia. He was put to death by his uncle Amulius, who usurped his father's throne. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 54

LAUTUMIÆ or LATOMIÆ, [a name properly denoting a quarry, and derived from the Greek λαας, lapis, and τεμνω, seco. These were anciently used as gaols for criminals. Dionysius had a place of this kind dug in a rock near Syracuse, where a great number of people were shut up. vid. Dionysius. Cicero reproaches Verres with imprisoning Roman citizens in Latomiæ. Latomia became in time a general name for a prison, and the prisoners inclosed in them were called latomarii.] Cic. Verr. 5, c. 27.—Liv. 26, v. 27, l. 32, c. 26.

LEANDER, a youth of Abydos, famous for his amours with Hero. vid. Hero. ["It was the custom, observes Hobhouse, for those who would cross from Abydos to Sestos to incline a mile out of the direct line, and those making the contrary voyage were obliged to have recourse to a similar plan in order to take advantage of the current. Leander, therefore, had a perilous adventure to perform, who swam at least four miles to meet Hero, and returned the same distance the same night. It is very possible, however, to swim across the Hellespont without being the rival or having the motive of Leander. My fellow-traveller. (Lord Byron,) was determined to attempt it." It appears from what follows that Lord Byron failed in his first attempt, owing to the strength of the current, after he and the friend who accompanied him had been in the water an hour, and found themselves in the middle of the strait about a mile and a half below the castles. A second attempt was more successful; Lord Byron was in the water one hour and ten minutes, his companion, Mr. Ekenhead, five minutes less. Lord Byron represents the current as very strong and the water cold; he states, however, that they were not fatigued, though a little chilled, and performed the feat with little difficulty. The strait between the castles, Mr. Hobhouse makes a mile and a quarter, and yet it took four boatmen five minutes to pull them from point to point. All this tends to throw a great deal of doubt upon the feat of Leander, who could hardly have been a more expert swimmer than Lord Byron, and who, besides, had a longer course to pursue.]

LEBÆDÆA, [a town of Bœotia, west of Cheronæa, built on a plain adjacent to the small river Hercyna. The inhabitants at a former period occupied a town on an adjoining eminence, called Midæa, but an Athenian, named Lebadus, persuaded them to build another on the plain which was called after his name. The oracle and cave of Trophœus were near this town. It is now Livadia, a name which has been extended to great part of the country which answers to Græciæ Propria, or Greece north of the Isthmus.]

LEBÆDUS, or LEBÆDOS, [one of the twelve cities of Ionia, north-west of Colophon, on the coast. It was at first a flourishing city, but upon the removal of a large portion of its inhabitants to Ephesus by Lysimachus, it sank greatly in importance. In the time of Horace it was deserted and in ruins.] Strab. 14.—Horat. 1, ep. 11, v. 7.—Herodot. 1, c. 142.—Cic. 1, Div. 33.

LECHÆUM, [a town and promontory of Greece, on the Sinus Corinthiacus, or Gulf of Lepanto. It had a temple of Neptune, in which was a bronze statue of that deity. Its modern name is Pelaga. The port of Corinth on the opposite side is Cenchræa.] Stat. Theb. 2, v. 31.—Liv. 32, c. 23.

[LECTONIA. Ancient traditions, as well as physical observations, point out the former existence of the land of Lectonia, which would seem to have occupied a part of the space now filled by the Grecian Sea. An earthquake probably broke down its foundations, and the whole was finally submerged under the waves. Perhaps this event happened when the sea, which was formerly extended over the Scythian plains, forced its way through the Bosphorus, and precipitated itself into the basin of the Mediterranean. The numerous islands of the Archipelago appear to be the remains of Lectonia, and this tract of land probably facilitated the passage of the first colonists out of Asia into our part of the world. It was the opinion of Pallas that the Euxine and Caspian Seas, as well as the lake Aral, and several others, are the remains of an extensive sea, which covered a great part of the north of Asia. This conjecture of Pallas, which was drawn from his observations in Siberia, has been confirmed by Kiaprotz's survey of the country northward of Mount Caucasus. Lastly, M. de Choiseul Gouffier adds, that a great part of Moldavia, Vollachia, and Bessarabia, bears evident traces of having been formed by the sea. It has often been conjectured that the opening of the Bosphorus was the occasion of the draining of this ocean in the midst of Europe and Asia. The memory of this disruption of the two continents was preserved in the traditions of Greece. Strabo (lib. 1, p. 49), Pliny (Hist. Nat. lib. 2, c. 90,) and Diodorus (lib. 5, c. 47.) have collected the ancient memoirs which existed of so striking a catastrophe. The truth of the story, however, has been placed on more secure grounds by physical observations on the districts in the vicinity of the Bosphorus. See Dr. Clarke's Travels, and particularly a Mémoire by M. de Choiseul Gouffier in the Mems. de l'Institut. Royal de France, 1815, in which the author has collected much curious information on this subject. It appears that the catastrophe was produced by the operation of volcanoes, the fires of which were still burning in the era of the Argonautic voyage, and enter into the poetical descriptions of Apollonius, and Valerius Flaccus. According to the false

Orpheus, Neptune being angry with Jupiter, struck the land of Lectonia with his golden trident and submerged it in the sea, forming islands of many of its scattered fragments. There seems to be some resemblance between the name Lectonia and Lycaonia, but then we must refer the latter term not to a portion of Asia Minor, but to the northern regions of the globe. Thus we have in Ovid (Fast. 3, v. 793,) the expression Lycaonia Arctos, in the same poet (Trist. 32, v. 2,) Lycaonia sub axe, and in Claudian (Cons. Mall. Theod. v. 299,) Lycaonia astra. By the northern regions of the globe, however, Italy and Greece can easily be meant, since they were both referred by the ancients to the countries of the north. vid. Mediterraneum Mare — Müller's Univ. History. Vol. 1, p. 32, in notes. — Ukert. Geographus der Griechen und Römer, Vol. 1, p. 346. — Hermann. in O. ph. Arg. c. 1274.]

LECTUM, a promontory separating Troas from Æolia. [It formed also the northern limit, in the time of the Eastern Empire, of the province of Asia as it was termed, which commenced near the Mæander and extended along the coast upwards to Lectum. It is now cape Baba.]

LEDA, a daughter of king Thespius and Eurymemis, who married Tyndarus, king of Sparta. She was seen bathing in the river Eurotas by Jupiter, when she was some few days advanced in her pregnancy, and the god, struck with her beauty, resolved to deceive her. He persuaded Venus to change herself into an eagle, while he assumed the form of a swan; and, after this metamorphosis, Jupiter, as if fearful of the tyrannical cruelty of the bird of prey, fled through the air into the arms of Leda, who willingly sheltered the trembling swan from the assaults of his superior enemy. The caresses with which the naked Leda received the swan enabled Jupiter to avail himself of his situation, and nine months after this adventure, the wife of Tyndarus brought forth two eggs, of one of which sprang Pollux and Helena, and of the other, Castor and Clytemnestra. [This fable of the eggs is explained under the article Clytemnestra.] The two former were deemed the offspring of Jupiter, and the others claimed Tyndarus for their father. Some mythologists attribute this amour to Nemesis, and not to Leda; and they further mention, that Leda was intrusted with the education of the children which sprang from the eggs brought forth by Nemesis [vid. Helena]. To reconcile this diversity of opinions, others maintain that Leda received the name of Nemesis after death. Homer and Hesiod make no mention of the metamorphosis of Jupiter into a swan, whence some have imagined that the fable was unknown to these two ancient poets, and probably invented since their age. *Apollod. 1, c. 8, l. 3, c. 10. — Ovid. [LEGIO, septuag. mina, a Roman military colony in Spain among the Astures, north-east of Asturica. It is now the modern Leon.]

LÉGIO, [a body of forces, of a number of which the Roman armies were chiefly composed. The term comes from the Latin legere, to choose, because, when Romulus instituted this body of troops, he chose a certain number from each tribe for that purpose. The number of soldiers of which the legion consisted was different at different times, but it is impossible to determine the precise time and manner of their alterations. In the time of Romulus, the institutor of this corps, each legion consisted of 3000 foot and 300 horse. These were divided into three bodies, which made so many lines of battle, each body consisting of 10 companies. Under the consuls, the legion in general consisted of 4000 or 4200 foot and 300 horse. About the year of Rome 412 it was composed of 5000 foot, which was the number of a legion during Cæsar's wars with the Gauls; under Augustus, each legion consisted of 6100 foot and 726 horse. After his death they were reduced to 5000 foot and 700 horse. Under Tiberius, the legion was raised again to 6000 foot and 600 horse. In the time of Septimius Severus, the legion was composed of 5000 men; under the following emperor, it was the same as it had been under Augustus. The legion was generally divided into 10 cohorts, each cohort into 3 maniples, and each maniple into two centuries. The different kinds of infantry which composed it were the Hastati, who were young men, and formed the first line, deriving their name from the hasta or spear with which they were at first armed, the Principes, who were men in the vigour of life, and formed the second line, being so called because they were originally the first line; and the Triarii, who were old soldiers of approved valour, and stationed in the third line. These last were also called Pilani from the Pilum or javelin which they used, and the Hastati and Principes who stood before them, Antepitani. The Velites or light-armed soldiers, who fought in front, formed a fourth kind of troops. In the description of Cæsar's battle, however, there is no mention made of the soldiers being thus named and arranged, but only of a certain number of legions and cohorts which Cæsar, generally drew up in three lines. In the battle of Pharsalia he formed a body of reserve, which he calls a fourth line, to oppose the cavalry of Pompey, which indeed determined the fortune of the day. In the time of Cæsar too, the bravest troops were generally placed in front, contrary to the ancient custom; an alteration which is ascribed to Marius.] Livy speaks of ten, and even eighteen, legions kept at Rome. During the consular government it was usual to levy and fit up four legions, which were divided between the two consuls. This number was, however often increased, as time and occasion required. Augustus maintained a standing army of twenty-three or twenty-five legions, and this number was seldom diminished. In the reign of Tiberius there were 25 legions, [exclusive of the troops in Italy, and the forces of the allies,] and the peace establishment of Adrian maintained no less than 30 of these formidable brigades. They were distributed over the Roman empire, and their stations were settled and permanent. The peace of Britain was protected by three legions; sixteen were stationed on the banks of the Rhine and Danube, viz. two in Lower, and three in Upper, Germany; one in Noricum, one in Rhætia, three in Mæsia, four in Pannonia, and two in Dacia. Eight were stationed on the Euphrates, six of which remained in Syria, and two in Cappadocia, while the remote provinces of Egypt, Africa, and Spain, were guarded each by a single legion.

Besides these, the tranquillity of Rome was preserved by 20,000 soldiers, who, under the titles of city cohorts and of prætorian guards, watched over the safety of the monarch and of the capital. The legions were distinguished by different appellations, and generally borrowed their name from the order in which they were first raised, as prima, secunda, tertia, quarta, &c. Besides this distinction, another more expressive was generally added, as from the name of the emperor who embodied them, as Augusta, Claudiana, Galbiana, Flavia, Ulpia, Trajana, Antoniana, &c. from the provinces or quarters where they were stationed, as Britannica, Cyrenica, Gallica, &c. from the provinces which had been subdued by their valour, as Parthica, Scythica, Arabica, Africana, &c. from the names of the deities whom their generals particularly worshipped, as Minerva, Apollinaris, &c. or from more trifling accidents, as Martia, Fulminatrix, Rapax, Adjutrix, &c. The chief commander of the legion was called legatus, lieutenant. The standards borne by the legions were various. In the first ages of Rome a wolf was the standard, in honour of Romulus; after that a hog, because that animal was generally sacrificed at the conclusion of a treaty, and therefore it indicated that war is undertaken for the obtaining of peace. A minotaur was sometimes the standard, to intimate the secrecy with which the general was to act, in commemoration of the labyrinth. Sometimes a horse or a boar was used, till the age of Marius, who changed all these for the eagle, being a representation of that bird in silver, holding sometimes a thunderbolt in its claws. The Roman eagle ever after remained in use, though Trajan made use of the dragon.

LÉLAPS, a dog that never failed to seize and conquer whatever animal he was ordered to pursue. It was given to Procris by Diana, and Procris reconciled herself to her husband by presenting him with that valuable present. According to some, Procris had received it from Minos, as a reward for the dangerous wounds of which she had cured him. Hygin. fab. 128.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 771.—Paus. 9, c. 19.

LÉLÈGES. [According to the account given by the Greek writers, the Carians originally inhabited the islands adjacent to the coast of Asia Minor, under the name of Leleges. They were so far under the controul of Minos king of Crete, as to yield him, not indeed tribute, but vessels for his fleet. Afterwards they passed over to the continent and assumed the name of Carians. This account is evidently an erroneous one. Every thing tends to make it very probable that the continent was occupied before the islands; and the Carians themselves, according to Herodotus, contradicted the statement that they were originally islanders. The inhabitants of the continent then were Carians, to whom the Leleges, in after days, added themselves from the islands. Homer, in whose time the remembrance of this emigration of the Leleges was still quite recent, clearly distinguishes the two people from each other. The Leleges took possession of the coast in the vicinity of Halicarnassus, and afterwards spread themselves northwards to the banks of the Mæander. Eight cities were here founded by them, the most powerful of which was Pedasa. They afterwards intermingled with the Carians, and with the Greek colonies which came to this quarter. They ceased, however, to be known as a distinct race after Mausolus, king of Caria, transferred the inhabitants of six of their cities to Halicarnassus to increase the size of the capital. Still they were remembered among the Greeks for several inventions. They were the first who added crests to their helmets and ornaments to their shields. They were also the first who gave the shield its handle. Before their time, such as bore shields had no other means of managing them, but by a piece of leather suspended from the neck over the left shoulder. Some pretend to derive their name from $\lambda\epsilon\lambda\omega$, to gather, maintaining that they were a wandering people, composed of various unconnected nations.] *Strab. 7 and 8.—Homer. LÉLÈGÉS, a name applied to Miletus, because once possessed by the Leleges. Plin. 5, c. 29.

LÉLEX, an Egyptian, who came with a colony to Megara, where he reigned about 200 years before the Trojan war. His subjects were called from him Leleges, and the place Lelegeia mania. *Paus. 3, c. 1.—*A Greek, who was the first king of Laconia in Peloponnesus. LÉMANUS, a lake in the country of the Allobroges. [This lake is a most beautiful expanse of water in the form of a crescent.]

the concave side of which is upwards of 45 miles long. Its greatest breadth is about 12 miles. It never wholly freezes over in the severest winters, and it rises about 10 feet in summer, by the melting of the snows on the Alps. Besides the Rhone, which traverses its whole length, it receives the waters of 40 other streams.] It is now called the lake of Geneva. Lucan. 1, v. 396.—Mela, 2, c. 5.

LEMNOS, an island in the Ægean Sea, between Tenedos, Imbros, and Samothrace. It was sacred to Vulcan, called Lemnius pater, who fell there when kicked down from heaven by Jupiter. [The true reason why Lemnos was consecrated to Vulcan, was owing, probably, to two volcanoes which were here continually casting forth flames, and which were considered as the forges of that god. (vid. Moschylus.) No vestiges of these volcanoes now remain, but Sonnini thinks it probable that interior fires are still burning there; for he met with a spring of hot water, which had been brought to supply baths, and with another of aluminous water. Lemnos was celebrated among the ancients for the succour it afforded the Argonauts, of which Apollonius Rhodius has given us a particular account. The priests of Lemnos were reckoned famous for the cure of wounds, on which account Philoctetes was left there when wounded in the foot by one of the arrows of Hercules. The efficacy of their skill depended, it is said, upon the quality of a species of red earth, found in the island, called Lemnian earth. This, the ancients thought a sovereign remedy against poisons and the bites of serpents, but is now held in little or no esteem in Europe. It is called terra sigillata, because it is sealed before it is vended. The Turks, and the modern Greeks, still, however, hold it in high estimation, and the cups out of which the Grand Seignor drinks, are made of this red earth.] It was celebrated for two horrible massacres, that of the Lemnian women murdering their husbands, [vid. Hippisyle,] and that of the Lemnians, or Pelasgi, in killing all the children they had had by some Athenian women whom they had carried away to become their wives. These two acts of cruelty have given rise to the proverb of Lemnian actions, which is applied to all barbarous and inhuman deeds. The first inhabitants of Lemnos were the Pelasgi, or rather the Thracians, who were murdered by their wives. After them came the children of the Lemnian widows by the Argonauts, whose descendants were at last expelled by the Pelasgi, about 1100 years before the Christian era. Lemnos is about 112 miles in circumference, according to Pliny, who says, that it is often shadowed by Mount Athos, though at the distance of 87 miles. [The more correct statement will be found under the article Athos.] It has been called Hippisyle, from queen Hippisyle. Lemnos is also celebrated for a labyrinth, which, according to some traditions, surpassed those of Crete and Egypt. Some remains of it were still visible in the age of Pliny. The island of Lemnos, now called Stalimene, was reduced under the power of Athens by Miltiades, and the Carians, who then inhabited it, obliged to emigrate. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 454.—Hom. Il. 1, v. 593.—*C. LEMŪRES, the manes of the dead. The ancients supposed that the souls, after death, wandered all over the world, and disturbed the peace of its inhabitants. The good spirits were called Lares familiares, and the evil ones were known by the name of Larvæ, or Lemures. They terrified the good, and continually haunted the wicked and impious; and the Romans had the superstition to celebrate festivals in their honour, called Lemuria, or Lemuralia, in the month of May. They were first instituted by Romulus to appease the manes of his brother Remus, from whom they were called Remuria, and by corruption, Lemuria. These solemnities continued three nights, during which the temples of the gods were shut, and marriages prohibited. It was usual for the people to throw black beans on the graves of the deceased, or to burn them, as the smell was supposed to be insupportable to them. They also muttered magical words, and, by beating kettles and drums, they believed that the ghosts would depart, and no longer come to terrify their relations upon earth. Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 421, &c.—Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 209.—Persius 5, v. 185.

LEMŪRIA and LEMŪRĀLIA. vid. Lemures.

LENÆUS, a surname of Bacchus, from Ληνός, a wine-press. There was a festival called Lenæa, celebrated in his honour, in which the ceremonies observed at the other festivals of the god chiefly prevailed. There were, besides, poetical contentions, &c. Paus.—Virg. G. 2, v. 4, Æn. 4, v. 207.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 14.—A learned grammarian, ordered by Pompey to translate into Latin some of the physical manuscripts of Mithridates, king of Pontus.

LENTŪLUS, a celebrated family at Rome, which produced many great men in the commonwealth. The most illustrious were L. Corn. Lentulus, a consul, A. U. C. 427, who dispersed some robbers who infested Umbria.—Corn. Lentulus, surnamed Sura. He joined in Catiline's conspiracy, and assisted in corrupting the Allobroges. He was convicted in full senate by Cicero, and put in prison and afterwards executed.—A consul who triumphed over the Samnites.—Cn. Lentulus, surnamed Gatulicus, was made consul, A. D. 26, and was, some time after, put to death by Tiberius, who was jealous of his great popularity. He wrote an history, mentioned by Suetonius, and attempted also poetry.—P. Lentulus, a friend of Brutus, mentioned by Cicero (de Orat. 1, c. 48) as a great and consummate statesman.—Besides these, there are a few others, whose name is only mentioned in history, and whose life was not marked by any uncommon event. The consulship was in the family of the Lentuli in the years of Rome 427, 479, 517, 518, 553, 555, 598, &c. Tacit. Ann.—Liv.—Flor.—Plin.

LEO, a native of Byzantium, who flourished 350 years before the Christian era. His philosophical and political talents endeared him to his countrymen, and he was always sent upon every important occasion as ambassador to Athens, or to the court of Philip king of Macedonia. This monarch, well acquainted with the abilities of Leo, was sensible that his views and claims to Byzantium would never succeed while it was protected by the vigilance of such a patriotic citizen. To remove him he had recourse to artifice and perfidy. A letter was forged, in which Leo made solemn promises of betraying his country to the king of Macedonia for money. This was no sooner known than the people ran enraged to the house of Leo, and the philosopher, to avoid their fury, and without attempting his justification, strangled himself. He had written some treatises upon physic, and also the history of his country and the wars of Philip, in seven books, which have been lost. Plut.
—An emperor of the east, surnamed the Thracian. He reigned 17 years, and died A. D. 474, being succeeded by Leo the Second for 10 months, and afterwards by Zeno.

LEOCORION, a monument and temple erected by the Athenians to Pasithea, Theope, and Eubule, daughters of Leos, who immolated themselves when an oracle had ordered that, to stop the raging pestilence, some of the blood of the citizens must be shed. Elian. 12, c. 28.—Cic. N. D. 3, c. 19.

LEONATUS, one of Alexander's generals. His father's name was Eunus. He distinguished himself in Alexander's conquest of Asia, and once saved the king's life in a dangerous battle. After the death of Alexander, at the general division of the provinces, he received for his portion that part of Phrygia which borders on the Hellespont. He was empowered by Perdiccas to assist Eumenes in making himself master of the province of Cappadocia, which had been allotted to him. Like the rest of the generals of Alexander, he was ambitious of power and dominion. He aspired to the sovereignty of Macedonia, and secretly communicated to Eumenes the different plans he meant to pursue to execute his designs. He passed from Asia into Europe to assist Antipater against the Athenians, and was killed in a battle which was fought soon after his arrival. Historians have mentioned, as an instance of the luxury of Leonatus, that he employed a number of camels to procure some earth from Egypt to wrestle upon, as, in his opinion, it seemed better calculated for that purpose. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 3, c. 12, l. 6, c. 8.—Justin. 13, c. 2.—Diod. 18.—C. Nep. in Eum.

LEONIDAS, a celebrated king of Lacedæmon, of the family of the Euristhenidæ, sent by his countrymen to oppose Xerxes, king of Persia, who had invaded Greece with about five millions of souls. [A statement of the amount of the Grecian forces previous to the battle will be found under the article Thermopylæ.] He was offered the kingdom of Greece by the enemy, if he would not oppose his views; but Leonidas heard the proposal with indignation, and observed, that he preferred death for his country to an unjust though extensive dominion over it. Before the engagement, Leonidas exhorted his soldiers, and told them all to dine heartily, as they were to sup in the realms of Pluto. The battle was fought at Thermopylæ, and the 300 Spartans, who had resolved not to abandon the scene of action, withstood the enemy with such vigour, that they were obliged to retire, wearied and conquered, during three successive days, till Ephialtes, a Trachinian, had the perfidy to conduct a detachment of Persians by a secret path up the mountains, whence they suddenly fell upon the rear of the Spartans, and crushed them to pieces. [Two of the 300 Spartans, are said by Herodotus, to have been afflicted with a violent disorder of the eyes, and with the permission of Leonidas to have left the camp previous to the day of the battle and remained at Alpenus. One of them, Eurytus, having heard of the circuit made by the Persians, called for his arms, met the enemy and was slain. The other one, Aristodemus, pusillanimously staid where he was, and after the battle returned to Sparta. Some assert that he was sent on business from the army, and might, if he had pleased, have been present at the battle; but that he saved himself by lingering by the way. They add, that his companion, employed on the same business, returned to the battle and there fell. Aristodemus, on his return, was branded with infamy; no one would speak with him, no one would supply him with fire, and the opprobrious epithet of trembler (δρηρατος) was annexed to his name; but he afterwards at the battle of Plataeæ effectually atoned for his conduct.] This celebrated battle, which happened 480 years before the Christian era, taught the Greeks to despise the number of the Persians, and to rely upon their own strength and intrepidity. Temples were raised to the fallen hero, and festivals, called Leonidea, yearly celebrated at Sparta, in which free-born youths contended. [A Lion of stone was erected at the entrance of the straits of Thermopylæ in honour of Leonidas. Two epigrams on this subject may be found in the Greek Anthology. The bones of Leonidas were carried back to Sparta by Pausanias, forty years after his death. These were placed in a monument opposite the theatre: every year they pronounced in this place a funeral oration, and celebrated games at which the Spartans only were suffered to contend.] Leonidas, as he departed for the battle from Lacedæmon, gave no other injunction to his wife, but, after his death, to marry a man of virtue and honour, to raise from her children deserving of the name and greatness of her first husband. Herodot. 7, LEONTIUM and LEONTINI, [a town of Sicily, called also Xuthia. It was situate about five miles from the sea-shore, to the south of Catania between two small streams, the Lissus and Terias. The town was built at the same time with Catania, by the Chalcidians from Bœotia, under the conduct of Theocles an Athenian, in the year of the 13th Olympiad. The adjacent territory was so fruitful, that it is said to have yielded crops of corn an hundred fold, and Cicero calls it the grand magazine of Sicily. Its wines were the most delicious of the whole island, but the inhabitants perverted the benefit into an occasion for intemperance, so that it became a proverbial saying, "the people of Leontini are always at their cups." This was the birth-place of the famous Gorgias. Its quarrel with Syracuse led to the unfortunate expedition of the Athenians, whose aid the people of Leontini had implored. The city afterwards fell under the Syracusan power. The adjacent country was called Læstrygonii Campi, and was, according to some accounts, the residence of the Læstrygones.] B. C. 427. Thucyd. 6.—Polub. 7.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 467.—Ital. 14, v. 126.—Cic. in Verr. 5.

LEONTIUM, a celebrated courtesan of Athens, who studied philosophy under Epicurus, and became one of the most renowned pupils. She prostituted herself to the philosopher's scholars, and even to Epicurus himself, if we believe the reports which were raised by some of his enemies. (vid. Epicurus.) [This appears to have been all a vile slander; whatever might be the case afterwards, there is little reason to doubt but that during the life of Epicurus his garden was rather a school of temperance than a scene of riot and debauchery.] Metrodorus shared her favours, and by him she had a son, to whom Epicurus was so partial, that he recommended him to his executors on his dying bed. Leontium not only professed herself a warm admirer and follower of the doctrines of Epicurus, but she even wrote a book in support of them against Theophrastus. This book was valuable, if we believe the testimony and criticism of Cicero, who praised the purity and elegance of its style, and the truly Attic turn of the expressions. Leontium had also a daughter called Danae, who married Sophron. Cic. de Nat. D. 1, c. 33.

LEOSTHÈNES, an Athenian general who, after Alexander's death, drove Antipater to Thessaly, where he besieged him in the town of Lamia. The success which for a while attended his arms was soon changed by a fatal blow which he received from a stone thrown by the besieged, B. C. 323. The death of Leosthenes was followed by a total defeat of the Athenian forces. The funeral oration over his body was pronounced at Athens by Hy-perides, in the absence of Demosthenes, who had been lately banished for taking a bribe from Harpalus. [vid. Lamiacum.] Diod. 17 and 18.—Strab. 9.

LEOTYCHIDES, a king of Sparta, son of Menares, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was set over the Grecian fleet, and by his courage and valour he put an end to the Persian war at the famous battle of Mycale. It is said that he cheered the spirits of his fellow-soldiers at Mycale, who were anxious for their countrymen in Greece, by raising a report that a battle had been fought at Plataea, in which the barbarians had been defeated. This succeeded, and though the information was false, yet a battle was fought at Plataea, in which the Greeks obtained the victory the same day that the Persian fleet was destroyed at Mycale. Leotyichides was accused of a capital crime by the Ephori, and, to avoid the punishment which his guilt seemed to deserve, he fled to the temple of Minerva at Tegea, where he perished, B. C. 469, after a reign of 22 years. He was succeeded by his grandson Archidamus. Paus. 3, c. 7 and 8.—Diod. 11.—A son of Agis, king of Sparta, by Timæa. The legitimacy of his birth was disputed by some, and it was generally believed that he was the son of Alcibiades. He was prevented from ascending the throne of Sparta by Lysander, though Agis had declared him upon his death-bed his lawful son and heir, and Agesilaus was appointed in his place. C. Nep. in Ages.—Plut.—Paus. 3, c. 8.

LEPIDA DOMITIA, a daughter of Drusus and Antonia, great niece to Augustus, and aunt to the emperor Nero. She is described by Tacitus as a common prostitute, infamous in her manners, violent in her temper, and yet celebrated for her beauty. She was put to death by means of her rival Agrippina, Nero's mother. Tacit.

LEPIDUS M. ÆMILIUS, a Roman, celebrated as being one of the triumvirs with Augustus and Antony. He was of an illustrious family, and like the rest of his contemporaries, he was remarkable for his ambition, to which was added a narrowness of mind, and a great deficiency of military abilities. He was sent against Cæsar's murderers, and some time after, he leagued with M. Antony, who had gained the heart of his soldiers by artifice, and that of their commander by his address. When his influence and power among the soldiers had made him one of the triumvirs, he showed his cruelty, like his colleagues, by his proscriptions, and even suffered his own brother to be sacrificed to the dagger of the triumvirate. He received Africa as his portion in the division of the empire. [In dividing the Roman world between the members of the triumvirate, Lepidus was allowed a place principally by way of a connecting link between the other two. After he had received Africa as his share, he brought a large force to Sicily to aid Augustus in the war with Sextus Pompey, and shared in the victory obtained against that commander. The confidence he felt in being at the head of a large army induced him to treat his colleague with haughtiness and neglect, but he had the mortification to see himself deserted by all his troops, who joined Augustus. He now supplicated his life of his rival, which being granted him, he retired into a kind of exile at Circæii, where he passed the rest of his days in obscurity.] Appian.—Plut. in Aug.—Flor. 4, c. 6 and 7.—A son of Julia, the granddaughter of Augustus. He was intended by Caius as his successor in the Roman empire. He committed adultery with Agrippina when young. Dion. 59.

LEPONTII, [a people of the Alps, near the source of the Rhone, on the south of that river. The Lepontine Alps separated Italy from the Helvetii.] Plin. 3, c. 20.

LEPTINES, a son of Hermocrates of Syracuse, brother to Dionysius. He was sent by his brother against the Carthaginians, and experienced so much success, that he sunk fifty of their ships. He was afterwards defeated by Mago, and banished by Dionysius. He always continued a faithful friend to the interests of his brother, though naturally an avowed enemy to tyranny and oppression. He was killed in a battle with the Carthaginians. Diod. 15.—A famous orator at Athens, who endeavoured to free the people from oppressive taxes. He was opposed by Demosthenes.

LEPTIS, [the name of two cities in Africa, distinguished by the epithets of Magna and Parva. The first was situate towards the great Syrtis, at the south-east extremity of the district of Tripolis. It is now Lebida. The latter was in the district of Byzacium, or Emporiæ, about 18 miles below Hadrumetum, on the coast. It is now Lempta. It paid a talent a day to the Carthaginians as tribute. vid. Emporiæ. LERIA, an island in the Ægean Sea, [one of the Sporades,] on the coast of Caria, about 18 miles in circumference, peopled by a Milesian colony. Its inhabitants were very dishonest. Strab. 10.—Herodot. 5, c. 125.

LERINA or PLANASIA, a small island in the Mediterranean, [on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, south of Nicæa. It was called also Lero, and is now St. Marguerite. Strabo gives it the name of Planasia, from its shape.] Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.

LERNA, a country of Argolis, celebrated for a grove and a lake, where, according to the poets, the Danaïdes threw the heads of their murdered husbands. It was there also that Hercules killed the famous hydra. [The marsh, according to Pausanias, was formed by the rivers Phryxus and Erasinus. It is now called Molini. vid. Hydra, where an explanation is given of the fable respecting Hercules.] Virg. Æn. 6, v. 803, l. 12, v. 517.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—*Ovid. called Lernæa, celebrated there in honour of Bacchus, Proserpine, and Ceres. The Argives used to carry fire to this solemnity from a temple upon Mount Crathis, dedicated to Diana. Paus.

LERO, a small island on the coast of Gaul, called also Leria.

LEROS. vid. Metelin.

LESBOS, [now Meletin, an island of the Ægean, lying off the coast of Mysia, at the entrance of the gulf of Adramyttium. It was first settled by a body of Pelasgi, who, under the conduct of Xanthus their king, having been driven from Argos, passed from Lycia into this island, called Issa, and named by them Pelasgia. Seven generations after this, and a short time subsequent to the deluge of Deucalion, Macareus passed from Attica, then denominated Ionia, with a colony to this island. From him it received the name of Macarea. Lesbus, an Æolian, joined himself to this colony, married the daughter of Macareus, who was called Methymne, and gave his own name to the island after the death of Macareus. The elder daughter of Macareus was named Mitylene; her name was given to the capital of the whole island. This is said to have taken place two generations before the Trojan war. Homer speaks of the island under the name of Lesbos, as being well inhabited. Other, and perhaps more accurate accounts, make the Æolians to have led colonies into the island for the first time, 130 years after the Trojan war. Herodotus makes five Æolian cities in Lesbos. Pliny mentions other names, besides those given above; which seem, however, to have been merely general appellations, denoting some circumstance or feature in the island, as Himerle, the wished-for, Lusia, the woody, &c.] Lesbos was originally governed by kings, but they were afterwards subjected to the neighbouring powers. The wine which it produced was greatly esteemed by the ancients, and still is in the same repute among the moderns. The Lesbians were celebrated among the ancients for their skill in music, and their women for their beauty; but the general character of the people was so debauched and dissipated, that the epithet of Lesbian was often used to signify debauchery and extravagance. Lesbos has given birth to many illustrious persons, such as Arion, Terpander, &c. The best verses were by way of eminence often called Lesboum carmen, from Alcæus and Sappho, who distinguished themselves for their poetical compositions, and were also natives of the place. [The ancients fabled that the head and lyre of Orpheus, after having descended the Hebrus, floated to the shores of Lesbos, where the former was buried and the latter hung up in the temple of Apollo. Hence they accounted for the musical talent of the Lesbians.] Diod. 5.—Strab. 13.—Virg. G. 2, v. 90.—Horat. 1, ep. 11.—Herodot. 1, c. 160.

LESBUS or LESBOS, a son of Lapithas, grandson of Æolus, who married Methymna, daughter of Macareus. He succeeded his father-in-law, and gave name to the island over which he reigned.

LESCHES, a Greek poet of Lesbos, who flourished B. C. 600. Some suppose him to be the author of the little Iliad, of which only a few verses remain quoted by Paus. 10, c. 25.

LETHE, one of the rivers of hell, whose waters the souls of the dead drank after they had been confined for a certain space of time in Tartarus. It had the power of making them forget whatever they had done, seen, or heard before, as the name implies, λεθην, oblivion. ["Divers canals," observes D'Anville, "derived from the Nile, and separating Memphis from the ancient sepulchres and pyramids, furnished the Greeks with the idea of their infernal rivers, Acheron, Cocytus, and Lethe."]—[There was another river of the same name in Spain. Its true name, however, was the Limius, according to Ptolemy, or, according to Pliny, the Limia. Strabo styles it the Belion. It was in the territory of the Calliaci, a little below the Minius. Its name Lethe, (or, as it should be rather termed ὁ τῆς λήθης, the river of forgetfulness,) was given to it from the circumstance of the Celtæ and Turdulii, who had gone on an expedition with united forces, losing here their common commander, becoming disunited, forgetting the object of their expedition, and returning to their respective homes. There was so much superstitious dread attached to this stream, that Brutus, in his expedition against the Calliaci, could with great difficulty induce his soldiers to cross.]—Another in Bœotia, whose waters were drank by those who consulted the oracle of Trophonius. Lucan. 9, v. 355.—Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 1, v. 47.—Virg. G. 4, v. 545. Æn. 6, v. 714.—Ital. 1, v. 235, l. 10, v. 555.—Paus. 9, c. 39.—Horat. 4, od. 7, v. 27.

LEVANA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the action of the person who took up from the ground a newly-born child, after it had been placed there by the midwife. This was generally done by the father, and so religiously observed was this ceremony, that the legitimacy of a child could be disputed without it.

LEUCA, [a town of Italy, in Messapia, near the Iapygian promontory. It was in the country of the Salentini. The modern name Leuca has been communicated to the promontory.]

[LEUCÆ, a town of Ionia, west of the mouth of the Hermus, at the entrance of the Smyræus Sinus. It was situate on a promontory which, according to Pliny, was anciently an island. Near this place Andronicus, the pretender to the crown of Pergamus, was defeated by the Roman consul Crassus.]

LEUCAS or LEUCADIA, an island of the Ionian Sea, now called St. Maura, near the coast of Epirus, famous for a promontory called Leucate, Leucas, or Leucates, where desponding lovers threw themselves into the sea. Sappho had recourse to this leap to free herself from the violent passion which she entertained for Phaon. [Whether she perished or not, cannot be clearly ascertained from any thing which has come down to us in ancient authors. Menander, in one of his fragments, states that Sappho was the first who resorted to this strange expedient. Strabo, however, makes Cephalus to have been the first. In a later age, Artemisia threw herself from the promontory and perished. Strabo states a curious custom which prevailed in a remote period of casting down a criminal from this precipice every year, and adds, that in order to break his fall, they attached to him birds of all kinds. If he reached the water alive he was picked up by boats stationed there, and allowed to depart from the territories of Leucadia. This, he says, was done during a sacrifice to Apollo, in order to propitiate the god. Apollo had a temple on the promontory, whence he is often called Leucadius. According to Servius, the temple was founded by Phaon. The island was formerly joined to the continent by a narrow isthmus, 600 paces broad. This isthmus was cut through, according to Strabo, by a colony of Corinthians in the time of Cypselus. The island of Leucadia takes its name, according to the same writer, from the promontory Leucate, which was so called from λευκος, white. Mr. Gell describes it as a white and perpendicular cliff of considerable elevation, and has given a beautiful representation of it in his work on the geography and antiquities of Ithaca. Some ruins of the temple of Apollo still remain.] Ovid. Heroid. 15, v. 171.—Strab. 6, &c.—Ital. 15, v. 302.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 274, l. 8, v. 677.—A town of Phœnicia.

LEUCATE, vid. Leucas.

LEUCE, [an island in the Euxine Sea, near the mouth of the Borysthenes. It is probable that it was the same with the westernmost extremity of the Dromos Achillis, which was formed into an island by a small arm of the sea, and lay facing the mouth of the Borysthenes: now named Tentra. It derived its name from its white sandy shores.] According to the poets, the souls of the ancient heroes were placed there as in the Elysian fields, where they enjoyed perpetual felicity, and reaped the repose to which their benevolence to mankind, and their exploits during life, seemed to entitle them. From that circumstance it has often been called the island of the blessed, &c. According to some accounts Achilles celebrated there his nuptials with Iphigenia, or rather Helen, and shared the pleasures of the place with the manes of Ajax, &c. Strab. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ammian. 22.—Q. Calab. 3, v. 773.

LEUCI, a people of Gaul, between the Moselle and the Maese. Their capital is now called Toul. Cæs. B. G. 1, c. 40.—Mountains on the west of Crete, appearing at a distance like white clouds, whence the name.

LEUCIPPUS, a celebrated philosopher [of Elea,] about 428 years before Christ, disciple to Zeno. He was the first who invented the famous system of atoms and of a vacuum, which was afterwards more fully explained by Democritus and Epicurus. [Several other philosophers, before his time had indeed considered matter as divisible into indefinitely small particles, particularly Anaxagoras, Empedocles, and Heraclitus. But Leucippus and Democritus were the first who taught that these particles were originally destitute of all qualities except figure and motion, and, therefore, may justly be reckoned the authors of the Atomic philosophy. The following summary of the doctrine of Leucippus will exhibit the infant state of this system, and at the same time sufficiently expose its absurdity. The universe, which is infinite, is in part a plenum, and in part a vacuum. The plenum contains innumerable corpuscles or atoms, of various figures, which, falling into the vacuum, struck against each other; and hence arose a variety of curvilinear motions, which continued till, at length, atoms of similar forms met together, and bodies were produced. The primary atoms being specifically of equal weight, and not being able, on account of their multitude, to move in circles, the smaller rose to the exterior parts of the vacuum, whilst the larger, entangling themselves, formed a spherical shell, which revolved about its centre, and which included within itself all kinds of bodies. This central mass was gradually increased by a perpetual accession of particles from the surrounding shell, till at last the earth was formed. In the mean time, the spherical shell was continually supplied with new bodies, which, in its revolution, it gathered up from without. Of the particles thus collected in the spherical shell, some in their combination formed humid masses, which, by their circular motion, gradually became dry, and were at length ignited and became stars. The sun was formed in the same manner, in the exterior surface of the shell; and the moon in its interior surface. In this manner the world was formed; and, by an inversion of the process, it will at length be dissolved.]—A brother of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, who married Philodice, daughter of Inachus, by whom he had two daughters, Hilaira and Phœbe, known by the patronymic of Leucippides. They were carried away by their cousins Castor and Pollux, as they were going to celebrate their nuptials with Lynceus and Idas. *Ovid. He gained the affections of Daphne by his obsequiousness and attention, but his artifice at last proved fatal through the influence and jealousy of his rival Apollo; for when Daphne and her attendants were bathing in the Ladon, the sex of Leucippus was discovered, and he perished by the darts of the females. *Parthen. greatly encouraged commerce. Strab.—Diod. 14.

LEUCOPÉTRA, a place on the isthmus of Corinth, where the Achæans were defeated by the consul Mummius.—A promontory six miles east from Rhegium in Italy where the Appenines terminate and sink into the sea.

LEUCOPHRYS, a temple of Diana, with a city of the same name, near the Mæander. The goddess was represented under the figure of a woman with many breasts, and crowned with victory.—An ancient name of Tenedos. Paus. 10, c. 14.—Strab. 13 and 14.

LEUCOS, a river of Macedonia near Pydna.

LEUCOSTIA, a small island [in the Sinus Præstanus.] It received its name from one of the companions of Æneas, who was drowned there, or from one of the Sirens, who was thrown there by the sea. Strab. 5.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 708.

LEUCOSYRII, [the Greek form of a name applied by the Persians to the Cappadocians, and signifying White Syrians. The Persians called the Cappadocians by this appellation, because they considered them to be a branch of the great Syrian nation, from the resemblance of their language, customs, and religion, and because they found that they possessed a fairer complexion than their swarthy brethren of the south. The Greek colonies on the coast of Pontus received this name from the Persians, and expressed it by the forms of their own language, but in its application restricted it to the inhabitants of the mountainous country lying along the coast from the Promontorium Jasonium in the east to the mouth of the Halys in the west, while they called the people in the interior of the country by the name of Cappadocians. The Leucosyrri, became in time blended into one people with the Paphlagonians.]

LEUCOTHŒ or LEUCOTHEA, the wife of Athamas, changed into a sea-deity. [vid. Ino.] She was called Mutura by the Romans, who raised her a temple, where all the people, particularly women, offered vows for their brother's children. They did not entreat the deity to protect their own children, because Ino had been unfortunate in hers. No female slaves were permitted to enter the temple, or if their curiosity tempted them to transgress this rule, they were beaten away with the greatest severity. To this supplicating for other people's children, Ovid alludes in these lines; Fast. 6.

Ipsa parum felix visa fuisse parens.*

—A daughter of king Orchamus by Eurynome. Apollo became enamoured of her, and to introduce himself to her with greater facility, he assumed the shape and features of her mother. Their happiness was complete, when Clytia, who tenderly loved Apollo, and was jealous of his amours with Leucothoe, discovered the whole intrigue to her father, who ordered his daughter to be buried alive. The lover, unable to save her from death, sprinkled nectar and ambrosia on her tomb, which penetrating as far as the body, changed it into a beautiful tree which bears the frankincense. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 196.—An island in the Tyrrhene Sea, near Capreae.—A fountain of Samos.—A town of Egypt.—of Arabia. Mela, 2, c. 7.—A part of Asia which produces frankincense.

LEUCTRA, [a small town of Bœotia, south-east of Thespiæ and west of Plataeæ.] It was famous for the victory which Epaminondas, the Theban general, obtained over the superior force of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, on the 8th of July B. C. 371. In this famous battle 4000 Spartans were killed, with their king Cleombrotus, and no more than 300 Thebans. From that time the Spartans lost the empire of Greece, which they had obtained for near 500 years. [The Theban army consisted at most but of 6000 men, whereas that of the enemy was at least thrice that number, including the allies. But Epaminondas trusted most in his cavalry, in which he had much advantage both as to quality and good management; the wealthy Lacedæmonians alone keeping horses at that time, which made their cavalry most wretched both as to ill-fed undisciplined steeds and unskilful riders. Other deficiencies he endeavoured to supply by the disposition of his men who were drawn up fifty deep, while the Spartans were but twelve. When the Thebans had gained the victory and killed Cleombrotus, the Spartans renewed the fight to recover their king's body, and in this object the Theban general wisely chose to gratify them rather than hazard the success of a second onset.] Plut. in Pelop. & Ages.—*C. LEXOVII, a people of Gaul, at the mouth of the Seine, conquered with great slaughter by a lieutenant of J. Cæsar. Cæs. Bell. G.

LIBANIUS, a celebrated sophist of Antioch in the age of the emperor Julian. He was educated at Athens [Having finished his education he collected disciples and made himself known by various rhetorical compositions. His reputation was so high at Constantinople that some other professors, jealous of his fame, procured his banishment on the charge of magic. He then went to Nicomedia, where he obtained a great number of disciples, among whom, in a private manner, was the emperor Julian. He finally returned to Antioch where he spent the remainder of his days. About the year 360 he was preceptor to Basil and Chrysostom, though himself a follower of the ancient religion. On the accession of Julian he was one of the first whom that emperor invited to be near his person. He declined the honours intended him, preferring a life of privacy to the bustle of a court. He was, however, warmly attached to the prince, who patronized his studies and supported the same religious cause, and he was enabled by the influence he had over him to soften many of the emperor's resentments.] Some of his orations and above 1600 of his letters are extant; they discover much affectation and obscurity of style, and we cannot perhaps much regret the loss of writings which afforded nothing but a display of pedantry, and quotations from Homer. [Gibbon characterizes the writings of Libanius as for the most part "the vain and idle compositions of an orator who cultivated the science of words;" yet he admits that he had merit, and that his correspondence was various and elaborate.] Julian submitted his writings to the judgment of Libanius with the greatest confidence, and the sophist freely rejected or approved, and showed that he was more attached to the person than the fortune and greatness of his prince. The time of his death is unknown. The best editions of Libanius seem to be that of Paris, fol. 1606, with a second volume published by Morell, 1627, [and that of Reiske, Altenb. 1791-7, 4 vols. 8vo.] His epistles have been edited by Wolf, fol. 1738.

LIBANUS, [a famous chain of mountains in Syria, deriving their name from the Hebrew term Lebanon, signifying white, an appellation given them from their snowy summits. Some make the range to commence from Mons Amanus on the confines of Cilicia, and give the general name of Libanus to the entire chain of mountains running thence to the south; it is more accurate, however, to make it begin near Aradus in Phœnicia, and after forming the northern boundary of that country, run to the south and end near Sidon. There are, however, several parallel chains, four of which towards the west have the general name of Libanus applied to them, while another parallel chain to the east, was called by the Greeks Antilibanus. Between Libanus and Antilibanus is a long valley called Coele Syria or the hollow Syria. Libanus then is composed of four chains or enclosures of mountains which rise one upon the other; the first is very rich in grain and fruits, the second is barren, the third, though higher than this, enjoys perpetual spring, the trees being always green and the orchards full of fruit. It is so beautiful that some have called it a terrestrial paradise. The fourth is very high, so that it is almost always covered with snow, and is uninhabitable by reason of the great cold. Libanus was famed for its cedars.]

LIBENTINA, a surname of Venus, who had a temple at Rome, where the young women used to dedicate the toys and childish amusements of their youth, when arrived at nubile years. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 6.

LIBER, a surname of Bacchus, which signifies free. He received this name from his delivering some cities of Bœotia from slavery, or, according to others, because wine, of which he was the patron, delivered mankind from their cares, and made them speak with freedom and unconcern. The word is often used for wine itself. Senec. de tranq. anim.

LIBĒRA, a goddess, the same as Proserpine, Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 48.—A name given to Ariadne by Bacchus, or Liber, when he had married her. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 513.

LIBĒRALIA, festivals yearly celebrated in honour of Bacchus the 17th of March. Slaves were then permitted to speak with freedom, and every thing bore the appearance of independence. They are much the same as the Dionysia of the Greeks. Varro.

LIBERTAS, a goddess of Rome, who had a temple on Mount Aventine, raised by T. Gracchus, and improved and adorned by Pollio with many elegant statues and brazen columns, and a gallery in which were deposited the public acts of the state. She was represented as a woman in a light dress, holding a rod in one hand and a cap in the other, both signs of independence, as the former was used by the magistrates in the manumission of slaves, and the latter was worn by slaves who were soon to be set at liberty. Sometimes a cat was placed at her feet, as this animal is very fond of liberty and impatient when confined. Liv. 24, c. 16, l. 25, c. 7.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 1, v. 72.—Plut. in Grac.—Dio. Cas. 44.

LIBĒTHRA, [a town of Greece, located by Pausanias on Mount Olympus, on the side of Macedonia. D'Anville places it upon the river Sus, at a small distance from Heracleum, which lay on the north-east upon the sea-coast. This is said to have been the town where Orpheus was born, and whence his monument was transferred to Dion by the Macedonians, when Libethra was destroyed by an inundation of the river Sus.] Virg. Ecl. 7, v. 21.—Plin. 4, c. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 9 and 10.

LIBĒTHRĪDES, [a name given to the Muses from Libethrus, a part of the mountain of Helicon, a little above Ascra, which lies at the foot of the mountain.]

LIBITĪNA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over funerals. According to some, she is the same as Venus, or rather Proserpine. Servius Tullius first raised her a temple at Rome, where every thing necessary for funerals was exposed to sale. [A piece of money was paid her for every one who died, whose name was recorded in a register called Libitinæ ratio. This practice was established by Servius Tullius, in order to obtain an account of the number of annual deaths in the city, and consequently the rate of increase or decrease of its inhabitants.] *Dionys. LIBON, a Greek architect who built the famous temple of Jupiter Olympius. He flourished about 450 years before the Christian era.

LIBOPHENICES, the inhabitants of the country near Carthage.

LIBURNA, a town of Dalmatia.

LIBURNIA, [a province of Illyricum, along the Adriatic, over against Italy, having Dalmatia on the south and Istria on the north. Zara, anciently Jadera and afterwards Dio- dora, was once its capital. The ruins of Bur-num, the Liburnia of Strabo, are to be seen on the right hand of the Titius or Kerka, in the desert of Bukoviza. The Liburnians were an Illyrian tribe, and their country now answers to part of Croatia. They are supposed to have sent forth a part of their number to Italy, and to have descended as far south as Japygia, dividing into three tribes, the Japyges, the Peucetii, and the Calabri. Some make them the most ancient inhabitants of Italy.] There were at Rome a number of men whom the magistrates employed as public heralds, who were called Liburni, probably from being originally of Liburnian extraction. Some ships of a light construction, but with strong beaks, were also called Liburnian. [To the light Liburnian galley Augustus was in a great degree indebted for the victory at Actium.] Propert. 2, el. 11, v. 44.—Juv. 4, v. 75.—Martial. 1, ep. 50, v. 33.—Horat. 1, od. 37, v. 30.—Epod. 1, v. 1.—Lucan. 3, v. 534.—Plin. 6, ep. 16.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 7.—Ptol. 2, c. 17.

LIBURNIDES, an island on the coast of Liburnia, in the Adriatic. Strab. 5.

LIBURNUM MARE, the sea which borders on the coast of Liburnia.

LIBURNUS, a mountain of Campania.

LIBYA, [the name given by the Greek and Roman poets to what was otherwise called Africa. In a more restricted sense the name has been applied to that part of Africa which contained the two countries of Cyrenaica and Narmarica, together with a very extensive region in the interior, of which little if any thing was known, and which was generally styled Libya Interior.] From the word Libya are derived the epithets of Libys, Libyssa, Libyxis, Libystis, Libycus, Libysticus, Libystinus, Libysteus. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 106, l. 6, v. 37.—Lucan. 4.—Sallust. &c.

LIBYŒUM MARE, that part of the Mediterranean which lies on the coast of Cyrene. Strab. 2.

LIBYSSA, [a small village of Bithynia, west of Nicomedia, and near the shores of the Sinus Astacenus. It is rendered memorable for containing the tomb of Hannibal; whence, no doubt, its name. It is thought to answer to the modern Gebisse, or Dschebize. If, however, Pococke be correct in making Gebisse 24 English miles from Pontichium, or Pantik, we ought rather to decide in favour of the modern Diacibira, which lies on the same coast, nearer Pontichium.]

LICHADES, small islands near Cæneum, a promontory of Eubœa, called from Lichas. (vid. Lichas.) Ovid. Met. 9, v. 155, 218.—Strab. 9.

LICHAS, a servant of Hercules, who brought him the poisoned tunic from Dejanira. He was thrown by his master into the sea with great violence, and changed into a rock in the Eubœan Sea, by the compassion of the gods. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 211.

LICIŒIA LEX, was enacted by L. Licinius Crassus, and Q. Mutius, consuls, A. U. C. 657. It ordered all the inhabitants of Italy to be enrolled on the list of citizens in their respective cities.—Another, by C. Licinius Crassus the tribune, A. U. C. 608. It transferred the right of choosing priests from the college to the people. It was proposed, but did not pass.—Another, by Licinius Stolo the tribune. It forbade any person to possess 500 acres of land, or keep more than 100 head of large cattle, or 500 of small. [He obtained, in consequence of this law, the surname of Stolo or useless sprout, it being alleged by him that when more than 500 acres was held by one proprietor, he would not have leisure to pull up the useless sprouts which grew from the roots of the trees.]—Another, by P. Licinius Varus, A. U. C. 545, to settle the day for the celebration of the Ludi Apollinarius, which was before uncertain.—Another, by P. Licinius Crassus Dives, B. C. 110. It was the same as the Fannian law, and farther required, that no more than 30 asses should be spent at any table on the calends, nones, or nundinæ, and only three pounds of fresh and one of salt meat, on ordinary days. None of the fruits of the earth were forbidden.—Another, de sodalitiis, by M. Licinius the consul, 690. It imposed a severe penalty on party clubs, or societies assembled or frequented for election purposes, as coming under the definition of ambitus, and of offering violence in some degree to the freedom and independence of the people.—Another, called also Æbutia, by Licinius and Æbutius the tribunes. It enacted, that when any law was preferred with respect to any office or power, the person who proposed the bill, as well as his colleagues in office, his friends and relations should be declared incapable of being invested with the said office or power.

LICINIA, the wife of C. Gracchus, who attempted to dissuade her husband from his seditious measures by a pathetic speech. She was deprived of her dowry after the death of Caius.—The wife of Mæcenas, distinguished for conjugal tenderness. She was sister to Proculeius, and bore also the name of Terentia. Horat. 2, od. 12, v. 13.

C. LICINIUS, a tribune of the people celebrated for the consequence of his family, for his intrigues and abilities. He was a plebeian, and was the first of that body who was raised to the office of a master of horse to the dictator. He was surnamed Stolo or useless sprout, on account of the law which he had enacted during his tribuneship. [vid. Licinia lex by Stolo.] He afterwards made a law which permitted the plebeians to share the consular dignity with the patricians, A. U. C. 332. He reaped the benefits of this law, and was one of the first plebeian consuls. This law was proposed and passed by Licinius, as it is reported, at the instigation of his ambitious wife, who was jealous of her sister who had married a patrician, and who seemed to be of a higher dignity in being the wife of a consul. Liv. 6, c. 34.—Plut.—C. Calvus, a celebrated orator and poet in the age of Cicero. He distinguished himself by his eloquence in the forum, and his poetry, which some of the ancients have compared to Catullus. His orations are greatly commended by Quintilian. Some believe that he wrote annals quoted by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. He died in the 30th year of his age. Quintil.—Cic. in Brut. 81.—P. Crassus, a Roman, sent against Perseus king of Macedonia. He was at first defeated, but afterwards repaired his losses, and obtained a complete victory, &c.—Caius Imbrix, a comic poet in the age of Africanus, preferred by some in merit to Ennius and Terence. His Nævnia and Næra are quoted by ancient authors, but of all his poetry only two verses are preserved. Aul. Gel.—Lucullus. [vid. Lucullus.]—Crassus. [vid. Crassus.]—Mucianus, a Roman who wrote about the history and geography of the eastern countries, often quoted by Pliny. He lived in the reign of Vespasian.—P. Tegula, a comic poet of Rome, about 200 years before Christ. He is ranked as the fourth of the best comic poets which Rome produced. Few lines of his compositions are extant. He wrote an ode which was sung all over the city of Rome by nine virgins during the Macedonian war. Liv. 31, c. 12.—Varro Muræna, a brother of Proculeius, who conspired against Augustus with Fannius Cæpio, and suffered for his crime. Horace addressed his 2 od. 10 to him, and recommended equanimity in every situation. Dio. 54.—C. Flavius Valerianus, a celebrated Roman emperor. His father was a poor peasant of Dalmatia, and himself a common soldier in the Roman armies. His valour recommended him to the notice of Galerius Maximianus, who had once shared with him the inferior and subordinate offices of the army, and had lately been invested with the imperial purple by Diocletian. Galerius loved him for his friendly services, particularly during the Persian war, and he showed his regard for his merit by taking him as a colleague in the empire, and appointing him over the province of Pannonia, and Rhoætia. Constantine, who was also one of the emperors, courted the favour of Licinius, and made his intimacy more durable by giving him his sister Constantia in marriage, A. D. 313. The continual successes of Licinius, particularly against Maximinus, increased his pride, and rendered him jealous of the greatness of his brother-in-law. The persecutions of the Christians, whose doctrines Constantine followed, soon caused a rupture, and Licinius had the mortification to lose two battles, one in Pannonia, and the other near Adrianopolis. Treaties of peace were made between the contending powers, but the restless ambition of Licinius soon broke them; after many engagements a decisive battle was fought near Chalcedonia. Ill fortune again attended Licinius, he was conquered, and fled to Nicomedia, where soon the conqueror obliged him to surrender, and to resign the imperial purple. The tears of Constantia obtained forgiveness for her husband, yet Constantine knew what turbulent and active enemy had fallen into his hands, therefore he ordered him to be strangled at Thessalonica, A. D.

324. His family was involved in his ruin. The avarice, licentiousness, and cruelty of Licinius, are as conspicuous as his misfortunes. He was an enemy to learning, and this aversion totally proceeded from his ignorance of letters, and the rusticity of his education. His son by Constantia bore also the same name. He was honoured with the title of Cæsar when scarce twenty months old. He was involved in his father's ruin, and put to death by order of Constantine.

LICINUS, a barber at Rome and freedman of Augustus, who is said to have made him a senator on account of the hatred he entertained towards Pompey's family. The following epitaph was written upon him,

Marmoreo tumulo Licinus jacet at Cato nullo, Pompeius parvo; quis putet esse Deos?

Horat. Art. P. 301.]

LICYMNIUS, a son of Electryon and brother of Alcmena. He was so infirm in his old age, that when he walked he was always supported by a slave. Triptolemus, son of Hercules, seeing the slave inattentive to his duty, threw a stick at him, which unfortunately killed Licymnius. The murderer fled to Rhodes. Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Diod. 5.—Homer. Il. 2.—Pind. Olymp. 7.

Q. LIGARIUS, a Roman pro-consul of Africa, after Confidius. In the civil wars he followed the interest of Pompey, and was pardoned when Cæsar had conquered his enemies. Cæsar, however, and his adherents were determined upon the ruin of Ligarius; but Cicero, by an eloquent oration, still extant, defeated his accusers, and he was pardoned. He became afterwards one of Cæsar's murderers. Cic. pro leg.—Plut. in Cæsar.

LIGER or LIGÉRIS, now La Loire, [the largest river of Gaul; it rises in Mons Cebenna or Cevennes, and for the half of its course runs directly north, then turns to the west and falls into the Atlantic, between the territories of the Pictones and Namnetes.] Strab. 4.—Plin. 4, c. 18.—Cæs. G. 7, c. 55 and 75.

LIGÛRES, the inhabitants of Liguria. vid. Liguria.

LIGURIA, a country at the west of Italy, bounded on the east by the river Macra, on the south by part of the Mediterranean called the Sinus Ligusticus, [or Gulf of Genoa,] on the west by the Varus, and on the south by the Po. [In the time of Scylax, who wrote about 350 B. C. the Ligurians had extended themselves into Etruria, as far as the Arnus, or Arno.] The commercial town of Genoa was anciently and is now the capital of the country. The origin of the inhabitants is not known, though in their character they are represented as vain, unpolished, and dedicated to falsehood. According to some they were descended from the ancient Gauls or Germans, or, as others support, they were of Greek origin, perhaps the posterity of the Ligyes mentioned by Herodotus. [The Ligures were neither of Celtic or Iberian origin. They must have either have formed a distinct race, or been descended from the ancient Itali. The latter supposition is most probable.] Liguria was subdued by the Romans, and its chief harbour now bears the name of Leghorn. Lucan. 1, v. 442.—Mela, 2, c. 1.—Strab. 4, &c.—Tacit. Hist. 2, c. 15.—Plin. 2, c. 5, &c.—Liv. 5, c. 35, l. 22, c. 33, l. 39, c. 6, &c.—C. Nep. in Ann.—Flor. 2, c. 8.

LIGUSTICÆ ALPES, a part of the Alps which borders on Liguria, sometimes called Maritimi. [The maritime Alps commenced on the east of Liguria, in the south-western extremity, near the river Varus or Var. The principal mountain in the group is Mons Vesulus or Viso.]

LIGUSTICUM MARE, the north part of the Tyrrhene Sea, now the Gulf of Genoa. Plin. 2, c. 47.

LIGYES, a people of Asia who inhabited the country between Caucasus and the river Phasis. Some suppose them to be a colony of the Ligyes of Europe, more commonly called Ligures. Herodot. 7, c. 72.—Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 10.—Strab. 4.—Diod. 4.

LILYBÆUM, [a town of Sicily on the western coast south of Drepanum, and near a famous promontory called also Lilybæum, now Cape Boeo. The name of the town is Marsalla. This place was the principal fortress of the Carthaginians in Sicily, and the only city which resisted Pyrrhus when he passed into the island. The Ægates insulæ lie off this coast to the north-west, and are memorable for the victory gained by the Romans over the Carthaginian fleet in their vicinity.] The town of Lilybæum had a port large and capacious, which the Romans, in the wars with Carthage, endeavoured in vain to stop and fill up with stones, on account of its convenience and vicinity to the coast of Africa. Nothing now remains of this once powerful city but the ruins of temples and aqueducts. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 706.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 6.—Cic. in Verr. 5.—Cæs. de Bell. Afric.—Diod. 22.

LIMNÆUM, a temple of Diana at Limnæ, from which the goddess was called Limnæa, and worshipped under that appellation at Sparta and in Achaia. The Spartans wished to seize the temple in the age of Tiberius, but the emperor interfered and gave it to its lawful possessors, the Messenians. Paus. 3, c. 14, l. 7, c. 20.—Tacit. Ann. 4, c. 43.

LIMNATIDIA, a festival in honour of Diana, surnamed Limnatis, from Limnæ, a school of exercise at Trœzene, where she was worshipped, or from λιμναι, ponds, because she presided over fishermen.

LIMONUM, a town of Gaul, afterwards Pictavi, Poictiers. Cæs. G. 8, c. 26.

LINDUM, a colony of Britain, now Lincoln. [Mannert imagines the modern name of Lincoln to have been formed from Lindum and Colonia. It is called by Bede, Lindi-Collina. Lindum was situate among the Coritani, forming their capital, and was on the main route from London to York.]

LINDUS, a city of Rhodes, built by Cercephus, son of Sol and Cydippe. The Danaides built there a temple to Minerva, and one of its colonies founded Gela in Sicily. It gave birth to Cleobulus, one of the seven wise men, and to Chares and Laches, who were employed in making and finishing the famous Colossus of Rhodes. [The vestiges of Lindus, called Lindo, are seated in a hamlet nearly in the middle of the eastern side of the island. It is, at present, a place of some little trade.] Strab. 14.—Homer. Il. 2.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 34.—Herodot. 7, c. 153.

LINGONES, [a people of Gaul whose territories included Vogesus, Vosges, and consequently the sources of the rivers Mosæ or Meuse, and Matrona or Marne. Their chief city was Andomadunum, afterwards Lingones, now Langres.] They passed into Italy, where they made some settlement near the Alps, at the head of the Adriatic. Tacit. H. 4, c. 55.—Martial. 11, ep. 57, v. 9, l. 14, ep. 159.—Lucan. 1, v. 398.—Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 26.

LINUS. This name is common to different persons whose history is confused, and who are often taken one for the other. One was son of Urania and Amphimarus the son of Neptune. Another was son of Apollo by Psamathe, daughter of Crotopus king of Argos. Martial mentions him in his 78 ep. l. 9. The third, son of Ismenius, and born at Thebes in Bœotia, taught music to Hercules, who in a fit of anger, struck him on the head with his lyre and killed him. He was son of Mercury and Urania, according to Diogenes, who mentions some of his philosophical compositions, in which he asserted that the world had been created in an instant. He was killed by Apollo, for presuming to compare himself to him. Apollodorus, however, and Pausanias mention that his ridicule of Hercules on his awkwardness in holding the lyre was fatal to him. [According to Archbishop Usher, Linus flourished about 1200 B. C. and he is mentioned by Eusebius among the poets who wrote before the time of Moses. Diodorus Siculus tells us from Dionysius of Mitylene the historian, who was contemporary with Cicero, that Linus was the first among the Greeks who invented verse and music, as Cadmus first taught them the use of letters. The same writer likewise attributes to him an account of the exploits of the first Bacchus, and a treatise upon the Greek mythology written in Pelasgian characters, which were also those used by Orpheus, and by Pronapides the preceptor of Homer. Diodorus says likewise that he added the string licanas to the Mercurian lyre, and gives to him the invention of rhythm and melody, which Suidas, who regards him as the most ancient of poets, confirms. He is said by many ancient writers to have had several disciples of great renown, among whom was Hercules, Thamyris and Orpheus. Stobæus has preserved some pretended verses of this ancient poet. They refer to the famous proposition of the Eleatic school, which was subsequently adopted by the latter Platonists and Pythagoreans, "The whole has been engendered by the whole."]

These verses are evidently the fabrications of later times than those of Linus. In the discourses of Stobæus are to be found two other verses of Linus on the divine Omnipotence.] Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diog. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 4.—Paus. 2, c. 15, l. 9, c. 20.—A fountain in Arcadia, whose waters were said to prevent abortion. Plin. 31, c. 2.

LIPARA, the largest of the Æolian islands on the coast of Sicily, now called Lipari [vid. end of this article.] It had a city of the same name, which, according to Diodorus, it received from Liparus the son of Auson, king of these islands, whose daughter Cyane was married by his successor Æolus, according to Pliny. The inhabitants of this island were powerful by sea, and from the great tributes which they paid to Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, they may be called very opulent. The island was celebrated for the variety of its fruits, and its raisins are still in general repute. It had some convenient harbours, and a fountain whose waters were much frequented on account of their medicinal powers. According to Diodorus, Æolus reigned at Lipara before Liparus. [The Lipari isles receive their modern name from the ancient Lipara. They were anciently known by the name of Æoliæ, or Vulcaniæ, insulæ. The former name they received from having been fabled to be the residence of Æolus, king of the winds; they obtained the latter appellation from their volcanic nature. The ancients knew them to be volcanic, but did not narrowly examine them; this has been reserved for modern philosophers. The Lipari isles are commonly reckoned 10 in number, and Lipara is the largest of these, being 19½ Italian miles in circuit. This island is peculiarly valuable to the naturalist, from the number and beauty of its volcanic products. According to Diodorus, all the Æolian isles were subject to great irruptions of fire, and their craters were visible in his time. *vid. LIRIS, now Garigliano, a river of Campania, which it separates from Latium. [It falls into the sea near Minturnæ. According to Strabo, its more ancient name was ΚΛΑΥΣ; according to Pliny, Glanis. Its source is in the country of the Marsi, west of the Lacus Fucinus. LITERNUM, [a town of Italy, in Campania, west of Atella, and north of Cumæ. It was a Roman colony, improved and enlarged by Augustus. The ruins of it may be traced on the edge of a large pond, in a flat and dreary shore, between the mouth of the Vulturinus and the promontory of Misenum. Hither Scipio Africanus withdrew from the accusations of his enemies, and here he is said to have passed the remainder of his days in retirement. It was his burial-place.]

LITHOBOLIA, a festival celebrated at Træzene, in honour of Lamia and Auxesia, who came from Crete, and was sacrificed by the fury of the seditious populace, and stoned to death. Hence the name of the solemnity, λιθοβολια, lapidation.

LIVIA DRUSILLA, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of L. Drusus Calidianus. She married Tiberius Claudius Nero, by whom she had the emperor Tiberius and Drusus Germanicus. The attachment of her husband to the cause of Antony was the beginning of her greatness. Augustus saw her as she fled from the danger which threatened her husband, and he resolved to marry her, though she was then pregnant. He divorced his wife Scribonia, and, with the approbation of the augurs, he celebrated his nuptials with Livia. She now took advantage of the passion of Augustus, in the share that she enjoyed of his power and imperial dignity. Her children by Drusus were adopted by the complying emperor; and, that she might make the succession of her son Tiberius more easy and indisputed, Livia is accused of secretly involving in one common ruin the heirs and nearest relations of Augustus. Her cruelty and ingratitude are still more strongly marked, when she is charged with having murdered her own husband, to hasten the elevation of Tiberius. If she was anxious for the aggrandizement of her son, Tiberius proved ungrateful, and hated a woman to whom he owed his life, his elevation, and his greatness. Livia died in the 36th year of her age, A. D. 29. Tiberius showed himself as undutiful after her death as before, for he neglected her funeral, and expressly commanded that no honours, either private or public, should be paid to her memory. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.—Suet. in Aug. 8. Tib.—Dion. Cass.—Another. [vid. Drusilla.]—Another, called Horestilla, &c. [LIVIAE leges, proposed by M. Livius Drusus, a tribune, A. U. C. 662, about transplanting colonies to different parts of Italy and Sicily, and granting corn to poor citizens at a low price; also, that the judices should be chosen indiscriminately from the senators and equites, and that the allied states of Italy should be admitted to the freedom of the city. Drusus was a man of great eloquence, and of the most upright intentions; but, endeavouring to reconcile those whose interests were diametrically opposite, he was crushed in the attempt, being murdered by an unknown assassin in his own house, upon his return from the forum, amidst a number of clients and friends. No inquiry was made about his death. The states of Italy considered this event as the signal of a revolt, and endeavoured to extort by force what they could not obtain voluntarily. Above 300,000 men fell in the contest in the space of two years. At last the Romans, although upon the whole they had the advantage, were obliged to grant the freedom of the city, first to the allies, and afterwards to all the states of Italy.]

LIVIVS ANDRONICUS, a dramatic poet who flourished at Rome about 240 years before the Christian era. [He was a native of Magna Grecia. Tiraboschi asserts that when his country was finally subdued by the Romans in 487, Livius was made captive and brought to Rome. It is generally believed that he there became the slave, and afterwards the freedman, of Livius Salinator, from whom he derived one of his names; but these facts do not seem to rest on any authority more ancient than the Eusebian Chronicle. The precise period of his death is uncertain; but in Cicero's dialogue De Senectute, Cato is introduced saying, that he had seen old Livius while he was himself a youth. Now Cato was born in 519, and since the period of youth among the Romans was considered as commencing at fifteen, it may be presumed that the existence of Livius was at least protracted till the year 534 of the city.] He was the first who turned the personal satires and Fescennine verses, so long the admiration of the Romans, into the form of a proper dialogue and regular play. Though the character of a player, so valued and applauded in Greece, was reckoned vile and despicable among the Romans, Andronicus acted a part in his dramatical compositions, and engaged the attention of his audience, by repeating what he had laboriously formed after the manner of the Greeks. His poetry was grown obsolete in the age of Cicero, whose nicety and judgment would not even recommend the reading of it. [Livius, however, is entitled to the praise of being the first inventor among the Romans of a species of poetry which was afterwards carried by them to much higher perfection. Cicero compares the translation of the Odyssey by Livius to the ancient statues which might be attributed to Dædalus. Like Thespis, and most other dramatists in the commencement of the theatric art, Livius was an actor, and for a considerable time the sole performer of his own pieces. Afterwards, however, his voice failing, in consequence of the audience insisting on a repetition of favourite passages, he introduced a boy, who relieved him by declaiming the recitative part in concert with the flute, while he himself executed the corresponding gesticulations in the monologues, and in parts where high exertion was required, only employing his own voice in the conversational and less elevated scenes. "Hence," observes Livy, "the practice arose of dividing the representation between two actors, and of reciting, as it were, to the gesture and action of the comedian. Thenceforth the custom so far prevailed, that the comedians never uttered any thing except the verses of the dialogue." And this system, apparently so well calculated to destroy all theatrical illusion, continued, under certain modifications, to subsist on the Roman stage during the most refined periods of taste and literature.] Some few of his verses are preserved in the Corpus Poetarum.—M. Salinator, a Roman consul against the Illyrians. The success with which he finished his campaign, and the victory which some years after he obtained over Asdrubal, who was passing into Italy with a reinforcement for his brother Annibal, show how deserving he was to be at the head of the Roman armies. [In the second Punic war a new tax was imposed on salt, at the suggestion of the censors Claudius Nero and Livius, chiefly the latter, and hence he obtained the surname Salinator.] Liv.—Drusus, a tribune who joined the patricians in opposing the ambitious views of C. Gracchus. Plut. in Gracc.—An uncle of Cato of Utica. Plut.—Titus, a native of Padua, celebrated for his writings. [He resided at Rome a considerable time, where he was highly honoured by Augustus, to whom he was previously known, it is said, by some writings which he had dedicated to him. Seneca, however, is silent upon the subject of this supposed dedication, though he mentions the work itself, which, he says, consisted of moral and philosophical dialogues. He appears to have conceived the project of writing his history immediately upon his settling at Rome, or perhaps he came thither for the purpose of collecting the necessary materials for that great work. Augustus made him precept α to his grandson Claudius, afterwards emperor; but he seems not much to have attended to the advantage which might result from such a connection, and to have occupied himself entirely in the composition of his history, parts of which, as they were finished, he read to Augustus and Mæcenas. Distracted with the tumults, and, it may be, disgusted with the intrigues and ca-

bals of Rome, he sought retirement and tranquillity in the beautiful country and delightful climate of Naples. Here he finished his history. Having completed his work, he returned to finish the remainder of his days in his native country, where he died A. D. 17, at the age of 75 years. On the day of his death Rome is said to have been deprived of another of its brightest ornaments in the poet Ovid.] Few particulars of his life are known, yet his fame was so universally spread, even in his life-time, that an inhabitant of Gades traversed Spain, Gaul, and Italy, merely to see the man whose writings had given him such pleasure and satisfaction in the perusal. The name of Livy is rendered immortal by his history of the Roman empire. Besides this, he wrote the philosophical treatises and dialogues above mentioned, with a letter addressed to his son, on the merit of authors which ought to be read by young men. This letter is greatly commended by Quintilian, who expatiates with great warmth on the judgment and candour of the author. His Roman history was comprehended in 142 books, of which only 35 [and a fragment of another] are extant. It began with the foundation of Rome, and was continued till the death of Drusus in Germany. [It contained a period of 743 years, ending 9 years before the birth of our Saviour. The contents of the whole number of books, however, the 137th and 138th excepted, have been preserved and compiled, as some without any good reason have supposed, by Livy himself, while others, with equal improbability, have asserted them to be the work of Florus. Whoever may have been the compiler, they are highly curious; and although they contain but a faint outline, yet they serve to convey some idea of the original, and greatly excite regret at the loss of so large a portion of this valuable work.] The merit of this history is well known, and the high rank which Livy holds among historians will never be disputed. He is always great, his style is clear and intelligible, laboured without affectation, diffusive without tediousness, and argumentative without pedantry. In his harangues he is bold and animated, and in his narrations and descriptions, he claims a decided superiority. He is always elegant, although many have branded his provincial words with the name of Patavinity. [In what this Patavinity consisted, no ancient author having defined it, is difficult to say. It may have been some peculiarity of dialect which marked the Latinity of that quarter of Italy where Livy was born, the Veneti having been probably of Sclavonic descent. But this is difficult to affirm, when to us the style of Livy appears far above any peculiarities of provincialism. Perhaps, after all, as the charge came from Asinius Pollio, it may have been merely the affected criticism of a courtier.] Livy has been censured, and perhaps with justice, for being too credulous, and burdening his history with vulgar notions and superstitious tales. He may disgust when he mentions that milk and blood were rained from heaven, or that an ox spoke, or a woman changed her sex; yet he candidly confesses that he recorded only what had made an indelible impression upon the minds of a credulous age. [It is astonishing that Livy ever should have been charged with credulity on account of the prodigies which he relates. He merely quotes from the annals of past ages, and fully justifies and explains the course he has pursued, in that beautiful passage of his history (B. 43, c. 15), "I am not ignorant that the age in which I live no longer believes in the presages by which the gods announce the future, and that, as a consequence of this incredulity, we no longer publish prodigies, or are careful to record them in our annals; yet in writing the history of distant ages, my mind involuntarily assumes the tone of former days, (nescio quo pacto antiquus fit animus) and I feel reluctant to banish from my writings, as unworthy of having a place therein, those occurrences which the wisdom of our forefathers judged deserving of a public expiation (quæ illi prudentissimi viri publice suscipienda censuerint)."] His candour has also been called in question, and he has sometimes shown himself too partial to his countrymen, but every where he is an indefatigable supporter of the cause of justice and virtue. [It appears from his having prefixed separate prefatory introductions to each portion, that Livy had divided his work into distinct parts, consisting each of 10 books. The parts of his history which we now possess are, the first, third, and fourth, decades, 5 books of the 5th decade, (and these very imperfect,) and a fragment of the 91st book; which last was discovered by Bruns in the Vatican library in 1772. It is said at the present moment (February, 1827,) that the learned Abbé Rosch, who is employed in the library at Pisa, has just discovered in the charters of a Capuchin convent, fifteen of the lost books of the Roman historian.] The first decade comprehends the history of 460 years. The second decade is lost. [It comprised a period of 75 years: the principal occurrence in it was the first Punic war.] The third comprehends the history of the second Punic war, which includes about 18 years. In the fourth decade, Livy treats of the wars with Macedonia and Antiochus, which contain about 23 years. For the first five books of the fifth decade we are indebted to the researches of the moderns. They were found at Worms, A. D. 1431. [These 5 books give an account of the war with Perseus king of Macedonia; of the corruption of several Roman governors in the administration of the provinces, and their punishment; and of the third Punic war. The fragment of the 91st book, above mentioned, details some of the operations of Sertorius in Spain.] These are the books that remain of Livy's history, and the loss which the celebrated work has sustained by the ravages of time, has in some measure been compensated

by the labours of J. Freinshemius, who with great attention and industry has made an epitome of the Roman history, which is now incorporated with the remaining books of Livy. The third decade seems to be superior to the others, yet the author has not scrupled to copy from his contemporaries and predecessors; and we find many passages taken word for word from Polybius, in which the latter has shown himself more informed in military affairs, and superior to his imitator. The best editions of Livy will be found to be those of Maittaire, 6 vols. 12mo. London, 1722: of Drakenborch, 7 vols. 4to. Amst. 1731; and of Ruddiman, 4 vols. 12mo. Edin. 1751. [A very excellent and valuable edition of Livy, by Stroth, improved by Doëring, was published at Gotha in 1816-19. The edition of Crevier also is a valuable one, Paris, 1735, 6 vols. 4to.]

LIXUS, a river of Mauritania, with a city of the same name. Antæus had a palace there, and, according to some accounts, it was in the neighbourhood that Hercules conquered him. Ital. 3, v. 258.—Mela, 3, c. 10.—Strab. 2.

LOCRI, [a people who are said to have derived their name from an ancient hero called Locris or Locros, whose son Opus founded a town under his own name. They formed four divisions, with appropriate surnames, the three first of which, viz. Locri Ozolæ, Locri Epicnemidii, and Locri Opuntii, were settled in Greece; the fourth division, denominated Epizephyrii, inhabited Magna Græcia, near the promontory of Zephyrium, at the southern extremity of the Bruttiorum ager. The Ozolæ occupied a considerable extent of country west of Phocis and along the Sinus Corinthiacus. They derived their appellation from the circumstance, it is said, of the arrows of Hercules having been buried in their territory, from which, as being tinged with the poison of the Hydra, a mephitic vapour arose; hence the name ζολαι from αζω, oleo. Others, however, derive the name from the circumstance of their having continued to dress themselves in the skins of wild beasts after all the rest of the Greeks had assumed more suitable clothing. The Locri themselves never adopted the appellation Ozolæ, as may well be supposed. Their chief town was Amphissa, now Salona. Nauptactus was also one of their cities. The Epicnemidii lay north-east of the former, along the part of the Sinus Maliacus opposite the promontory Ceneum in Eubœa. They derived their name from Mount Cnemis, in whose vicinity they dwelt. Their chief town was Thronium. South-east of these last were the Locri Opuntii, so called from Opus their chief city. The Locri Epizephyrii migrated to Italy at an early period; their chief town was said to be coeval with Cyzicus. Strabo, however, makes it to have been founded a little after Crotona and Syracuse, about 757 B. C. The Epizephyrian Locri had a code of laws compiled for them by Zaleucus, from the several codes of Crete, Sparta, and Athens.

'They were a brave people, and in a battle with the Crotonians, 10,000 Locri with a few allies defeated 130,000 of the enemy near the river Sagra: an event so marvellous, that it became proverbial, in giving attestation to the fact thought incredible, to say, Αλθητα των ενι Σαγρα, "it is more true than the battle of Sagra." Plin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 6. &c.—Ptol.—Mela.—Liv. 26, c. 26, l. 28, c. 6—Paus. Ach. & Phoc.

LOCUSTA, a celebrated woman at Rome in the favour of Nero. She poisoned Claudius and Britannicus, and at last attempted to destroy Nero himself, for which she was executed. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 66, &c.—Suet. in Ner. 33.

LOCUTIUS. vid. Aius.

LOLLIA PAULINA, a beautiful woman, daughter of M. Lollius, who married C. Memmius Regulus, and afterwards Caligula. She was divorced and put to death by means of Agrippina. Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 1, &c.

LOLLIANUS SPURIUS, a general proclaimed emperor by his soldiers in Gaul, and soon after murdered, &c.

M. LOLLIUS, a companion and tutor of C. Cæsar, the son-in-law of Tiberius. He was consul, and offended Augustus by his rapacity in the provinces. Horace has addressed two of his epistles to him, &c. Tacit. Ann. 3.

LONDINUM, the capital of Britain, founded, as some suppose, between the age of Julius Cæsar and Nero. It has been severally called Londinium, Lundinum, &c. Ammianus calls it vetustum oppidum. It is represented as a considerable, opulent, and commercial town in the age of Nero. [There is very great reason to suppose that it existed before Cæsar's time. Its favourable situation for commerce must have given the place an early origin. Ancient Londinium is thought to have occupied that part of the modern city which lies on the north of the Thames, near the Tower of London. As, however, Ptolemy assigns it to the Cantii, many have been led to decide in favour of the borough of Southwark on the south side of the river, or rather to the part immediately west of this, especially as here many remains of antiquity have been found. It is most probable, however, that Londinium lay on both sides of the river.] Tacit. Ann. 14, c. 33.—Ammian.

LONGIMANUS, a surname of Artaxerxes the 1st; [in Greek Μακροχεις. Plutarch states that this appellation was given him because his right hand was longer than his left. But Strabo says that he was so called from the extraordinary length of his arms, which on his standing straight could reach his knees.] C. Nep. in Reg.

LONGINUS, Dionysius Cassius, a celebrated Greek philosopher and critic of Athens. [Some suppose him to have been a native of Emesa in Syria, others of Palmyra. The best opinion, however, is that which makes Athens his birth-place. It is of Longinus that Eunapius first made the remark which has been so often repeated in similar cases: he called him "a living library, and a walking study." As regards the prænomèn Dionysius which is commonly appended to his name, it would seem from an examination of the two principal manuscripts which have preserved this work to us, and of which one is at Paris, the other in the Vatican, that he is named therein Dionysius or Longinus. (Διονυσίου ἢ Λογγίνου). Amid the great number of works composed by Longinus, but which, unfortunately, are lost, may be named his "Treatise on Homer," a "Lexicon of Attic forms of expression," a "System of Rhetoric, and a "Commentary on the Phædo and Timæus of Plato," of which last Olympianus and Proclus have preserved some fragments. Longinus was not only a sophist but likewise a philosopher. A disciple of Ammonius Saccæus, he belonged to the latter Platonists, but preserved himself from their errors.] He was preceptor of the Greek language, and afterwards minister, to Zenobia, the famous queen of Palmyra, and his ardent zeal and spirited activity in her cause proved, at last, fatal to him. [Longinus is said to have induced Zenobia to shake off the Roman yoke, and to have dictated to the queen a proud and spirited letter to the emperor Aurelian. It is given in the life of Aurelian by Vopiscus, (c. 27.) Aurelian, greatly irritated at this, and having shortly after made himself master of Palmyra, caused Longinus to be put to death. A. D. 273.] At the moment of death he showed himself great and resolute, and with a philosophical and unparalleled firmness of mind, he even repressed the tears and sighs of the spectators who pitied his miserable end. Longinus has rendered his name immortal by his critical remarks on ancient authors. His treatise on the Sublime gives the world reason to lament the loss of his other valuable compositions. [The treatise on the Sublime, (περι ὑψους), is one of the most celebrated works of antiquity. It is probably the fragment of a much larger work. Longinus develops in it, with a truly philosophical spirit, the nature of sublimity in thought and expression. He establishes the laws for its use, and illustrates these by examples, which constitute at the same time an ingenious critique upon the highest productions of antiquity. The style of the work is animated and correct; though critics think that they discover in it forms of expression which could not have been employed prior to the third century, and which stand in direct opposition to the theory of Amati, who makes the work to have been composed in the age of Augustus. Rhunken is said to have discovered, in reading Apsines, a Greek rhetorician, all the lost work of Longinus on Rhetoric, excepting the first chapter. He found it intermingled with the work of the former, and recognized it by its style. He pronounces it not inferior to the Treatise on the Sublime. Sed adhuc sub judice lis est.] The best editions of this author are that of Tollius, 4to. Traj. ad Rhen. 1694, and that of Toup. 8vo. Oxon. 1778. [The best edition now is that of Weiske, Lips. 1809, 8vo. re-printed at London, 1820.]—A lawyer whom, though blind and respected, Nero ordered to be put to death, because he had in his possession a picture of Cassius, one of Cæsar's murderers. Juv. 10, v. 6.

LONGOBARDI, [vid. Langobardi.]

LONGŪLA, a town of Latium on the borders of the Volsci. Liv. 2, c. 33 and 39, l. 9, c. 39.

LONGUS, [a Greek writer, author of a prose romance entitled "Pastorals," and relating to the loves of Daphnis and Chloe. He is supposed to have lived in the time of Theodosius the Great. His work is a curious specimen of that kind of composition in its simplest form, and contains many descriptive beauties. His style is simple and pleasing, though this evidently is more the result of great art and labour than of natural feeling. His work is said to have furnished the model for the "Paul and Virginia" of St. Pierre, though the morality of the latter is far superior to that of its prototype. The best editions are those of Villoison, Paris, 1778, 2 vols. 8vo. that of Coray, Paris, 1802, 4to. and that of Schæfer, Lips. 1803.]

LOTIS or LOTOS, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Neptune. Priapus offered her violence, and to save herself from his importunities she implored the gods who changed her into a tree called Lotus, consecrated to Venus and Apollo. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 348.

LOTOPHĀGI, a people on the coast of Africa near the Syrtes. They received this name from their living upon the Lotus. Ulysses visited their country at his return from the Trojan war. [According to Rennell, the location of the Lotophagi merely on the coast of Africa, arose from the want of a more extended knowledge of the countries bordering on the Desert, on the part of the ancient writers. He states that the tribes who inhabit these countries, and whose manners are in any degree known unto us, eat universally of this fruit. The shrub or tree that bears the lotus fruit is disseminated over the edge of the Great Desert, from the coast of Cyrene round by Tripolis and Africa Propria, to the borders of the Atlantic, the Senegal, and the Niger. Park says, that the Lotus was very common in all the countries which he visited, and that it furnished the natives of the negro kingdoms with a food resembling bread, and also with a sweet liquor which is much relished by them. Whether from the same lotus the Lotophagi obtained both meat and wine, has been much disputed by the learned. According to Homer, whoever ate of the lotus lost all wish of returning home, and became desirous of remaining always in the country of the lotus, on account of this delightful food.] Herodot. 4, c. 177.—Strab. 17.—Mela, 1, c. 7.—Plin. 5, c. 7, l. 13, c. 17.

LŪA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over things which were purified by lustrations, whence the name (a lundo.) She is supposed to be the same as Ops or Rhea.

LŪCA, now Lucca, a city of Etruria on the river Arnus. Liv. 21, c. 5, l. 41, c. 13.—Cic. 13, fam. 13.

LŪCĀNI, a people of Italy, descended from the Samnites, or from the Brutii.

LŪCĀNIA, [a country of Magna Græcia, south of Apulia.] The country was famous for its grapes. Strab. 6.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Liv. 8, c. 17, l. 9, c. 20, l. 10, c. 11.—Horat. 2, ep. 2, v. 178.

LUCĀNUS, M. ANNÆUS, a native of Corduba in Spain. [His father Annæus Mela, a Roman knight, was the youngest brother of Seneca the philosopher.] He was early removed to Rome, where his rising talents, and more particularly his lavished praises and panegyrics, recommended him to the emperor Nero. This intimacy was soon productive of honour, and Lucan was raised to the dignity of an augur and quæstor before he had attained the proper age. The poet had the imprudence to enter the lists against his imperial patron; he chose for his subject Orpheus, and Nero took the tragical story of Niobe. Lucan obtained an easy victory, but Nero became jealous of his poetical reputation, and resolved upon revenge. The insults to which Lucan was daily exposed, provoked at last his resentment, and he joined Piso in a conspiracy against the emperor. The whole was discovered, and the poet had nothing left but to choose the manner of his execution. He had his veins opened in a warm bath, and as he expired he pronounced with great energy the lines which, in his Pharsalia, l. 3, v. 639-642, he had put into the mouth of a soldier, who died in the same manner as himself. Some have accused him of pusillanimity at the moment of his death, and say that, to free himself from the punishment which threatened him, he accused his own mother, and involved her in the crime of which he was guilty. This circumstance, which throws an indelible blot upon the character of Lucan, is not mentioned by some writers, who observe that he expired with all the firmness of a philosopher. He died in his 26th year, A. D. 65. Of all his compositions none but his Pharsalia remains. This poem, which is an account of the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, is unfinished. Opinions are various as to the merit of the poetry. It possesses neither the fire of Homer, nor the melodious numbers of Virgil. If Lucan had lived to a greater age, his judgment and genius would have matured, and he might have claimed a more exalted rank among the poets of the Augustan age. His expressions, however, are bold and animated, his poetry entertaining, though his irregularities are numerous, and to use the words of Quintilian, he is more an orator than a poet. He wrote a poem upon the burning of Rome, now lost. It is said that his wife Polla Argentaria, not only assisted him in the composition of his poem, but even corrected it after his death. Scaliger says, that Lucan rather barks than sings. The best editions of Lucan are those of Oudendorp, 4to. L. Bat. 1728, of Bentley, 4to. printed at Strawberry-hill, 1760, and of Barbou, 12mo. Paris, 1767. Quintil. 10.—Suet.—Tacit. Ann. 15, &c.—Martial. 7, ep. 20.—Ocellus or Ucellus, an ancient Pythagorean philosopher, whose age is unknown. He wrote, in the Attic dialect, a book on the nature of the universe which he deemed eternal, and from it were drawn the systems adopted by Aristotle, Plato, and Philo Judæus. This work was first translated into Latin by Nogarola. Another book of Ocellus on laws, written in the Doric dialect, was greatly esteemed by Archytas and Plato, a fragment of which has been preserved by Stobæus, to which, however, Ocellus is disputed to be the author. There is an edition of Ocellus, with a learned commentary, by C. Emman, Vizzanius, Bononiæ, 1646, in 4to.

LŪCĀRIA or LŪCĒRIA, festivals at Rome, celebrated in a large grove between the Via Salaria and the Tiber, where the Romans hid themselves when besieged by the Gauls. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 77.

L. LUCCEIUS, a celebrated historian, asked by Cicero to write a history of his consulship. He favoured the cause of Pompey, but was afterwards pardoned by J. Cæsar. Cic. ad Fam. 5, ep. 12, &c.

LŪCĒRES, [the third of the three original tribes at Rome. These three original tribes were the Ramnenses or Ramnes, the Tatienses or Titienses, and the Luceres. It included all foreigners except the Sabines.] It received its name either from Lucumo, an Etrurian who assisted the Romans against the Sabines, or from lucus, a grove where Romulus had erected an asylum, or a place of refuge for all fugitives, slaves, homicides, &c. that he might people the city. Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 31.

LUCĒRIA, a town of Apulia, famous for wool, [south-west of Arpi.] Liv. 9, c. 2 and 12, l. 10, c. 35.—Horat. 3, od. 15, v. 14.—Lucan. 2, v. 473.

LUCERIUS, a surname of Jupiter, as the father of light.

LUCIANUS, a celebrated writer of Samosata. His father was poor in his circumstances, and Lucian was early bound to one of his uncles, who was a sculptor. This employment highly displeased him, he made no proficiency in the art, and resolved to seek his livelihood by better means. A dream in which learning seemed to draw him to her, and to promise fame and immortality, confirmed his resolutions, and he began to write. The artifices and unfair dealings of a lawyer, a life which he had embraced, disgusted him, and he began to study philosophy and eloquence. He visited different places, and Antioch, Ionia, Greece, Italy, Gaul, and more particularly Athens, became successively acquainted with the depth of his learning and the power of his eloquence. The emperor M. Aurelius was sensible of his merit, and appointed him register to the Roman governor of Egypt. He died A. D. 180, in his 90th year, and some of the moderns have asserted that he was torn to pieces by dogs for his impiety, particularly for ridiculing the religion of Christ. [This is very probably a mere fable. Equally erroneous is the statement made by some, that he apostatised after having been a Christian. Had he ever been a follower of Christianity he would have known its nature and spirit better, and would not have confounded it with Judaism, as he has done in his Peregrinus Proteus. It is true that the discourse entitled Philopatris, found among his works, displays a considerable acquaintance with the Christian religion, but very strong arguments might be adduced against Lucian's being the real author of the piece. After all Lucian did not do much harm to the Christians. In common with many other distinguished men of his age, he had the misfortune to misconstrue the character of the Founder of our religion. He merely represents the Christians as a simple race of men, deceived by a fanatical doctrine.] The works of Lucian, which are numerous, and written in the Attic dialect, consist partly of dialogues, in which he introduces different characters with much dramatic propriety. His style is easy, simple, elegant, and animated, and he has stored his compositions with many lively sentiments, and much of the true Attic wit. [With the exception of some tautologies, the writings of Lucian savour little of the want of taste which characterised the age in which he lived. His style, formed by the study of the best models, and especially of Aristophanes, is as pure, as elegant, and as Attic, as if he had flourished in the classic periods of Grecian literature; and the defects of the age in which he wrote only show themselves occasionally in his adoption of new terms, or of old ones in a new signification, a failing which he himself ridicules in others in one of his works entitled Lexiphanes.] His frequent obscenities, and his manner of exposing to ridicule not only the religion of his country, but also that of every other nation, have deservedly drawn upon him the censure of every age and branded him with the appellation of atheist and blasphemers. He also wrote the life of Sostrates, a philosopher of Bœotia, as also that of the philosopher Demonax. Some have also attributed to him, with great impropriety, the life of Apollonius Tyaneus. The best editions of Lucian are that of Grævius, 2 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1687; that of Reitzius, 4 vols. 4to. Amst. 1743, [re-printed at the Bipont press, 1786-93, 10 vols. 8vo.; and that of Lehman, Lips. 1822, 3 vols. 8vo.]

LŪCIFER, the name of the planet Venus, or morning star. It is called Lucifer when appearing in the morning before the sun; but when it follows it, and appears some time after its setting, it is called Hesperus. According to some mythologists, Lucifer was son of Jupiter and Aurora.—A Christian writer, whose work was edited by the Coleti, fol. Venet. 1778.

C. LŪCILIVS, a Roman knight born at Arunca, illustrious not only for the respectability of his ancestors, but more deservedly for the uprightness and the innocence of his own immaculate character. [He was grand uncle by the mother's side to Pompey the Great. In early youth he served at the siege of Numantia, in the same camp with Marius and Jugurtha, under the younger Africanus, whose friendship and protection he had thus the good fortune to acquire. On his return to Rome he continued to live on terms of the closest intimacy with Scipio and his friend Lælius. These powerful protectors enabled him to satirize the vicious without restraint or fear of punishment.] He is looked upon as the founder of satire, and as the first great satirical writer among the Romans. He was superior to his poetical predecessors at Rome; and though he wrote with great roughness and inelegance, but with much facility, he gained many admirers, whose praises have often been lavished with too liberal a hand. Of the thirty books of satires which he wrote nothing but a few verses remain. [The period at which Lucilius appeared was favourable to satiric composition. There was a struggle existing between the old and new manners, and the freedom of speaking and writing, though restrained, had not yet been totally checked by law. Lucilius lived with a people among whom luxury and corruption were advancing with fearful rapidity, but among whom some virtuous citizens were anxious to stem the tide which threatened to overwhelm their countrymen. The satires of Lucilius were adapted to please the latter. The freedom of his attacks upon the vices of his contemporaries, without even sparing individuals, had nothing revolting in an age when no consideration compelled to those forbearances necessary under different forms of society or government. By the time too that he wrote, the delicate and cutting irony of the Greek comedies had come much into vogue at Rome, and Lucilius, by applying himself to the imitation of these dramatic productions, had caught, it is said, much of their fire and spirit. Nor did he, like his predecessors, mix iambic with trochaic verses. Twenty books of his satires were in hexameter verse, and the rest, with the exception of the thirtieth, in iambics or trochaics. As a writer, he had much of the old Roman humour, that celebrated but undefined urbanitas, which, indeed, he possessed in so eminent a degree, that Pliny says it began with Lucilius in composition, while Cicero declares that he carried it to the highest perfection, and that it almost expired with him. The well known lines of Juvenal, who relates how he made the guilty tremble by his pen, as much as if he had pursued them sword in hand, have fixed his character as a determined and inexorable persecutor of vice. His versification, however, was rugged and prosaic. Horace, while he allows that he was more polished than his contemporaries, calls his muse "pedestris," talks repeatedly of the looseness of his measure, and compares his whole poetry to a muddy and troubled stream. Quintilian, however, does not entirely coincide with this opinion of Horace.] He died at Naples in the 46th year of his age, B. C.

103. His fragments have been collected and published with notes by Fr. Dousa, 4to. L. Bat. 1597, and lastly by the Vulpii, 8vo. Patav. 1735. Quintil. 10, c. 1.—Cic. de Orat. 2.—Horat.—Lucilius, a famous Roman who fled with Brutus after the battle of Philippi. They were soon after overtaken by a party of horse, and Lucilius suffered himself to be severely wounded by the darts of the enemy, exclaiming that he was Brutus. He was taken, and carried to the conquerors, whose clemency spared his life. Plut.

LUCILLA, a daughter of M. Aurelius, celebrated for the virtues of her youth, her beauty, debaucheries, and misfortunes. At the age of sixteen her father sent her to Syria to marry the emperor Verus, who was then employed in a war with the Parthians and Armenians. The conjugal virtues of Lucilla were great at first, but when she saw Verus plunge himself into debauchery and dissipation, she followed his example, and prostituted herself. At her return to Rome, she saw the incestuous commerce of her husband with her mother, &c. and at last poisoned him. She afterwards married an old but virtuous senator, by order of her father, and was not ashamed soon to gratify the criminal sensualities of her brother Commodus. The coldness and indifference with which Commodus treated her afterwards determined her on revenge, and she with many illustrious senators conspired against his life, A. D. 185. The plot was discovered, Lucilla was banished, and soon after put to death by her brother, in the 38th year of her age.

LUCINA, a goddess, daughter of Jupiter and Juno, or, according to others, of Latona. As her mother brought her into the world without pain, she became the goddess whom women in labour invoked, and she presided over the birth of children. She received this name either from lucus, or from lux, as Ovid explains it :

Aut quia principium tu, Dea, lucis habes.*

Some suppose her to be the same as Diana and Juno, because these two goddesses were also sometimes called Lucina, and presided over the labours of women. She is called Ilythia by the Greeks. She had a famous temple at Rome, raised A. U. C. 396. Varro de L. L. 4.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 449.—Horat. Carm. Sec.

LUCIUS. The word Lucius is a prænomen common to many Romans, of whom an account is given under their family names.

LUCRËTIA, a celebrated Roman lady, daughter of Lucretius, and wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. Her accomplishments proved fatal to her, and the praises which a number of young nobles at Ardea, among whom were Collatinus and the sons of Tarquin, bestowed upon the domestic virtues of their wives at home, were productive of a revolution in the state. While every one was warm with the idea, it was universally agreed to leave the camp and to go to Rome, to ascertain the veracity of their respective assertions. Collatinus had the pleasure to see his expectations fulfilled in the highest degree, and, while the wives of the other Romans were involved in the riot and dissipation of a feast, Lucretia was found at home, employed in the midst of her female servants, and easing their labour by sharing it herself. The beauty and innocence of Lucretia inflamed the passion of Sextus, the son of Tarquin, who was a witness of her virtue and industry. He cherished his flame, and he secretly retired from the camp, and came to the house of Lucretia, where he met with a kind reception. He showed himself unworthy of such a treatment, and in the dead of night, he introduced himself to Lucretia, who refused to his entreaties what her fear of shame granted to his threats. She yielded to her ravisher when he threatened to murder her, and to slay one of her slaves, and put him in her bed, that this apparent adultery might seem to have met with the punishment it deserved. Lucretia in the morning sent for her husband and her father, and, after she had revealed to them the indignities she had suffered from the son of Tarquin, and entreated them to avenge her wrongs, she stabbed herself with a dagger which she had previously concealed under her clothes. This fatal blow was the sign of rebellion. The body of the virtuous Lucretia was exposed to the eyes of the senate, and the violence and barbarity of Sextus, joined with the unpopularity and oppression of his father, so irritated the Roman populace, that that moment they expelled the Tarquins for ever from Rome. Brutus, who was present at the tragical death of Lucretia, kindled the flames of rebellion, and the republican or consular government was established at Rome, A. U. C. 244. Liv. 1, c. 57. &c.—Dionys. Hal. 4, c. 15.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 741.—Val. Max. 6, c. 1.—Plut.—August. de Civ. D. 1, c. 19.—The wife of Numa. Plut.

LUCRÉTILIS, now Libretti, a mountain in the country of the Sabines, hanging over a pleasant valley, near which the house and farm of Horace were situate. Horat. 1, od. 17, v. 1.—Cic. 7, Att. 11.

T. LUCRÉTIUS CARUS, a celebrated Roman poet and philosopher, who was early sent to Athens, where he studied under Zeno and Phædrus. The tenets of Epicurus and Empedocles, which then prevailed at Athens, were warmly embraced by Lucretius, and when united with the infinite of Anaxamander, and the atoms of Democritus, they were explained and elucidated in a poem, in six books, which is called De rerum natura. In this poem the masterly genius and unaffected elegance of the poet are every where conspicuous; but the opinions of the philosopher are justly censured, who gives no existence of power to a Supreme Being, but is the devoted advocate of atheism and impiety, and earnestly endeavours to establish the mortality of the soul. This composition, which has little claim to be called a heroic poem, was written and finished during the lucid intervals of reason and sense, while he was suffering under the violent effects occasioned by a philtre, which the jealousy of his mistress or his wife Lucilia had administered. It is said that he destroyed himself in the 44th year of his age, about 54 years before Christ. Cicero, after his death, revised and corrected his poems. [Notwithstanding the absurdity of his doctrines, the poetic talents of Lucretius appear in every part of his work. His language and versification sometimes partake of the rudeness of an early period of literature, and in the argumentative parts of his work he is frequently difficult to be understood; but where the subject admits of elevated sentiment and descriptive beauty, no Roman poet has taken a loftier flight, or exhibited more spirit or sublimity: the same animated strain is supported almost throughout entire books. Virgil studied him, and has borrowed much of his diction. The morality of Lucretius is generally pure, but many of his descriptions are licentious. The doctrines of Lucretius, particularly that which impugns the superintending care of divine Providence, were first formally opposed by the Stoic Manilius, in his Astronomic poem. In modern times, his whole philosophical system has been refuted in the long and elaborate poem of the Cardinal Polignac. This work, though incomplete, consists of nine books, of about 1300 lines each, and the whole is addressed to Quintus, an atheist, who corresponds to the Lorenzo of the Night Thoughts. Descartes is the Epicurus of the poem, and the subject of many panegyrics. It is entitled Anti-Lucretius, sive de Deo et Natura. In this poem the Cardinal has sometimes refuted, at too great length, propositions manifestly absurd—at others he has impugned demonstrated truths—and the moral system of Lucretius he throughout has grossly misunderstood. But he has rendered ample justice to his poetical merit, and imbibed much of its spirit.] The best editions of his works are that of Creech, 8vo. Oxon. 1695; that of Havercamp, 2 vols. 4to. Lug. LUCRINUS, [a lake in Italy, near Cumæ, on the coast of Campania. According to Dio Cassius, (48, 50,) there were three lakes in this quarter lying one behind the other. The outermost was called Tyrrhenus, the middle one Lucrinus, and the innermost Avernus.]

Agrippa cut a communication between these lakes and the sea, and built at the opening cut and uniting the Lucrine and Avernian lakes, the famous Julian Harbour. The object in doing this chiefly was to procure a place along the coast fit for exercising and training a body of seamen previous to the contest with Sextus Pompeius. The woods, also, which surrounded Avernus in particular, were cut down, and the stagnant vapour being thus dissipated, the vicinity was rendered healthy. By this operation much land was reclaimed, which before had been covered by these lakes, an outlet being afforded to their waters into the sea. The shores of the Lucrine lake were famous for their oysters. In the year 1538, an earthquake formed a mountain near two miles in circumference, and 200 feet high, consisting of lava, burned stones, scoria, &c. which left no appearance of a lake, but a morass, filled with grass and rushes.] *Cic. 4. LUCULLUS, Lucius Licinius, a Roman, celebrated for his fondness of luxury, and for his military talents. He was born about 115 years before the Christian era, and soon distinguished himself by his proficiency in the liberal arts, particularly eloquence and philosophy. His first military campaign was in the Marsian war, where his valour and cool intrepidity recommended him to public notice. His mildness and constancy gained him the admiration and confidence of Sylla, and from this connection he derived honour, and during his quaestorship in Asia, and pretorship in Africa, he rendered himself more conspicuous by his justice, moderation, and humanity. He was raised to the consulship A. U. C. 680, and intrusted with the care of the Mithridatic war, and first displayed his military talents in rescuing his colleague Cotta, whom the enemy had besieged in Chalcedon. This was soon followed by a celebrated victory over the forces of Mithridates on the borders of the Granicus, and by the conquest of all Bithynia. His victories by sea were as great as those by land, and Mithridates lost a powerful fleet near Lemnos.

Such considerable losses weakened the enemy, and Mithridates retired with precipitation towards Armenia, to the court of king Tigranes, his father-in-law. His flight was perceived, and Lucullus crossed the Euphrates with great expedition, and gave battle to the numerous forces which Tigranes had already assembled to support the cause of his son-in-law. According to the exaggerated account of Plutarch, no less than 100,000 foot, and near 55,000 horse, of the Armenians, lost their lives in that celebrated battle. All this carnage was made by a Roman army amounting to no more than 18,000 men; of whom only five were killed and 100 wounded during the combat. The taking of Tigranocerta, the capital of Armenia, was the consequence of his immortal victory, and Lucullus there obtained the greatest part of the royal treasures. This continual success, however, was attended with serious consequences. The severity of Lucullus, and the haughtiness of his commands, the effects of continued success, offended his soldiers, and displeased his adherents at Rome. Pompey was soon after sent to succeed him, and to continue the Mithridatic war, and the interview which he had with Lucullus began with acts of mutual kindness, and ended in the most inveterate reproaches and open enmity. Lucullus was permitted to retire to Rome, and only 1600 of the soldiers who had shared his fortune and his glories were suffered to accompany him. He was received with coldness at Rome, and he obtained with difficulty a triumph which was deservedly claimed by his fame, his successes, and his victories. In this ended the days of his glory; he retired to the enjoyment of ease and peaceful society, and no longer interested himself in the commotions which disturbed the tranquillity of Rome. He dedicated his time to studious pursuits and to literary conversation. His house was enriched with a valuable library, which was opened for the service of the curious and of the learned. Lucullus fell into a delirium in the last part of his life, and died in the 67th or 68th year of his age. The people showed their respect for his merit, by their wish to give him an honourable burial in the Campus Martius; but their offers were rejected, and he was privately buried by his brother in his estate at Tusculum. Lucullus has been admired for his many accomplishments, but he has been censured for his severity and extravagance. The expenses of his meals were immoderate, his halls were distinguished by the different names of the gods; and, when Cicero and Pompey attempted to surprise him, they were astonished at the costliness of a supper which had been prepared upon the word of Lucullus, who had merely said to his servant that he would sup in the hall of Apollo. In his retirement Lucullus was fond of artificial variety; subterraneous caves and passages were dug under the hills on the coast of Campania, and the sea water was conveyed round the house and pleasure grounds, where the fishes flocked in such abundance that not less than 25,000 pounds worth were sold at his death. In his public character Lucullus was humane and compassionate, and he showed his sense of the vicissitudes of human affairs by shedding tears at the sight of one of the cities of Armenia, which his soldiers reduced to ashes. He was a perfect master of the Greek and Latin languages, and he employed himself for some time to write a concise history of the Marsi in Greek hexameters. Such are the striking characteristics of a man who meditated the conquest of Parthia, and, for a while gained the admiration of all the inhabitants of the east, by his justice and moderation, and who might have disputed the empire of the world with a Cæsar or Pompey, had not, at last, his fondness for retirement withdrawn him from the reach of ambition. *Cic. pro Arch. 4. LUGDUNENSIS GALLIA, a part of Gaul, which received its name from Lugdunum, the capital city of the province. vid. Gallia.

LUGDŪNUM, [a city of Gaul situate near the confluence of the Rhodanus or Rhône and the Arar or Saone. It was one of the places conquered by Cæsar, and, a short time after his death, Munatius Plancus received orders from the Roman senate to re-assemble at Lugdunum the inhabitants of Vienna or Vienne, who had been driven out of their city by the Allobroges. In a little while it became very powerful, so that Strabo says it was not inferior to Narbo or Narbonne with respect to the number of inhabitants. The ancient city did not occupy exactly the same spot as the modern one, but lay on the west side of the Rhone and Saone, while the chief part of modern Lyons is on the east side, at the very confluence of the two streams. At the extremity of the point of land formed by the two streams, and of course precisely corresponding with the southern extremity of the modern city, stood the famous altar erected by sixty Gallic nations in honour of Augustus. Lugdunum lay upon a hill, a position which the termination unum is said to imply. Here was established the gold and silver coinage of the province, and from this city, as a centre, the main roads diverged to all parts of Gaul. In the third century, Lugdunum declined in importance on account of the vicinity and rapid growth of Arelate and Narbo. Lyons is now one of the first manufacturing towns in France.] Juv. 1, v. 44.—Strab. 4.—Baturorum, a town on the Rhine just as it falls into the ocean. town at the foot of the Pyrenees, now St Bertrand, in Gascony.

LŪNA, (the moon) was daughter of Hyperion and Terra, and was the same, according to some mythologists, as Diana. She was worshipped by the ancient inhabitants of the earth with many superstitious forms and ceremonies. It was supposed that magicians and enchanters, particularly those of Thesaly, had an uncontrollable power over the moon, and that they could draw her down from heaven at pleasure by the mere force of their incantations. Her eclipses, according to their opinion, proceeded from thence; and on that account it was usual to beat drums and cymbals, to ease her labours, and to render the power of magic less effectual. The Arcadians believed that they were older than the moon. *Ovid. Met. 12, v. 263, &c.—Tibull. 1, el. 8, v. 21.—Hesiod. Theog.—Virg. LUPA, (a she-wolf) was held in great veneration at Rome, because Romulus and Remus, according to an ancient tradition, were suckled and preserved by one of these animals. This fabulous story arises from the surname of Lupa, prostitute, which was given to the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, to whose care and humanity these children owed their preservation. [It takes its rise rather from the circumstance of Ruma, one of the old names of the Tyber, being also old Latin for mamma, "the breast."] Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 415.—Plut. in Romul.

LUPERCAL, a place at the foot of Mount Aventine, sacred to Pan, where festivals, called Lupercalia, were yearly celebrated, and where the she-wolf was said to have brought up Romulus and Remus. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 343.

LUPERCĀLIA, a yearly festival observed at Rome the 15th of February, in honour of the god Pan. It was usual first to sacrifice two goats and a dog, and to touch with a bloody knife the foreheads of two illustrious youths, who always were obliged to smile while they were touched. The blood was wiped away with soft wool dipped in milk. After this the skins of the victims were cut into thongs, with which whips were made for the youths. With these whips the youths ran about the streets all naked except the middle, and whipped freely all those they met. Women in particular were fond of receiving the lashes, as they superstitiously believed that they removed barrenness, and eased the pains of child-birth. This excursion in the streets of Rome was performed by naked youths, because Pan is always represented naked, and a goat was sacrificed, because that deity was supposed to have the feet of a goat. A dog was added, as a necessary and useful guardian of the sheepfold. This festival, as Plutarch mentions, was first instituted by the Romans in honour of the she-wolf which suckled Romulus and Remus. This opinion is controverted by others, and Livy, with Dionysius of Halicarnassus, observes, that they were introduced into Italy by Evander. The name seems to be borrowed from the Greek name of Pan, Lycæus, from λυκος, a wolf; not only because these ceremonies were like the Lycean festivals observed in Arcadia, but because Pan, as god of shepherds, protected the sheep from the rapacity of the wolves. The priests who officiated at the Lupercalia were called Luperci. Augustus forbid any person above the age of fourteen to appear naked, or to run about the streets during the Lupercalia. Cicero, in his Philippics, reproaches Antony for having disgraced the dignity of the consulship by running naked, and armed with a whip, about the streets. It was during the celebration of these festivals that Antony offered a crown to J. Cæsar, which the indignation of the populace obliged him to refuse. [The Lupercalia were finally abolished. According to Baronius, this was done by Pope Gelasius, in the year 469 of the Christian era.] Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 427.—Varro L. L. 5, c. 3.

LUPERCI, a number of priests at Rome, who assisted at the celebration of the Lupercalia, in honour of the god Pan, to whose service they were dedicated. This order of priests was the most ancient and respectable of all the sacerdotal offices. It was divided into two separate colleges, called Fabiani and Quintiliani, from Fabius and Quintilius, two of their high priests. The former were instituted in honour of Romulus, and the latter of Remus. To these two sacerdotal bodies J. Cæsar added a third, called, from himself, the Julii, and this action contributed not a little to render his cause unpopular, and to betray his ambitious and aspiring views. (vid. Lupercalia.) Plut. in Rom.—Dio. Cas. 45.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 663.

LUPERCUS, a grammarian in the reign of the emperor Gallienus. He wrote some grammatical pieces, which some have perferred to Herodian's compositions.

LUPIAS or LUPIA, now Lippe, a town of Germany, with a small river of the same name falling into the Rhine. Tacit. Ann. 1, &c.

Rut. a Roman, who, contrary to the omens, marched against the Marsi, and was killed with his army. He had been taxed with impiety, and was severely censured in the Augustan age. Horat. 2, Sat. 1, v. 68.

LUSITANIA, a part of ancient Hispania, on the Atlantic coast. The name must be taken in two senses. All the old writers, whom Strabo also follows, understood by the term merely the territories of the Lusitani, and these were comprehended between the Durius and the Tagus, and extended in breadth from the ocean to the most eastern limits of the modern kingdom of Portugal. The Lusitani in time intermingled with the Spanish tribes in their vicinity, as, for example, with the Vettones, Calliaci, &c. on which account the name of Lusitania was extended to the territories of these tribes, and, finally, under this name became also included some tracts of country south of the Tagus. This is the first sense in which the term Lusitania must be taken, comprising namely, the territories of the Lusitani, the Calliaci, the Vettones, and some lands south of the Tagus. The Romans, after the conquest of the country, made a new arrangement of the several tribes. The territories of the Calliaci, lying north of the Durius, they included in Tarracensis Hispania, but, as an equivalent, they added to Lusitania all the country south of the Tagus and west of the lower part of the Anas, as far as the sea. According to this arrangement, Lusitania was bounded on the south by a part of the Atlantic, from the mouth of the Anas to the Sacrum Promontorium, or Cape St. Vincent; on the west by the Atlantic; on the north by the Durius; and on the east by a line drawn from the latter river, a little west of the modern city of Toro, in a south-eastern direction to the Anas, touching it about eight miles west of Merida, the ancient Emerita Augusta. The modern kingdom of Portugal, therefore, is in length larger than ancient Lusitania, since it comprehends two provinces beyond the Durius, Entre Douro y Minho and Tras los Montes, and has the Minius, or Minho, for its northern boundary, but from west to east it is much smaller than Lusitania. The latter embraced also Salamanca, the greater part of Estremadura, and the western extremity of Toledo. The most southern part of Lusitania was called Cuneus or the wedge, from its shape, and is now Algarve, from the Arabic Al-garb, or the west. Its extreme promontory was called Sacrum. vid. Sacrum Promontorium. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 1, p. 328.—Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 6, l. 3, c. 1.—Liv. 21, c. 43, l. 7, c. 20.

LUSONES, a people of Spain near the Iberus.

LUTATIUS CATULUS, a Roman who shut the temple of Janus after peace had been made with Carthage. vid. Luctatius.

LUTETIA, a town of Belgic Gaul, [on an island in the Sequana or Seine,] which received its name, as some suppose, from the quantity of clay, lutum, which is in its neighbourhood. J. Cæsar fortified and embellished it; from which circumstance some authors call it Julii Civitas. [At Lutetia Julian the apostate was saluted emperor by his soldiers. He had here his usual winter-quarters. The city began to increase in importance under the first French kings, and was extended to the two banks of the river, the island being connected with them by bridges.] It is now Paris, and is the capital of France. Cæs. de Bell. G 6 and 7.—Strab. 4.—Arrian. 20.

LYÆUS, a surname of Bacchus. It is derived from λυειν, solvere, because wine, over which Bacchus presides, gives freedom to the mind, and delivers it from all cares and melancholy. Horat. ep. 9.—Lucan. 1. v. 675.

LYCÆBAS, an Etrurian, who had been banished from his country for murder. He was one of those who offered violence to Bacchus, and who were changed into dolphins. Ovid. Met. 4. v. 624.

LYCABĒTUS, a mountain of Attica, near Athens. Stat.

LYCÆA, festivals in Arcadia, in honour of Pan, the god of shepherds. They are the same as the Lupercalia of the Romans.—A festival at Argos in honour of Apollo Lycæus, who delivered the Argives from wolves, &c.

LYCÆUM, a celebrated place near the banks of the Ilissus, in Attica. [It was named after Apollo Λυκεύωνος or Λυκίος, to whom it was dedicated as the god of health.] It was in this pleasant and salubrious spot that Aristotle taught philosophy, and, as he generally instructed his pupils in walking, they were called Peripatetics, α περιπατεῖα, ambulo. The philosopher continued his instructions for 12 years, till terrified by the false accusations of Eurymedon, he was obliged to fly to Chalcis.

LYCÆUS, a mountain of Arcadia, sacred to Jupiter, where a temple was built in honour of the god by Lycaon, the son of Pelagus. It was also sacred to Pan, whose festivals, called Lycæa, were celebrated there. Virg. G. 1, v. 16. Æn. 3, v. 343.—Strab. 3.—Horat. 1, od. 17. v. 2.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 698.

LYCAMBES, the father of Neobule. He promised his daughter in marriage to the poet Archilocus, and afterwards refused to fulfil his engagement when she had been courted by a man whose opulence had more influence than the fortune of the poet. This irritated Archilochus: he wrote a bitter invective against Lycambes and his daughter and rendered them both so desperate by the satire of his composition, that they hanged themselves. Horat. ep. 6, v. 13.—Ovid. in Ib. 52.—Aristot. Rhet. 3.

LYCÆON, the first king of Arcadia, son of Pelagus and Melibœa. He built a town called Lycosura on the top of Mount Lycæus, in honour of Jupiter. He had many wives, by whom he had a daughter, called Calisto, and fifty sons. He was succeeded on the throne by Nyctimus, the eldest of his sons. He lived about 1320 years before the Christian era. Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 176.—Catul. ep. 76.—Paus. 3, c. 2, &c.—Another king of Arcadia, celebrated for his cruelties. He was changed into a wolf by Jupiter, because he offered human victims on the altars of the god Pan. Some attribute this metamorphosis to another cause. The sins of mankind, as they relate, were become so enormous, that Jupiter visited the earth to punish wickedness and impiety. He came to Arcadia, where he was announced as a god, and the people began to pay proper veneration to his divinity. Lycaon, however, who used to sacrifice all strangers to his wanton cruelty, laughed at the pious prayers of his subjects, and to try the divinity of the god, he served up human flesh on his table. This impiety so irritated Jupiter, that he immediately destroyed the house of Lycaon, and changed him into a wolf. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 198, &c.—These two monarchs are often confounded together, though it appears that they were two different characters, and that no less than an age elapsed between their reigns.

LYCAONIA, [a district of Asia Minor, forming the south-eastern quarter of Phrygia. The origin of its name, and of its inhabitants, the Lycæones, is lost in obscurity. The Greeks asserted that Lycaon of Arcadia, in obedience to the commands of an oracle, founded a city here, and gave his name to the nation and country; this, however, is mere fable. According to others, it derived its name from λυκος, a wolf, the country abounding with these animals. Our first acquaintance with this region is in the relation of the expedition of the younger Cyrus. Its limits varied at different times. At first it extended eastward from Iconium 23 geographical miles, and was separated from Cilicia on the south by the range of Mount Taurus, comprehending a large portion of what in later times was termed Cataonia. In an after age Lycaonia was taken from Antiochus and given to Eumenes; but its limits, when this took place, must have been more contracted than they were previously. Strabo makes Isauria a part of it.] It was made a Roman province under Augustus. Iconium was the capital. Strab. 10.—Mela, c. 2.—Liv. 27, c. 54, l. 38, c. 39.—Arcadia bore also that name from Lycaon, one of its kings. Dionys. Hal.—An island in the Tyber.

LYCASTE, an ancient town of Crete, whose inhabitants accompanied Idomeneus to the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.

LYCASTUS, a son of Minos I. He was father of Minos II. by Ida, the daughter of Corybas. Diod. 4.

LYCHNIDUS, [a city of Illyricum, situate in the interior, on a lake from which the Drino rises. The Bulgarians, who formed here a great state more than an age after the reign of Justinian, took Lychnidus for their capital, changing its name to Achrida, which still subsists.] Liv. 27, c. 32, l. 44, c. 15.

LYCIA, [a country of Asia Minor in the south, bounded on the north-east by Pamphylia, on the west and north-west by the Carians, and on the north by Phrygia and Pisidia.] The country was first named Milyas, and its earliest inhabitants seem to have been the Solymi. Sarpedon, however, being driven from Crete by his brother Minos, came hither with a colony, and drove the Solymi into the interior. The new-comers took the name of Termilæ. Afterwards Lycus, driven from Athens by his brother Ægeus, retired to the Termilæ, where he was well received by Sarpedon, and gave, it is said, the name Lycus to the country, and Lycii to the people, from his own name. Lycia was known under this name to Homer, who speaks also of the Solymi. The Solymi, however, disappeared from history after Homer's time, and the name Milyas remained for ever afterwards applied to the region commencing in the north of Lycia, and extending into Phrygia and Pisidia. Into this region the Solymi had been driven, and here they remained under the name of Milyæ. From this time, in fact, they were reckoned as occupying a part of Pisidia, and having nothing more to do with Lycia. On D'Anville's map, however, they retain their name of Solymi.] The inhabitants have been greatly commended by all the ancients, not only for their sobriety and justice, but their great dexterity in the management of the bow. They were conquered by Cræsus, king of Lydia, and afterwards by Cyrus. Though they were subject to the power of Persia, yet they were governed by their own kings, and only paid a yearly tribute to the Persian monarch. They became part of the Macedonian empire when Alexander came into the east, and afterwards were ceded to the house of the Seleucidæ. The country was reduced into a Roman province by the emperor Claudius. Apollo had there his celebrated oracle at Patara, and the epithet hyberna is applied to the country, because the god was said to pass the winter in his temple. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 143 and 446, l. 7, v. 816.—Stat. Theb. 6, v. 686.—Herodot. 1, c. 173.—Strab. 13.—Liv. 37, c. 16, l. 38, c. 39.

LYCISCUS, a Messenian of the family of the Æpytidæ. When his daughters were doomed by lot to be sacrificed for the good of their country, he fled with them to Sparta, and Aristodemus, upon this, cheerfully gave his own children, and soon after succeeded to the throne. Paus. 4, c. 9.

LYCŪS, an epithet given to Apollo from his temple in Lycia, where he gave oracles, particularly at Patara, where the appellation of Lyciæ sortes was given to his answers, and even to the will of the Fates. Virg. Æn. 4, v. 346.

LYCÔMÈDES, a king of Scyros, an island in the Ægean Sea, son of Apollo and Parthenope. He was secretly intrusted with the care of young Achilles, whom his mother Thetis had disguised in woman's clothes, to remove him from the Trojan war, where she knew he must unavoidably perish. Lycomedes has rendered himself famous for his treachery to Theseus, who had implored his protection when driven from the throne of Athens by the usurper Mnestheus. Lycomedes, as it is reported, either envious of the fame of his illustrious guest, or bribed by the emissaries of Mnestheus, led Theseus to an elevated place on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and perfidiously threw him down a precipice, where he was killed. Plut. in Thes.—Paus. 1, c. 17, l. 7, c. 4.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.

LYCON, a philosopher of Troas, son of Asytanax, in the age of Aristotle. He was greatly esteemed by Eumenes, Antiochus, &c. He died in the 74th year of his age. Diog. in vit.—A player, greatly esteemed by Alexander.

LYCOPHRON, a son of Periander, king of Corinth. The murder of his mother Melissa, by his father, had such an effect upon him, that he resolved never to speak to a man who had been so wantonly cruel. This resolution was strengthened by the advice of Procles, his maternal uncle, and Periander at last banished to Corcyra a son whose disobedience and obstinacy had rendered him odious. Cypselus, the eldest son of Periander, being incapable of reigning, Lycophron was the only surviving child who had any claim to the crown of Corinth. But, when the infirmities of Periander obliged him to look for a successor, Lycophron refused to come to Corinth while his father was there, and he was induced to leave Corcyra only on promise that Periander would come and dwell there while he remained master of Corinth. This exchange, however, was prevented. The Corcyreans, who were apprehensive of the tyranny of Periander, murdered Lycophron before he left the island. Herodot. 3.—Aristot.—A brother of Thebe, the wife of Alexander, tyrant of Phææ. He assisted his sister in murdering her husband, and he afterwards seized the sovereignty. He was dispossessed by Philip of Macedonia. Plut.—Diod. 16.—A general of Corinth, killed by Nicias. Plut. in Nic.—A famous Greek poet and grammarian, born at Chalcis in Eubœa. He was one of the poets who flourished under Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote tragedies, the titles of twenty of which have been preserved. The only remaining composition of this poet is called Cassandra or Alexandra. It is a mixture of prophetic effusions, which, as he supposes, were given by Cassandra during the Trojan war. [This work of Lycophron is a monologue, and contains 430 verses, in which the Trojan princess predicts to Priam the destruction of Ilium and the misfortunes of those who had figured in the war of Troy. Written in iambic verse, it has no poetic value; but at the same time it forms an inexhaustible mine of grammatical, historical, and mythological erudition. Cassandra in the course of her predictions goes back to the earliest times, and descends afterwards to the reign of Alexander of Macedon. There are many digressions, but all containing valuable facts drawn from the history and mythology of other nations. The poet has purposely enveloped his poem with the deepest obscurity, so much so that it has been styled το σκοτεινόν ποιήμα, "the dark poem." There is no artifice to which he does not resort to prevent his being clearly understood. He never calls any one by his true name, but designates him by some circumstances or event in his history. He abounds with unusual constructions, separates words which should be united, uses strange terms, and forms the most singular compounds. He indulges also in some of the boldest metaphors. The Alexandrian grammarians amassed a vast collection of materials for the elucidation of what must have appeared to them an admirable production. Tzetzes has made a compilation from their commentaries, and has thus preserved for us a part at least of those illustrations, without which the poem, after the lapse of more than 2000 years, would be unintelligible. He has refuted also the opinion that Lycophron was not the author of the poem.] The best editions of Lycophron are, that of Basil, 1546, fol. enriched with the Greek commentary of Tzetzes; that of Canter, 8vo. apud Commelin, 1596; and that of Potter, fol. Oxon. 1702. [Since the edition of Archbishop Potter, two others have appeared, that of Reichard, Lips. 1788, 8vo. and that of Sebastian, Rom. 1804, 4to.] Ovid. in Ib. 583.—Stat. 5. Sylv. 3.

LYCOPOLIS, [or the city of wolves, a city of Upper Egypt, on the western side of the Nile, north-west of Antæopolis. It derived its name from the circumstance of extraordinary worship being paid here to wolves, which, according to Diodorus Siculus, drove back the Ethiopians when they invaded Egypt, and pursued them to Elephantina. It is supposed to answer to the modern Sut or Osvot.] Diod. 1.—Strab. 17.

LYCOREA, [the southern summit of Parnassus, so called, according to Pausanias, because the neighbouring people fled to it during the deluge of Deucalion, being led thither by the howling of wolves (λύκοι). The modern name is Liakura. It is so high as to be seen from Corinth 80 miles distant. Wheeler thought it to be as high as Mount Cenis. On this summit stood in remote ages a small town of the same name, the primitive abode of Deucalion.] Paus. Phoc. 6.

LYCOREUS, the supposed founder of Lycorea, on Mount Parnassus, was son of Apollo and Corycia. Hygin. fab. 161.

LYCÖRIS, a freed woman of the senator Volturnus, also called Cytheris and Volumnia, from her master. She is celebrated for her beauty and intrigues. The poet Gallus was greatly enamoured of her, and his friend Virgil comforts him in his tenth eclogue for the loss of the favours of Cytheris, who followed M. Antony's camp, and was become the Aspasia of Rome. The charms of Cleopatra, however, prevailed over those of Cytheris, and the unfortunate courtesan lost the favours of Antony and of all the world at the same time. Lycoris was originally a comedienne. Virg. Ecl. 10.—Ovid. A. A. 3, v. 537.

LYCORMAS, a river of Ætolia, whose sands were of a golden colour. It was afterwards called Evenus from king Evenus, who threw himself into it. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 245.

LYCORTAS, the father of Polybius, who flourished B. C. 184. He was chosen general of the Achæan league, and he revenged the death of Philopœmen, &c. Plut.

LYCOSŪRA, [a city of Arcadia, in the south-western part, near Mons Lycæus, on a branch of the river Neda.]

LYCTUS, a town of Crete, the country of Idomenus, whence he is often called Lyctius. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 401.

LYCURGIDES, annual days of solemnity appointed in honour of the lawgiver of Sparta, The patronymic of a son of Lycurgus. Ovid. in Ib. v. 503.

LYCURGUS, a king of Nemæa, in Peloponnesus. He was raised from the dead by Æsculapius. Sat. Theb. 5, v. 638.—A giant killed by Osiris in Thrace. Diod. 1.—A king of Thrace, son of Dryas. He has been represented as cruel and impious, on account of the violence which he offered to Bacchus. He, according to the opinion of the mythologists, drove Bacchus out of his kingdom and abolished his worship, for which impiety he was severely punished by the gods. He put his own son Dryas to death in a fury, and he cut off his own legs, mistaking them for vine boughs. He was put to death in the greatest torments by his subjects, who had been informed by the oracle that they should not taste wine till Lycurgus was no more. This fable is explained by observing, that the aversion of Lycurgus for wine, over which Bacchus presided, arose from the filthiness and disgrace of intoxication, and therefore the monarch wisely ordered all the vines of his dominions to be cut down, that himself and his subjects might be preserved from the extravagance and debauchery which are produced by too free an use of wine. Hygin. fab. 132.—Homer. Il. 6, v. 130.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 22.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 14.—Horat. 2, od. 19.—An orator of Athens, surnamed Ibis, in the age of Demosthenes, famous for his justice and impartiality when at the head of the government. He was one of the thirty orators whom the Athenians refused to deliver up to Alexander. Some of his orations are extant. He died about 330 years before Christ. Diod. 16.—A celebrated lawgiver of Sparta, son of king Eunomus, and brother to Polydectes. He succeeded his brother on the Spartan throne; but when he saw that the widow of Polydectes was pregnant, he kept the kingdom not for himself, but till Charilaus, his nephew, was arrived to years of maturity. He had previously refused to marry his brother's widow, who wished to strengthen him on his throne by destroying her own son Charilaus, and leaving him in the peaceful possession of the crown. The integrity with which he acted when guardian of his nephew Charilaus, united with the disappointment and the resentment of the queen, raised him many enemies, and he at last yielded to their satire and malevolence, and retired to Crete. He travelled like a philosopher, and visited Asia and Egypt without suffering himself to be corrupted by the licentiousness and luxury which prevailed there. The confusion which followed his departure from Sparta, now had made his presence totally necessary, and he returned home at the earnest solicitations of his countrymen. The disorder which reigned at Sparta induced him to reform the government; and the more effectually to execute his undertaking, he had recourse to the oracle of Delphi. He was received by the priestess of the god with every mark of honour, his intentions were warmly approved by the divinity, and he was called the friend of gods, and himself rather god than man. After such a reception from the most celebrated oracle of Greece, Lycurgus found no difficulty in reforming the abuses of the state, and all were equally anxious in promoting a revolution which had received the sanction of heaven. This happened 884 years before the Christian era. Lycurgus first established a senate, which was composed of 28 senators, whose authority preserved the tranquillity of the state, and maintained a due and just equilibrium between the kings and the people, by watching over the intrusions of the former, and checking the seditious convulsions of the latter. All distinction was destroyed, and by making an equal and impartial division of the land among the members of the commonwealth, Lycurgus banished luxury, and encouraged the useful arts. The use of money, either of gold or silver, was totally forbidden, and the introduction of heavy brass and iron coin, brought no temptation to the dishonest, and left every individual in the possession of his effects without any fears of robbery or violence. All the citizens dined in common, and no one had greater claims to indulgence or luxury than another. The intercourse of Sparta with other nations was forbidden, and few were permitted to travel. The youths were intrusted to the public master as soon as they had attained their seventh year, and their education was left to the wisdom of the laws. They were taught early to think, to answer in a short and laconic manner, and to excel in sharp repartee. They were instructed and encouraged to carry things by surprise, but if ever the theft was discovered they were subjected to a severe punishment. Lycurgus was happy and successful in establishing and enforcing these laws, and by his prudence and admiration the face of affairs in Lacedæmon was totally changed, and it gave rise to a set of men distinguished for their intrepidity, their fortitude, and their magnanimity. After this, Lycurgus retired from Sparta to Delphi, or, according to others, to Crete, and before his departure he bound all the citizens of Lacedæmon by a solemn oath, that neither they nor their posterity, would alter, violate, or abolish the laws which he had established before his return. He soon after put himself to death, and he ordered his ashes to be thrown into the sea, fearful lest if they were carried to Sparta the citizens should call themselves freed from the oath which they had taken, and empowered to make a revolution. The wisdom and the good effect of the laws of Lycurgus have been firmly demonstrated at Sparta, where for 700 years they remained in full force; but the legislator has been censured as cruel and impolitic. He has shown himself inhuman in ordering mothers to destroy such of their children whose feebleness or deformity in their youth seemed to promise incapability of action in maturer years, and to become a burden to the state. His regulations about marriage must necessarily be censured, and no true conjugal felicity can be expected from the union of a man with a person whom he perhaps never knew before, and whom he was compelled to choose in a dark room, where all the marriageable women in the state assembled on stated occasions. The peculiar dress which was appointed for the females might be termed improper; and the law must for ever be called injudicious which ordered them to appear naked on certain days of festivity, and wrestle in a public assembly, promiscuously with boys of equal age with themselves. These things indeed contributed as much to corrupt the morals of the Lacedæmonians as the other regulations seemed to be calculated to banish dissipation, riot, and debauchery. Lycurgus has been compared to Solon, the celebrated legislator of Athens, and it has been judiciously observed, that the former gave his citizens morals conformable to the laws which he had established, and that the latter had given the Athenians laws which coincided with their customs and manners. The office of Lycurgus demanded resolution, and he showed himself inexorable and severe. In Solon, artifice was requisite, and he showed himself mild and even voluptuous. The moderation of Lycurgus is greatly commended, particularly when we recollect that he treated with the greatest humanity and confidence Alexander, a youth who had put out one of his eyes in a seditious tumult. Lycurgus had a son called Antiorus, who left no issue. The Lacedæmonians showed their respect for their great legislator by yearly celebrating a festival in his honour, called Lycurgidæ or Lycurgides. The introduction of money into Sparta in the reign of Agis the son of Archidamus, was one of the principal causes which corrupted the innocence of the Lacedæmonians, and rendered them the prey of intrigue and of faction. The laws of Lycurgus were abrogated by Philopœmen, B. C. 188, but only for a little time, as they were soon after re-established by the Romans. Plut. in Vitâ.—Justin. 3, c. 2, &c.—Strab. 8, 10, 15, &c.—Dionys. Hal. 2.—Paus. 3, c. 2.

LYCUS, a king of Bœotia, successor to his brother Nycteus, who left no male issue. He was intrusted with the government only during the minority of Labdacus the son of the daughter of Nycteus. He was farther enjoined to make war against Epopeus, who had carried away by force Antiope the daughter of Nycteus. He was successful in this expedition: Epopeus was killed, and Lycus recovered Antiope and married her, though she was his niece. This new connection highly displeased his first wife Dirce, and Antiope was delivered to the unfeeling queen, and tortured in the most cruel manner. Antiope at last escaped, and entreated her sons Zethus and Amphion to avenge her wrongs. The children, incensed on account of the cruelties which their mother had suffered, besieged Thebes, killed Lycus, and tied Dirce to the tail of a wild bull, who dragged her till she died. Paus. 9, c. 5.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—A king of Libya, who sacrificed whatever strangers came upon his coast. When Diomedes, at his return from the Trojan war, had been shipwrecked there, the tyrant seized him and confined him. He, however, escaped by means of Callirrhoe, the tyrant's daughter, who was enamoured of him, and who hung herself when she saw herself deserted.—A son of Neptune by Celæno, made king of a part of Mysia by Hercules. He offered violence to Megara, the wife of Hercules, for which he was killed by the incensed hero. Lycus gave a kind reception to the Argonauts. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Hygin. fab. 18, 31, 32, 137.

LYDIA, [a country of Asia Minor, south of Mysia. Its limits appear to have been fluctuating and uncertain up to the period of its becoming a Roman province. It was then bounded on the west by the Grecian colonies of Ionia, which in reality indeed made a part of Lydia; on the north by the Hermus, for the latter part of its course; on the south by the Mæander; and on the east by Phrygia. Under the Persian dominion it was more extensive in territory, since it then actually comprehended the Greek cities on the coast. According to some of the Greek writers, the country was divided between two nations, the Lydians and Mæones, the former dwelling in the plains adjacent to the Cayster and in the neighbouring mountains, while the Mæones occupied the northernmost part of the country around Mount Tmolus, and near the Hermus and the Hyllus. Homer, however, does not support any distinction like this, but calls the nation by the general name of Mæones. The reason of this, and in fact the true circumstances of the whole affair, we learn from Herodotus, who states that the people of the country were first called Mæones, but afterwards Lydii, from Lydus, one of their kings.] It was governed by monarchs, who, after the fabulous ages, reigned for 249 years in the following order: Ardysus began to reign 797 B. C. Alyattes, 761; Meles, 747; Candaules, 735; Gyges, 718; Ardysus 2d, 680; Sadyattes, 631; Alyattes 2d, 619; and Croesus, 562, who was conquered by Cyrus, B. C. 548, when the kingdom became a province of the Persian empire. There were three different races that reigned in Lydia, the Atyadæ, Heraclidæ, and Mermnadæ. The history of the first is obscure and fabulous. The Heraclidæ began to reign about the Trojan war, and the crown remained in their family for about 505 years, and was always transmitted from father to son. Candaules was the last of the Heraclidæ: and Gyges the first, and Croesus the last, of the Mermnadæ. [The dominions of Croesus extended to the Halys.] The Lydians were great warriors in the reign of the Mermnadæ. They invented the art of coining gold and silver, and were the first who exhibited public sports, &c. The Lydians were very probably of Thracian origin.] Herodot. 1, c. 6, 1. 3, c. 90. 1. 7, c. 74.—Strab. 2, 5 and 13.—Mela. 1, c. 2.—Plin. 3, c. 5.—*Dionys. LYDIUS, an epithet applied to the Tyber because it passed near Etruria, whose inhabitants were originally a Lydian colony. [vid. Etruria.] Virg. Æn. 2, v. 781, l. 8, v. 479.

LYDUS, a son of Atys and Callithea, king of Mæonia, which from him received the name of Lydia. His brother Tyrrenus led a colony to Italy, and gave the name of Tyrrenia to the settlement he made on the coast of the Mediterranean. Herodot. 7, c. 74.—An eunuch, &c.

LYGDAMUS or LYGDAMUS, a general of the Cimmerians who passed into Asia Minor, and took Sardis in the reign of Ardyes, king of Lydia. Callim.—An athlete of Syracuse, the father of Artemisia the celebrated queen of Halicarnassus. Herodot. 7, c. 99.

LYGODESMA, a surname of Diana at Sparta, because her statue was brought by Orestes from Taurus, shielded round with osiers. Paus. 3, c. 16.

LYNCEUS, son of Aphareus, was among the hunters of the Calydonian boar, and one of the Argonauts. He was so sharp-sighted that, as it is reported, he could see through the earth, and distinguish objects at the distance of above nine miles. He stole some oxen with his brother Idas, and they were both killed by Castor and Pollux, when they were going to celebrate their nuptials with the daughters of Leucippus. [Palæphatus has explained the fable of Lynceus seeing objects beneath the earth, by supposing him to have been the first who carried on the operation of mining, and that, descending with a lamp, he thus saw objects under the ground. Pliny assigns the following reason for Lynceus being fabled to be so keen-sighted. "Novissimam vero primamque (Lunam) eodem die vel nocte, nullo alio in signo quam Ariete, conspici; id quoque paucis mortalium contingit. Et indiduo cernendi Lynceus." Plin. N. H. 2, 15.]—Apollod. 1 and 3.—Hygin. fab.—Paus. 4, c. 2.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 303.—Apolon. Arg. 1.—A son of Ægyptus, who married Hypermnæstra, the daughter of Danaus. His life was spared by the love and humanity of his wife. [vid. Danaides.] He made war against his father-in-law, dethroned him and seized his crown. Some say that Lynceus was reconciled to Danaus, and that he succeeded him after his death, and reigned forty-one years. Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Paus. 2, c. 16, 19, 25.—Ovid. Heroid. 14.

LYNCS, LYCÆUS, or LYNX, a cruel king of Scythia, or, according to others, of Sicily. He received, with feigned hospitality, Trip-tolemus, whom Ceres had sent all over the world to teach mankind agriculture; and as he was jealous of his commission he resolved to murder this favourite of the gods in his sleep. As he was going to give the deadly blow to Triptolemus, he was suddenly changed into a lynx, an animal which is the emblem of perfidy and ingratitude. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 650.

LYRNESSESUS, a city of Cilicia, the native country of Briseis, called from thence Lyrnessis. It was taken and plundered by Achilles and the Greeks at the time of the Trojan war, and the booty divided among the conquerors. Homer. Il. 2, v. 197.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 108.—Herod. 3, v. 5. Trist. 4, el. 1, v. 15.

LYSANDER, a celebrated general of Sparta in the last years of the Peloponnesian war. He drew Ephesus from the interest of Athens, and gained the friendship of Cyrus the younger. He gave battle to the Athenian fleet, consisting of 120 ships, at Ægospotamos, and destroyed it all, except three ships, with which the enemy's general fled to Evagoras king of Cyprus. In this celebrated battle, which happened 405 years before the Christian era, the Athenians lost 3000 men, and with them their empire and influence among the neighbouring states. Lysander well knew how to take advantage of his victory, and the following year Athens, worn out by a long war of 27 years, and discouraged by its misfortunes, gave itself up to the power of the enemy, and consented to destroy the Præus, to deliver up all its ships, except 12, to recall all those who had been banished, and in short to be submissive in every degree to the power of Lacedæmon. Besides these humiliating conditions, the government of Athens was totally changed, and 30 tyrants were set over it by Lysander. This glorious success, and the honour of having put an end to the Peloponnesian war, increased the pride of Lysander. He had already begun to pave his way to universal power, by establishing aristocracy in the Grecian cities of Asia, and now he attempted to make the crown of Sparta elective. In the pursuit of his ambition he used prudence and artifice; and as he could not easily abolish a form of government which ages and popularity had confirmed, he had recourse to the assistance of the gods. His attempt, however, to corrupt the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Jupiter Ammon, proved ineffectual, and he was even accused of using bribes by the priests of the Libyan temple. The sudden declaration of war against the Thebans saved him from the accusations of his adversaries, and he was sent, together with Pausanias, against the enemy. The plan of his military operations was discovered, and the Haliartians, whose ruin he secretly meditated, attacked him unexpectedly, and he was killed in a bloody battle, which ended in the defeat of his troops, 394 years before Christ. His body was recovered by his colleague Pausanias, and honoured with a magnificent funeral. Lysander has been commended for his bravery, but his ambition deserves the severest censure, and his cruelty and duplicity have greatly stained his character. He was arrogant and vain in his public as well as private conduct, and he received and heard with the greatest avidity the hymns which his courtiers and flatterers sung to his honour. Yet in the midst of all his pomp, his ambition, and intrigues, he died extremely poor, and his daughters were rejected by two opulent citizens of Sparta to whom they had been betrothed during the life of their father. This behaviour of the lovers was severely punished by the Lacedæmonians, who protected from injury the children of a man whom they hated for his sacrilege, his contempt for religion, and his perfidy. The father of Lysander, whose name was Aristoclitus or Aristocrates, was descended from Hercules, though not reckoned of the race of the Heraclidæ. Plut. & C. Nep. in vitâ.—Diod. 13.

LYSANDRA, a daughter of Ptolemy Lagus, who married Agathocles the son of Lysimachus. She was persecuted by Arsinoë, and fled to Seleucus for protection. Paus. 1, c. 9, &c.

LÛSIAS, a celebrated orator, son of Cephalus, a native of Syracuse. His father left Sicily and went to Athens, where Lysias was born and carefully educated. In his 15th year he accompanied the colony which the Athenians sent to Thurium, and after a long residence there he returned home in his 47th year. [He was exiled from Thurium for being a partizan of Athens. From the latter city he was also driven by the tyranny of the Thirty, and retired to Megara. He joined Thrasylulus in his successful attempt for the deliverance of his country, and ended his days at Athens. Photius speaks of 233 harangues of Lysias, which either he himself, or the author of the life of this orator, which he had before his eyes, acknowledges as authentic. There remain only 34, which are all forensic, and remarkable for the method which reigns in them. The purity, the perspicuity, the grace, and simplicity which characterize the orations of Lysias would have raised him to the highest rank in the art had they been coupled with the force and energy of Demosthenes. His style is elegant, without being overloaded with ornaments, and always preserves its tone. In the art of narration, Dionysius of Halicarnassus considers him superior to all orators, in being distinct, probable, and persuasive; but, at the same time, admits that his composition is better adapted to private litigation than to important causes. The text of his harangues, as we now have it, is extremely corrupt. His masterpiece is the funeral oration delivered in honour of the Athenians who, having been sent to the aid of the Corinthians, under the command of Iphicrates, perished in battle.] The best editions of Lysias are that of Taylor, 8vo, Cantab. 1740, that of Auger, 2 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1783, [and that of Reiske in the Corpus Oratorum Græcorum, Lips. 1772, 2 vols. 8vo.] He died in the 81st year of his age, 378 years before

LYSIMACHIA, a city on the Thracian Chersonesus. [It was called Hexamilium from the breadth of the isthmus, which is estimated at 6 miles. The name still remains in Hexamili.] Paus. 1, c. 9.

LYSIMACHUS, [king of Thrace, one of the captains of Alexander the Great. He rose to the favour of his prince from a very mean condition. At the partition of the empire of Alexander, Lysimachus received for his share Thrace, the Chersonese, and the countries adjacent to the Euxine. He founded in the Chersonese Lysimachia as his capital. When Antigonus had rendered himself formidable to all the other generals of the deceased monarch, Lysimachus joined in the league against him, with Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Cassander, and fought with them at the great battle at Ipsus.] He afterwards seized Macedonia, after expelling Pyrrhus from the throne, B. C. 286; but his cruelty rendered him odious, and the murder of his son Agathocles so offended his subjects, that the most opulent and powerful revolted from him and abandoned the kingdom. He pursued them to Asia, and declared war against Seleucus, who had given them a kind reception. He was killed in a bloody battle 281 years before Christ, in the 80th year of his age, and his body was found in the heaps of slain only by the fidelity of a little dog, which had carefully watched near it. It is said that the love and respect of Lysimachus for his learned master Callisthenes proved nearly fatal to him. He, as Justin mentions, was thrown into the den of a hungry lion, by order of Alexander, for having given Callisthenes poison to save his life from ignominy and insult; and when the furious animal darted upon him, he wrapped his hand in his mantle, and boldly thrust it into the lion's mouth, and by twisting his tongue, killed an adversary ready to devour him. This act of courage in his self-defence recommended him to Alexander. He was pardoned, and ever after esteemed by the monarch. Justin. 15, c. 3, &c.—Diod. 19, &c.—Paus. 1, c. 10.—An Acarnanian, preceptor to Alexander the Great. He used to call himself Phoenix, his pupil Achilles, and Philip Peleus. Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 15, c. 3.

LYSIPPUS, [a celebrated sculptor and statuary, was born at Sicyon, and flourished in the time of Alexander the Great. He was originally a worker in brass, and then applied himself to painting till his talents and inclination led him to fix upon the profession of a sculptor. He worked with such extraordinary diligence that he is said to have left 1500 performances, all of such excellence that any one of them singly might have conferred celebrity on him as an artist.] Alexander was so partial to the artist, that he forbade any sculptor but Lysippus to make his statue. Lysippus excelled in expressing the hair, and he was the first who made the head of his statues less large, and the body smaller than usual, that they might appear taller. This was observed by one of his friends, and the artist gave for answer, that his predecessors had represented men in their natural form, but that he represented them such as they appeared. [The most admirable of his works were the statues of Alexander, of which he executed a series, beginning from his childhood: and one of a man coming out of a bath, placed by Agrippa before his public baths, and which, being removed by Tiberius to his own chamber, caused such great clamours on the part of the populace, that the emperor thought it prudent to return it to its former situation. A chariot of the sun at Rhodes was one of his great works, which was, however, surpassed by a Colossus at Tarentum, 40 cubits high.] His statue of Socrates and those of the horsemen who were drowned in the Granicus, were so highly valued, that in the age of Augustus they were sold for their weight in gold. Plut. in Alex.—Cic. in Brut. c. 164, ad. Her. 4, c. 148.—Plin. 37, c. 7.—Patere. 1, c. 11.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 240.—A comic poet, some of whose plays are mentioned by Athenæus. Plin. 7, c. 37.

LYSIS, a Pythagorean philosopher, preceptor to Epaminondas. He flourished about 388 years before the Christian era. He is supposed by some to be the author of the golden verses which are attributed to Pythagoras. C. Eep. in Epam. 2.

LYSISTRATUS, a brother of Lysippus. He was the first artist who ever made a statue with wax. Plin. 34, c. 8, l. 35, c. 12.

LYSTRA, [a city of Asia Minor, placed by Ptolemy in Isauria; but, according to Pliny, Hierocles, and the history of the acts of the Apostles, it belonged to Lycaonia. On D'Anville's map it is placed in Isauria, south-east of Isauria.]

MACÆ, [a people of Africa who occupied the coast to the north-west of and near the Greater Syrtes. They are thought to have been the same with those named Syrtites by Pliny. The Cinyphs watered their country. Herodotus states that they had a curious custom of leaving only a tuft of hair in the centre of their head, carefully shaving the rest, and that when they went to war their only coverings were the skins of ostriches. vid. Cinyphs.—A people of Arabia Deserta, on a projection of land where the Sinus Persicus is narrowest. Ptolemy calls the promontory As-sabo; its modern name, however, Cape Mus-sendom, bears some faint resemblance to that of the Macæ.]

MACÆREUS. [vid. Lesbos.]

MACÆRIA, a daughter of Hercules and De-janira. After the death of Hercules, Eurystheus made war against the Heraclidae, whom the Athenians supported, and the oracle declared that the descendants of Hercules should obtain the victory, if any one of them devoted himself to death. This was cheerfully accepted by Macaria, who refused to endanger the life of the children of Hercules by suffering the victim to be drawn by lot, and the Athenians obtained a victory. Great honours were paid to the patriotic Macaria, and a fountain of Marathon was called by her name. Paus. 1, c. 32.—An ancient name of Cyprus.

MACARIS, an ancient name of Crete.

MACEO, a son of Osiris, who had a share in the divine honours which were paid to his father. He was represented clothed in a wolf's skin, for which reason the Egyptians held that animal in great veneration. Diod. 1.—Plut. in Isid. et Os.—A man who gave his name to Macedonia. Some supposed him to be the same as the son or general of Osiris, whilst others consider him as the grandson of Deucalion by the mother's side. Diod. 1.

MACEDONIA, [a country of Europe, lying to the west of Thrace, and north and north-east of Thessaly. Its most ancient name was Æmathia, a denomination derived from Æmathius, a prince of great antiquity, but the Greeks afterwards called it Macedonia, either from king Maceo, a descendant, as some pretend, of Deucalion, or, as others say, by an easy change of Mygdonia, the name of one of its provinces, into Macedonia. Its boundaries varied according as it advanced in the career of national prosperity.] Philip increased it by the conquest of Thessaly and of part of Thrace, and, according to Pliny, it contained no less than 150 different nations. [In the time of Ptolemy, however, as appears by his geography, this number was greatly diminished. When Macedonia fell under the power of the Romans, they formed a province by this name, which comprised not only the ancient kingdom but also Thessaly and Epirus, and extended from sea to sea.] The kingdom of Macedonia, first founded B. C. 814, by Caranus, a descendant of Hercules, and a native of Argos, continued in existence 646 years, till the battle of Pydna. The family of Caranus remained in possession of the crown until the death of Alexander the Great, and began to reign in the following order; Caranus, after a reign of 28 years, was succeeded by Cœnus, who ascended the throne 786 B. C. Thurimmas, 744, Perdiccas 729, Argæus 678, Philip 640, Æropas 602, Alcetas or Alectas 576, Amyntas 547, Alexander 497, Perdiccas 454, Archelaus 413, Amyntas 399, Pausanias 398, Amyntas 2d 397, Argæus the tyrant 390, Amyntas restored 390, Alexander 2d 371, Ptolemy Aloritis 370, Perdiccas 3d 366, Philip son of Amyntas 360, Alexander the Great 336, Philip Aridæus 323, Cassander 316, Antipater and Alexander 298, Demetrius king of Asia 294, Pyrrhus 287, Lysimachus 286, Ptolemy Ceraunus 280, Meleager two months, Antipater the Etesian 45 days, Antigonus Gonatas 277, Demetrius 243, Antigonus Do-son 232, Philip 221, Perseus 179, conquered by the Romans 168 B. C. at Pydna. Macedonia has been severally called Æmonia, Mygdonia, Pæonia, Edonia, Æmathia, &c. The inhabitants of Macedonia were naturally warlike, and though in the infancy of their empire they were little known beyond the borders of their country, yet they signalized themselves greatly in the reign of Philip, and added the kingdom of Asia to their European dominions by the valour of Alexander. The Macedonian phalanx, or body of soldiers, was always held in the highest repute, and it resisted and subdued the repeated attacks of the bravest and most courageous enemies. [The pure Greeks affected to despise the Macedonians and part of the Epirots, as barbarians, and Demosthenes always discriminates in very pointed terms between the Macedonian upstart Philip and the true Greeks, especially the Athenians. The splendid victories of Philip and Alexander subdued somewhat of this haughty spirit on the part of their southern neighbours.] Liv. 44.—Just. 6, c. 9, l. 7, c. 1, &c.—Strab. 7.—Mela, 1, c. 3, &c.—Plin. 4, c. 10, &c.—Curt. 3 and 4.—Paus. 8, c. 7.

MACEDONICUM BELLUM, was undertaken by the Romans against Philip king of Macedonia, some few months after the second Punic war, B. C. 200. The cause of this war originated in the hostilities which Philip had exercised against the Achæans, the friends and allies of Rome. The consul Flaminius had the care of the war, and he conquered Philip on the confines of Epirus, and afterwards in Thessaly. The Macedonian fleets were also defeated; Eubœa was taken; and Philip, after continual losses, sued for peace, which was granted him in the fourth year of the war. The ambition and cruelty of Perseus, the son and successor of Philip, soon irritated the Romans. Another war was undertaken, in which the Romans suffered two defeats. This, however, did not discourage them; Paulus Æmilius was chosen consul in the 60th year of his age, and intrusted with the care of the war. He came to a general engagement near the city of Pydna. The victory sided with the Romans, and 20,000 of the Macedonian soldiers were left on the field of battle. This decisive blow put an end to the war, which had already continued for three years, 168 years before the Christian era. Perseus and his sons Philip and Alexander were taken prisoners, and carried to Rome to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. About fifteen years after, new seditions were raised in Macedonia, and the false pretensions of Andriscus, who called himself the son of Perseus, obliged the Romans to send an army to quell the commotions. Andriscus at first obtained many considerable advantages over the Roman forces, till at last he was conquered and delivered to the consul Metellus, who carried him to Rome. After these commotions, which are sometimes called the third Macedonian war, Macedonia was finally reduced into a Roman province, and governed by a regular proconsul, about 148 years before the Christian era.

MACE DONICUS, a surname given to Metellus, from his conquests in Macedonia. It was also given to such as had obtained any victory in that province.

MACER ÆMYLIUS, a Latin poet of Verona, intimate with Tibullus and Ovid, and commended for his genius, his learning, and the elegance of his poetry. He wrote some poems upon serpents, plants, and birds, mentioned by Ovid. He also composed a poem upon the ruins of Troy, to serve as a supplement to Homer's Iliad. His compositions are now lost. [A poem "de herbarum virtutibus," extant under the name of Macer, has been given up as supposititious.] He died B. C. 16. Ovid. Trist. 4, el. 10, v. 44. ex Pont. 2, ep. 10.—Quintil. 10. c. 1.—L. Claudius, a pro-prætor of Africa in the reign of Nero. He assumed the title of emperor, and was put to death by order of Galba.

MACHANIDAS, a man who made himself absolute at Sparta. He was killed by Philopœmen, after being defeated at Mantinea, B. C. 208. Nabis succeeded him, Plut.—Liv. 27, c. 30, l. 28. c. 5 and 7.

MACHAON, a celebrated physician, son of Æsculapius, and brother to Podalirius. He went to the Trojan war with the inhabitants of Trica, Ithome, and Æchalia. According to some he was king of Messenia. As physician to the Greeks, he healed the wounds which they received during the Trojan war, and was one of those concealed in the wooden horse. [Machaon was more skilled in the treatment of external injuries. Podalirius in the cure of internal ones.] Some suppose that he was killed before Troy by Eurypylos, the son of Telephus. He received divine honours after death, and had a temple in Messenia. Homer Il. 2. &c.—Ovid. ex Pont. 3, ep. 4.—Quint. Smyr. 6. v. 409.—Virg. Æn. 2, v. 263 and 426.

MACRA, a river flowing from the Apennines, and dividing Liguria from Etruria. [now the Magra.] Lucan. 2, v. 426.—Liv. 39, c. 32.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

MACRIANUS, Titus Fulvius Julius, an Egyptian of obscure birth, who, from a private soldier, rose to the highest command in the army, and proclaimed himself emperor when Valerian had been made prisoner by the Persians, A. D. 260. His liberality supported his usurpation; his two sons Macrianius and Quietus were invested with the imperial purple, and the enemies of Rome were severely defeated either by the emperors or their generals. When he had supported his dignity for a year in the eastern parts of the world, Macrianius marched towards Rome, to crush Gallienus, who had been proclaimed emperor. He was defeated in Illyricum by the lieutenant of Gallienus, and put to death with his son, at his own express request, A. D. 262.

MACRINUS, M. Opilius Severus, a native of Africa, who rose from the most ignominious condition to the rank of præfect of the prætorian guards, and at last of emperor, after the death of Caracalla, whom he sacrificed to his ambition, A. D. 217. The beginning of his reign was popular; the abolition of the taxes, and an affable and complaisant behaviour, endeared him to his subjects. These promising appearances did not long continue, and the timidity which Macrinus betrayed in buying the peace of the Persians by a large sum of money, soon rendered him odious; and while he affected to imitate the virtuous Aurelius, without possessing the good qualities of his heart, he became contemptible and insignificant. This affectation irritated the minds of the populace, and when severe punishments had been inflicted on some of the disorderly soldiers, the whole army mutinied; and their tumult was increased by their consciousness of their power and numbers, which Macrinus had the imprudence to betray, by keeping almost all the military force of Rome encamped together in the plains of Syria. Heliogabalus was proclaimed emperor, and Macrinus attempted to save his life by flight. He was, however, seized in Cappadocia, and his head was cut off and sent to his successor, June seventh, A. D. 218. Macrinus reigned about two months and three days. His son, called Diadumenianus, shared his father's fate.—A friend of the poet Persius, to whom his second satire is inscribed.

MACROBI, a people of Æthiopia, celebrated for their justice and the innocence of their manners. They generally lived to their 120th year, some say to a thousand; and, indeed, from that longevity they have obtained their name (μακρος βιος, long life,) to distinguish them more particularly from the other inhabitants of Æthiopia. After so long a period spent in virtuous actions, and freed from the indulgencies of vice, and from maladies, they dropped into the grave as to sleep, without pain and without terror. Orph. Argon. 105.—Herodot. 3, c. 17.—Mela, 3, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 48.—Val. Max. 8, c. 3.

MACROBIUS, [a Latin writer and eminent critic, who flourished towards the close of the 4th century. He is supposed to have been a Greek, but the place of his birth is not known. He is claimed indeed by the people of Parma, who show his tomb, but he refers his birth-place to a country in which the Latin language was not vernacular. He undoubtedly lived at Rome; but whether he was the same Macrobius who was grand chamberlain under Honorius and Theodosius 2d is not well ascertained. It has likewise been disputed whether he was a Christian or a Pagan. The supposition that he held the office of chamberlain under the Christian emperors, has been the chief or perhaps the only ground for imagining him to have been a Christian, since the language of his writings and the interlocutors in the dialogues are entirely heathen.] Macrobius has rendered himself famous for a composition called Saturnalia, a miscellaneous collection of antiquities and criticisms, supposed to have been the result of a conversation of some of the learned Romans during the celebration of the Saturnalia. This was written for the use of his son, and the bad Latin which the author has often introduced, proves that he was not born in a part of the Roman empire where the Latin tongue was spoken, as he himself candidly confesses. The Saturnalia are useful for the learned reflections they contain, and particularly for some curious observations on the two greatest epic poets of antiquity. [The questions treated of relate to topics of antiquity, mythology, history, and poetry, discussed in a pleasing way, and with reference to the works of ancient authors, and to the laws and customs of the Romans.] Besides this, Macrobius wrote a commentary on Cicero's sonnium Scipionis, which is likewise composed for the improvement of the author's son, and dedicated to him. [From this last work it appears that he was a Platonist. He wrote also a work on the difference between the Greek and Latin tongues, and their analogy. We have a part of it remaining.] The best editions are that of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1670, and that of Lips. 8vo. 1777.

MACRŌCHEIR, a Greek name of Artaxerxes, the same as Longimanus. [vid. Longimanus.]

MACRŌNES, [a nation of Asia, occupying the northern parts of Armenia, probably between the town of Arze and the coast of the Euxine. They are mentioned in the Anabasis as one of the nations through whose territories the Greeks marched. They were afterwards, according to Strabo, called Sanni or Tanni.] Flacc. 5, v. 153.—Herodot.

MADAURA, [a town of Numidia, near Tagaste, and north-west of Sicca, of which the inhabitants were called Madaurenses.] It was the native place of Apuleius. Apul. Met. 11.

MADĒTES, a general of Darius who bravely defended a place against Alexander. The conqueror resolved to put him to death, though thirty orators pleaded for his life. Sisymbrius prevailed over the almost inexorable Alexander, and Madetes was pardoned. Curt. 5, c. 3.

MADYES, a Scythian prince who pursued the Cimmerians in Asia, and conquered Cyaxares, B. C. 623. He held for some time the supreme power of Asia Minor. Herodot. 8, c. 103.

MÆANDER, a celebrated river of Asia Minor, rising near Celæna [in Phrygia], and flowing through Caria and Ionia into the Ægean Sea, between Miletus and Priene, after it has been increased by the waters of the Marsyas, Lycus, Eudon, Lethæus, &c. It is celebrated among the poets for its windings, which amount to no less than 600, and from which all obliquities have received the name of Mæanders. It forms in its course, according to the observations of some travellers, the Greek letters ε ζ ε ς & ω, and from its windings Dædalus had the first idea of his famous labyrinth. [The Mæander is a deep stream, and fordable only in a few places, even in the early part of its course. It is called by the Turks Minder or Bojuk Minder, the little Mæander.] Ovid. Met. 8, v. 145, &c.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 254.—Lucan. 5, v. 208, l. 6, v. 471.—Homer. Il. 2.—Herodot. 2, c. 29.—Cic. Pis. 22.—Strab. 12, &c.—Mela, 1, c. 17.

MÆÁTÆ, a people at the south of Scotland, [comprising the Otadeni, Gadeni, Selgovæ, Novantæ, and Damni]. Dio. 76, c. 12.

MÆDI, a people of Mædica, a district of Thrace near Rhodope. Liv. 26, c. 25, l. 40, c. 21.

MÆLIUS, a Roman thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, for aspiring to tyranny at Rome, in the early ages of the republic.

MÆMACTERIA, sacrifices offered to Jupiter at Athens in the winter month Mæmacteron. The god surnamed Mæmactes was entreated to send mild and temperate weather as he presided over the seasons, and was the god of the air.

MÆNĀDES, a name of the Bacchantes, or priestesses of Bacchus. The word is derived from μαινομαι, to be furious, because in the celebration of the festivals their gestures and actions were those of mad women. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 458.

MÆNĀLUS, (plur. Mænala) a mountain [in the south-south-eastern part] of Arcadia, sacred to the god Pan, and greatly frequented by shepherds. It received its name from Mænalus, a son of Lycaon. It was covered with pine trees, whose echo and shade have been greatly celebrated by all the ancient poets. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 216.—Virg. G. 1, v. 17.—Ecl. 8, v. 24.—Paus. 8, c. 3.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Atown of Arcadia.—A son of Lycaon.—The father of Atalanta.

MÆNUS, a river of Germany now called the Mayne, falling into the Rhine at Mayence.

MÆŌNIA, [vid. Lydia.] The Etrurians, as being supposed to be descended from a Lydian colony, are often called Mæonidæ, and even the lake Thrasymentus in their country, is called Mæonius Lacus. [vid. the true theory of their origin under Hetruria.] Sil. Ital. 15, v. 35.

MÆŌNIDÆ, a name given to the Muses, because Homer, their greatest and worthiest favourite, was supposed to be a native of Mæonia.

MÆŌNIDES, a surname of Homer, because, according to the opinion of some writers, he was born in Mæonia, or because his father's name was Mæon. Ovid.—The surname is also applied to Bacchus, as he was worshipped in Mæonia.

MÆONIS, an epithet applied to Omphale as queen of Lydia or Mæonia. Ovid. The epithet is also applied to Arachne as a native of Lydia. Id. Met. 6.

MÆŌTÆ, a people of Asiatic Sarmatia.

MÆŌTIS PALUS, a large lake, or part of the sea between Europe and Asia, at the north of the Euxine, to which it communicates by the Cimmerian Bosphorus, now called the sea of Azoph or Zuback. [Its ancient name of Marsh was given to it from its waters being polluted with mud.] It was worshipped as a deity by the Massagetæ. [Rit.

ter has collected together much curious learning to prove that the Palus Mæotis (whose true name he makes Maïetis) was an important link in the chain connecting the religion of Greece with that of India.] It extends about 390 miles from south-west to north-east, and is about 600 miles in circumference. The Amazons are called Mæotides, as living in the neighbourhood. Strab.—Mela, 1, c. 1, &c.—Justin, 2, c. 1.—Curt, 5, c. 4.—Lucan, 2, &c.—Ovid, Fast. 3, el. 12. ep. Sab. 2, v. 9.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 739.

MÆSIA SYLVA, a wood in Etruria, near the mouth of the Tiber. Liv. 1, c. 33.

MÆVIUS, a poet of inferior note in the Augustan age who made himself known by his illiberal attacks on the character of the first writers of his time, as well as by his affected compositions. His name would have sunk in oblivion if Virgil had not ridiculed him in his third eclogue, and Horace in his 10th epode.

MAGAS, a king of Cyrene in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He reigned 50 years, and died B. C. 257. Polyan. 2.

MAGI, a religious sect among the eastern nations of the world, and particularly in Persia. They had great influence in the political as well as religious affairs of the state, and a monarch seldom ascended the throne without their previous approbation. Zoroaster was founder of their sect. They paid particular homage to fire, which they deemed a deity, as pure in itself, and the purifier of all things. In their religious tenets they had two principles, one good, the source of every thing good; and the other evil, from whence sprung all manner of ills. Their professional skill in the mathematics and philosophy rendered every thing familiar to them, and from their knowledge of the phenomena of the heavens, the word Magi was applied to all learned men; and in process of time, the Magi, from their experience and profession, were confounded with the magicians who imposed upon the superstitious and credulous. Hence the word Magi and magicians became synonymous among the vulgar. Smerdis, one of the Magi, usurped the crown of Persia after the death of Cambyses, and the fraud was not discovered till the seven noble Persians conspired against the usurper, and elected Darius king. From this circumstance there was a certain day on which none of the Magi were permitted to appear in public, as the populace had the privilege of murdering whomsoever of them they met. [Various derivations have been assigned for the name. Plato, Xenophon, Herodotus, Strabo, &c. derive it from the Persian language, in which it signified a priest, or a person appointed to officiate in holy things. Others derive it from the Greek μαγας, great, which they say, being borrowed of the Greeks by the Persians, was returned in the form μαγος. Vossius, however, deduces it from the Hebrew, haga, to meditate, whence comes maghim, people addicted to meditation.] Strab.—Cit. de Div. 1.—Herodot. 3, c. 62, &c.

MAGNENTIUS, [a German by birth, who, from being a private soldier, rose to the head of the Roman empire. He was at first a prisoner of war, but, to free himself from chains, he joined the Roman troops, and became distinguished for valour. He was commander of the Jovian and Herculean bands stationed to guard the banks of the Rhine at the time when Constans 1st had incurred the contempt of the army by his indolence and voluptuousness. In 350 A. D. he ascended the throne, and, on the murder of Constans was left without a rival in the Gallic and Italian prefectures. At Rome he acted with great tyranny, and by his extortions was enabled to keep in pay a large army to support his usurped authority. So formidable did he appear, that Constantius, emperor of the east and brother of the deceased Constans, offered him peace with the possession of Gaul, Spain, and Britain, but his offer was rejected. A war ensued, and Magnentius was totally defeated. He fled to Aquileia, and afterwards obtained a victory over the van of the pursuing army at Ticinum. Another defeat, however, soon followed, and Magnentius took refuge in Lyons where he dispatched himself with his own sword.]

MAGNES, a young man who found himself detained by the iron nails which were under his shoes as he walked over a stone mine. This was no other than the magnet, which received its name from the person who had been first sensible of its power. Some say that Magnes was a slave of Medea, whom that enchantress changed into a magnet. [According to another account, the magnet took its name from a shepherd who discovered it with the iron of his crook on Mount Ida.]

MAGNËSIA, [the name of two cities of Lydia, one was situate in the south near the Mæander, and was called from its position Magnesia ad Mæandrum, (επι Μαγνηδα). It lay south-east from Ephesus. According to Diodorus, it was one of the towns given by Artaxerxes to Themistocles, and it was also the scene of his death. It is now called by the Turks Gyzel Hisar, or "the beautiful castle." The other was in the northern part of Lydia, near the junction of the Hermus and Hyllus, and in the vicinity of Mount Sipylus.] It is famous for a battle which was fought there 187 years before the Christian era, between the Romans and Antiochus king of Syria. The forces of Antiochus amounted to 70,000 men, according to Appian, or 70,000 foot and 12,000 horse, according to Livy, which have been exaggerated by Florus to 300,000 men; the Roman army consisted of about 28 or 30,000 men, 2000 of which were employed in guarding the camp. The Syrians lost 50,000 foot and 4000 horse, and the Romans only 300 killed with 25 horse.—A country on the eastern parts of Thessaly, at the south of Ossa.

The capital was also called Magnesia.—A promontory of Magnesia in Thessaly. Liv. 37.—Flor. 2.—Appian.

MAGO, a Carthaginian general sent against Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily. He obtained a victory, and granted peace to the conquered. In a battle which soon after followed this treaty of peace Mago was killed. His son of the same name succeeded to the command of the Carthaginian army, but he disgraced himself by flying at the approach of Timoleon, who had come to assist the Syracusans. He was accused in the Carthaginian senate, and he prevented by suicide the execution of the sentence justly pronounced against him. His body was hung on a gibbet, and exposed to public ignominy.—A brother of Annibal the Great. He was present at the battle of Cannæ, and was deputed by his brother to carry to Carthage the news of the celebrated victory which had been obtained over the Roman armies. His arrival at Carthage was unexpected, and more powerfully to astonish his countrymen on account of the victory at Cannæ, he emptied in the senate-house the three bushels of golden rings which had been taken from the Roman knights slain in battle. He was afterwards sent to Spain, where he defeated the two Scipios, and was himself, in another engagement, totally ruined. He retired to the Baleares, which he conquered; and one of the cities there still bears his name, and is called Portus Magonis, Port Mahon. After this he landed in Italy with an army, and took possession of part of Insubria. He was defeated in a battle by Quintilius Varus, and died of a mortal wound 203 years before the Christian era. Liv. 30, &c.—C. Nep. in Ann. 8, gives a very different account of his death, and says, he either perished in a shipwreck or was murdered by his servants. Perhaps Annibal had two brothers of that name.—A Carthaginian more known by the excellence of his writings than by his military exploits. He wrote 23 volumes upon husbandry; these were preserved by Scipio at the taking of Carthage, and presented to the Roman senate. They were translated into Greek by Cassius Dionysius of Utica, and into Latin by order of the Roman senate, though Cato had already written so copiously upon the subject; and the Romans, as it has been observed, consulted the writings of Mago with greater earnestness than the books of the Sibylline verses. Columella.—A Carthaginian sent by his countrymen to assist the Romans against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, with a fleet of 120 sail. This offer was politely refused by the Roman senate. This Mago was father of Asdrubal and Hamilcar. Val. Max.

MAGON, a river of India falling into the Ganges. [According to Mannert, the Ramgonga.] Arrian.

MAHERBAL, a Carthaginian who was at the siege of Saguntum, and who commanded the cavalry of Annibal at the battle of Cannæ. He advised the conqueror immediately to march to Rome, but Annibal required time to consider on so bold a measure; upon which Maherbal observed, that Annibal knew how to conquer, but not how to make a proper use of victory.

MAJA, a daughter of Atlas and Pleione mother of Mercury by Jupiter. She was one of the Pleiades, the most luminous of the seven sisters. [vid. Pleiades.] Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 301.—A surname of Cybele.

MAJESTAS, a goddess among the Romans, daughter of Honour and Reverence. Ovid. 5, Fast. 5, v. 25.

MAJORIANUS, Jul. Valerius, an emperor of the western Roman empire, raised to the imperial throne, A. D. 457. He signalized himself by his private as well as public virtues. He was massacred after a reign of 37 years by one of his generals, who envied in his master the character of an active, virtuous, and humane emperor.

MAJORCA. [vid. Baleares.]

MALA FORTUNA, the goddess of evil fortune, was worshipped among the Romans. Cic. de Nat. D. 3.

MALĒA, a promontory of Lesbos.—Another in Peloponnesus, at the south of Laconia. The sea is so rough and boisterous there, that the dangers which attended a voyage round it gave rise to the proverb of Cum ad Maleam deflexeris, obliviscere quæ sunt domi. [It is now cape Malio, or St. Angelo.] Strab. 8 and 9.—Lucan. 6, v. 58.—Plut. in Arat.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 193.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Liv. 21, c. 44.—Ovid. Am. 2, el. 16, v. 24, el. 11, v. 20.—Paus. 3, c. 23.

MALEVENTUM, the ancient name of Beneventum. Liv. 9, c. 27.

MALIA, a city of Phthiotis near Mount Œta and Thermopylæ. There were in its neighbourhood some hot mineral waters which the poet Catullus has mentioned. From Malia, a gulf or small bay in the neighbourhood, at the western extremities of the island of Eubœa, has received the name of the gulf of Malia, Maliacum Fretum or Moliacus Sinus. Some call it the gulf of Lamia from its vicinity to Lamia. Paus. 1, c. 4.—Herodot.

MALLEA OF MALLIA AQUA. vid. Malia.

MALLOPHORA, (lanam ferens,) a surname under which Ceres had a temple at Megara, because she had taught the inhabitants the utility of wool, and the means of tending sheep to advantage. This temple is represented as so old in the age of Pausanias, that it was falling to decay. Paus. 1, c. 44.

MAMERCUS, a tyrant of Catana, who surrendered to Timoleon. His attempts to speak in a public assembly at Syracuse were received with groans and hisses, upon which he dashed his head against a wall, and endeavoured to destroy himself. The blows were not fatal, and Mamercus was soon after put to death as a robber, B. C. 340. Polyæn. 5.—C. Nep. in Tim.

MAMERTINA, a town of Campania, famous for its wines.—A name of Messana in Sicily. Martial. 13, ep. 117.—Strab. 7.

MAMERTINI, a mercenary band of soldiers which passed from Campania into Sicily, at the request of Agathocles. When they were in the service of Agathocles, they claimed the privilege of voting at the electing of magistrates at Syracuse, and had recourse to arms to support their unlawful demands. The sedition was appeased by the authority of some leading men, and the Campanians were ordered to leave Sicily. In their way to the coast they were received with great kindness by the people of Messina, and soon returned perfidly for hospitality. They conspired against the inhabitants, murdered all the males in the city, and married their wives and daughters, and rendered themselves masters of the place. After this violence they assumed the name of Mamertini, and called their city Mamertina, from a provincial word, which in their language signified martial, or warlike. The Mamertines were afterwards defeated by Hiero, and totally disabled to repair their ruined affairs. [The more correct explanation of the name Mamertines is as follows. It was customary with the Oscan nations of Italy, in time of famine or any other misfortune, to seek to propitiate the favour of the gods by consecrating to them not only all the productions of the earth during a certain year, but also all the male children born during that same space of time. Mamer or Mars being their tutelary deity, they called these children after him when they had attained maturity, and, under the general and customary name of Mamertini, sent them away to seek new abodes.] Plut. in Pyrrh. &c.

MAMILIA LEX [de limitibus, A. U. C. 642, whence the author of it, C. Mamilius a tribune, got the surname of Limetanus. It ordained that there should be an uncultivated space of 5 feet broad left between farms, and if any dispute happened about this matter, that arbiters should be appointed by the prætor to determine it. The law of the twelve tables required three.]

MAMILII, a plebeian family at Rome descended from the Aborigines. They first lived at Tusculum, from whence they came to Rome. Liv. 3, c. 29.

MAMILIUS OCTAVIUS, a son-in-law of Tarquin, who behaved with uncommon bravery at the battle of Regillæ. He is also called Manilius. vid. Manilius.

MAMMEA, the mother of the emperor Severus, who died A. D. 235.

MAMURIUS VETURIUS, a worker in brass in Numa's reign. He was ordered by the monarch to make a number of ancyliæ or shields like that one which had fallen from heaven, that it might be difficult to distinguish the true one from the others. He was very successful in his undertaking, and he asked for no other reward but that his name might be frequently mentioned in the hymns which were sung by the Salii in the feast of the Ancyliæ. This request was granted. Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 392.—Varro L. L. 5, c. 6.

MAMURRA, a Roman knight, born at Formiæ. He followed the fortune of J. Cæsar in Gaul, where he greatly enriched himself. He built a magnificent palace on Mount Cælius, and was the first who incrusted his walls with marble. Catullus has attacked him in his epigrams. Formiæ is sometimes called Mamurrarum urbs. Plin. 36, c. 6.

C. MANCIUS, a Roman general, who, though at the head of an army of 30,000 men was defeated by 4000 Numantians, B. C. 138. [The remnant of the Roman army was allowed to retire, upon their making a treaty of peace with the Numantians. The senate refused to ratify the treaty, and ordered Mancinus to be delivered up to the enemy; but they refused to receive him. Mancinus thereupon returned to Rome, and was reinstated in his rights of a citizen, contrary to the opinion of the tribune P. Rutilius, who asserted that he could not enjoy the right of returning to his country, called by the Romans jus postliminii.] Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 40.

MANDANE, a daughter of king Astyages, married by her father to Cambyses, an ignoble person of Persia. The monarch had dreamed that his daughter's urine had drowned all his city, which had been interpreted in an unfavourable manner by the soothsayers who assured him that his daughter's son would dethrone him. The marriage of Mandane with Cambyses would in the monarch's opinion prevent the effects of the dream, and the children of this connection would like their father be poor and unnoticed. The expectations of Astyages were frustrated. He was dethroned by his grandson. (vid. Cyrus.) Herodot. 1, c. 107.

MANDĒLA, a village in the country of the Sabines, near Horace's country-seat. Horat. 1, ep. 18, v. 105.

MANDUBII, [a people of Gaul, whose country lay near the sources of the Sequana, or Seine. Their chief town was Alesia, or Alise.] Cæs. Bell. G. 7, c. 78.

MANDUBRATIUS, a young Briton, who came over to Cæsar in Gaul. His father Immanuentius was king in Britain, and had been put to death by order of Cassivelaunus. Cæs. Bell. G. 5, c. 20.

MANES, a name generally applied by the ancients to the souls when separated from the body. [Sometimes they gave this name to the infernal or subterraneous deities, and sometimes again to all those divinities who presided over tombs and burying-places. The true origin of this superstition may perhaps be found in the prevailing belief that the world was full of genii, some of whom attended on the living and others on the dead; that of these some were good and others bad; that the first were called laræ, the latter lemures or larvæ.] They were worshipped with great solemnity, particularly by the Romans. The augurs always invoked them when they proceeded to exercise their sacerdotal offices. Virgil introduces his hero as sacrificing to the infernal deities, and to the Manes, a victim whose blood was received in a ditch. The word manes is supposed to be derived from Mania, who was by some reckoned the mother of those tremendous deities. Others derive it from manare, quod per omnia aetherea terrenaque manabant, because they filled the air, particularly in the night, and were intent to molest and disturb the peace of mankind. Some say that manes comes from manis, an old Latin word, which signified good or propitious. The word manes is differently used by ancient authors; sometimes it is taken for the infernal regions, and sometimes it is applied to the deities of Pluto's kingdom, whence the epitaphs of the Romans were always superscribed with D. M. Dis Manibus, to remind the sacrilegious and profane not to molest the monuments of the dead, which were guarded with such sanctity. Propert. 1, el. 19.—Virg. 4, G. 469. Æn. 3, &c.—Horat. 1, Sat. 8, v. 23.

MANËTHO, [a celebrated priest of Heliopolis, in Egypt, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and surnamed Sebennite, from the place of his origin. He wrote in the Greek language a history of Egypt, the subject matter of which he asserts to have been extracted from certain pillars in the Siriadic land, on which inscriptions had been made in the sacred dialect of Thoth, the first Mercury, which after the flood were translated into the Greek tongue, but were written in the sacred character, and were laid up in books in the sacred recesses of Egypt by the second Mercury. But this account, which certainly related to the earlier portions of the history, is so incredible by its reference to the Greek language at a period when it could not have been known in Egypt, that the writers of the Universal History suspect some mistake or corruption in the passage of Eusebius containing it. The history, which is in a great measure fabulous, is lost; but the dynasties have been preserved in the Chronicle of Eusebius. Some fragments of the history are to be found in the work of Josephus against Apion.] His Apotelesmata were edited by Gronovius, in 4to. L. Bat. 1698.

MANIA, a goddess, supposed to be the mother of the Lares and Manes.—A female servant of queen Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy.

MANILIA LEX, by Manilius the tribune, A. U. C. 678. It required that all the forces of Lucullus and his provinces, together with Bithynia, which was then under the command of Glabrio, should be delivered to Pompey, and that this general should, without any delay, declare war against Mithridates, and still retain the command of the Roman fleet, and the empire of the Mediterranean, as before.—Another which permitted all those whose fathers had not been invested with public offices, to be employed in the management of affairs.

MANILIUS, a Roman who married the daughter of Tarquin. He lived at Tusculum, and received his father-in-law in his house, when banished from Rome, &c. Liv. 2, c. 15.—Caius, [a Latin poet, known only by his work, from which it would seem that he wrote in the age of Augustus, after the defeat of Varus, and that he was, if not a native of Rome, at least a Roman citizen. This poem is entitled Astronomicon, treating in five books upon the fixed stars: a sixth appears to have related to the planets, but this is entirely lost. It unites the ancient system of astronomy with the philosophy of the Stoics, and there are passages in it which would not disgrace any poet of the Augustan age. The manuscripts do not agree about the name of this poet; some of them calling him Manlius, others Mallius. Bentley believed him to have been born in Asia, and boldly pronounces the 41st and 776th verses of the poem, in which the poet calls Rome his city, to have been interpolated. The same critic contends that he flourished during the Augustan age.] The best editions of Manilius are those of Bentley, 4to. London, 1739, and Stoeberus, 8vo. Argentor, 1767.—Titus, a learned historian in the age of Sylla and Marius. He is greatly commended by Cicero, pro Roscio.—Marcus, another mentioned by Cicero de Orat. 1, c. 48, as supporting the character of a great lawyer, and of an eloquent and powerful orator.

MANLIA LEX, by the tribune P. Manlius, A. U. C. 557. It revived the office of triviri epulones, first instituted by Numa. The epulones were priests, who prepared banquets for Jupiter and the gods at public festivals, &c.

MANLIUS TORQUATUS, a celebrated Roman, whose youth was distinguished by a lively and cheerful disposition. These promising talents were, however, impeded by a difficulty of speaking; and the father, unwilling to expose his son's rusticity at Rome, detained him in the country. The behaviour of the father was publicly censured, and Marius Pomponius the tribune cited him to answer for his unfatherly behaviour to his son. Young Manlius was informed of this, and with a dagger in his hand he entered the house of the tribune, and made him solemnly promise that he would drop the accusation. This action of Manlius endeared him to the people, and soon after he was chosen military tribune. In a war against the Gauls, he accepted the challenge of one of the enemy, whose gigantic stature and ponderous arms had rendered him terrible and almost invincible in the eyes of the Romans. The Gaul was conquered, and Manlius stripped him of his arms, and from the collar (torques) which he took from the enemy's neck, he was ever after surnamed Torquatus. Manlius was the first Roman who was raised to the dictatorship, without having been previously consul. The severity of Torquatus to his son has been deservedly censured. This father had the courage and heart to put to death his son because he had engaged one of the enemy, and obtained an honourable victory, without his previous permission. This uncommon rigour displeased many of the Romans; and though Torquatus was honoured with a triumph, and commended by the senate for his services, yet the Roman youth showed their disapprobation of the consul's severity by refusing him at his return the homage which every other conqueror received. Some time after the censorship was offered to him, but he refused it, observing that the people could not bear his severity nor the vices of the people. From the rigour of Torquatus, all edicts and actions of severity and justice have been called Manliana edicta. Liv. 7. c. 10.—Val. Max. 6, c. 9.—Marcus, a celebrated Roman, whose valour was displayed in the field of battle, even at the early age of sixteen. When Rome was taken by the Gauls, Manlius with a body of his countrymen fled into the capitol, which he defended when it was suddenly surprised in the night by the enemy. This action gained him the surname of Capitolinus, and the geese, which by their clamour had awakened him to arm himself in his own defence, were ever after held sacred among the Romans. A law which Manlius proposed to abolish the tax on the common people, raised the senators against him. The dictator, Corn. Cossus, seized him as a rebel, but the people put on mourning, and delivered from prison their common father. This did not in the least check his ambition; he continued to raise factions, and even secretly to attempt to make himself absolute, till at last the tribunes of the people themselves became his accusers. He was tried in the Campus Martius; but when the distant view of the capitol which Manlius had saved, seemed to influence the people in his favour, the court of justice was removed, and Manlius was condemned. He was thrown down from the Tarpeian rock. A. U. C. 371, and, to render his ignominy still greater, none of his family were afterwards permitted to bear the surname of Marcus, and the place where his house had stood was deemed unworthy to be inhabited. Liv. 5. c. 31, l. 6, c. 5.—Flor. 1, c. 13 and 26.—Val. Max. 6, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 825.—Imperiosus, father of Manlius Torquatus. He was made dictator. He was accused for detaining his son at home. [vid. Manlius Torquatus.]—Volso, a Roman consul who received an army of Scipio in Asia, and made war against the Gallo-Grecians, whom he conquered. He was honoured with a triumph at his return, though it was at first strongly opposed. Flor. 3, c. 11.—Liv. 38, c. 12, &c.—Caius, or Aulus, a senator sent to Athens to collect the best and wisest laws of Solon. A. U. C. 300—Liv. 2, c. 54, l. 3, c. 31.—Another, called also Cincinnatus. He made war against the Etrurians and Veientes with great success. He died of a wound he had received in a battle.—Another, who in his praetorship reduced Sardinia. He was afterwards made dictator.—Another, who conspired with Catiline against the Roman republic.—Another, in whose consulship the temple of Janus was shut.—A Roman appointed judge between his son Silanus and the province of Macedonia. When all the parties had been heard, the father said, “it is evident that my son had suffered himself to be bribed, therefore I deem him unworthy of the republic and of my house, and I order him to depart from my presence.”

Silanus was so struck at the rigour of his father, that he hanged himself. Val. Max. 5, c. 5.

MANNUS, [the son of the German god Phuiston, of whom that nation believed themselves to be the descendants.] Tacit. de Germ. c. 2.

J. MANSUETUS, a friend of Vitellius, who entered the Roman armies, and left his son, then very young, at home. The son was promoted by Galba, and soon after met a detachment of the partisans of Vitellius in which his father was. A battle was fought, and Mansuetus was wounded by the hand of his son, &c. Tacit. Hist. 3, c. 25.

MANTINEA, [a town of Arcadia, below Orchomenus, and near the borders of Argolis. It appears to have been a considerable place even in the age of Homer. Antioe the daughter of Cepheus, is said to have transported the inhabitants of the old city to a more convenient situation than the one which they originally occupied, namely, to the banks of the small river Ophis, and it is fabulously reported that Antioe was led to the selection of the new site by the guidance of a serpent, while others say that the river derived its name from its serpentine course. After the peace of Antalcidas it was besieged by the Spartans. The Mantineans defended themselves with great bravery during the summer, but in the winter the besiegers dammed up the river, and caused it to overflow the city, on which the inhabitants were compelled to retire from the place to their old villages. They returned after the battle of Leuctra, and rebuilt their city with the aid of the Thebans, but they afterwards took part with the Spartans against them.] It is famous for the battle which was fought here between Epaminondas at the head of the Thebans, and the combined forces of Lacedæmon, Achaia, Elis, Athens, and Arcadia, about 363 years before Christ. The Theban general was killed in the engagement, and from that time Thebes lost its power and consequence among the Grecian states. [During the wars under the Achæan league, Antigonus having dislodged Cleomenes from this city, the inhabitants, in compliment to him, suppressed the original name of the place, and called it Antigonia. Adrian restored the ancient name, and erected a temple to Antinous. This city had several other most splendid temples.] Strab. 8.—C. Nep. in Epam.—Diod. 15.—Ptol. 3, c. 16.

MANTINORUM OPIDUM, a town of Corsica, now supposed to be Bastia.

MANTO, a daughter of the prophet Tiresias, endowed with the gift of prophecy. She was made prisoner by the Argives when the city of Thebes fell into their hands, and as she was the worthiest part of the booty, the conquerors sent her to Apollo, the god of Delphi, as the most valuable present they could make. Manto, often called Daphne, remained for some time at Delphi, where she officiated as priestess, and where she gave oracles.

cles. From Delphi she came to Claros in Ionia, where she established an oracle of Apollo. Here she married Rhadius, the sovereign of the country, by whom she had a son called Mopsus. Manto afterwards visited Italy, where she married Tiberinus the king of Alba, or, as the poets mention, the god of the river Tyber. From this marriage sprang Ocnus, who built a town in the neighbourhood, which, in honour of his mother, he called Mantua. Manto, according to a certain tradition, was so struck at the misfortunes which afflicted Thebes her native country, that she gave way to her sorrow, and was turned into a fountain. Some suppose her to be the same who conducted Æneas into hell, and who sold the Sibylline books to Tarquin the Proud. She received divine honours after death. *Virg. MANTUA, [a town of Italy, on the Minicius, south-east of Brixia, and south of the Lacus Benacus. It is supposed to have been founded by the Etrurians, 600 years B. C.] When Cremona, which had followed the interest of Brutus, was given to the soldiers of Octavius, Mantua, which was in the neighbourhood, shared the common calamity, though it had favoured the party of Augustus, and many of the inhabitants were tyrannically deprived of their possessions. [Virgil, who was born at Andes, a small village below Mantua, was one of the sufferers on this occasion. vid. Virgilius.] Strab. 5.—Virg. Ecl. 1, &c. G. 3, v. 12. Æn. 10, v. 130.—*Ovid. MARATHON, a village of Attica, 10 miles from Athens, celebrated for the victory which the 10,000 Athenians and 1000 Plataeans, under the command of Miltiades, gained over the Persian army, consisting of 100,000 foot and 10,000 horse, or, according to Val. Maximus, of 300,000, or, as Justin says, of 600,000, under the command of Datis and Artaphernes, on the 28th of Sept. 490 B. C. In this battle, according to Herodotus, the Athenians lost only 192 men, and the Persians 6,300. Justin has raised the loss of the Persians in this expedition and in the battle, to 200,000 men. To commemorate this immortal victory of their countrymen, the Greeks raised small columns, with the names inscribed on the tombs of the fallen heroes. It was also in the plains of Marathon that Theseus overcame a celebrated bull, which plundered the neighbouring country. Erigone is called Marathonia virgo, as being born at Marathon. Stat. 5, Sylv. 3, v. 74.—C. Nep. in Mil.—Herodot. 6, &c.—Justin. 2, c. 9.—Val. Max. 5, c. 3.—Plut. in Parol.—A king of Attica, son of Epopeus, who gave his name to a small village there. Paus. 2, c. 1.—A king of Sicily.

MARCELLA, a daughter of Octavia the sister of Augustus by Marcellus. She married Agrippa.

MARCELLINUS AMMIANUS, a celebrated

historian who carried arms under Constantius, Julian, and Valens, and wrote an history of Rome. [It commenced with the reign of Nerva, and consequently at the period where the history of Tacitus ends. It is not known whether Ammianus meant his own to be a continuation of the latter work, or whether some other motive induced him to begin his history at this point of time. What seems to favour the latter supposition is the fact of his making no mention of Tacitus any where, although he cites Sallust and other Latin historians; neither is there in his work any apparent imitation of Tacitus. The history of Ammianus is continued down to the year 378 of our era; and embraces, consequently, a space of 282 years, but the first 13 books, which comprehend a period of 256 years, are lost, and we have only the last 18. The latter, however, constitute the most valuable portion of his work; for in the first 13, he only extracted and compiled from the writings of antecedent historians. And yet we may well regret the want even of these, since many of the authors whence he drew his materials, have not reached our times. In the last 18 books Ammianus recounts the events of his own day. Had he lived in a more flourishing period of literature he would have become, by the study of good models, and by intercourse with men of cultivated taste, an accomplished and elegant historian. He was the last of the Pagan historical writers.] His style is neither elegant nor laboured, but it is greatly valued for its veracity, and in many of the actions he mentions, the author was nearly concerned. This history was composed at Rome, where Ammianus retired from the noise and troubles of the camp, and does not betray that severity against the Christians which other writers have manifested, though the author was warm in favour of Paganism, the religion which for a while was seated on the throne. Ammianus has been liberal in his encomiums upon Julian, whose favours he enjoyed, and who so eminently patronized his religion. The negligence with which some facts are sometimes mentioned, has induced many to believe that the history of Ammianus has suffered much from the ravages of time, and that it is descended to us mutilated and imperfect. The best editions of Ammianus are those of Gronovius, fol. and to. L. Bat. 1693, and of Ernesti, 8vo. Lips. 1773.

MARCELLUS, Marcus Claudius, a famous Roman general, who after the first Punic war, had the management of an expedition against the Gauls, where he obtained the Spolia opima, by killing with his own hand Viridomarus the king of the enemy. Such success rendered him popular, and soon after he was intrusted to oppose Annibal in Italy. He was the first Roman who obtained some advantage over the celebrated Carthaginian, and showed his countrymen that Annibal was not invincible. The troubles which were raised in Sicily by the Carthaginians, at the death of Hieronymus, alarmed the Romans.

and Marcellus, in his third consulship, was sent with a powerful force against Syracuse. He attacked it by sea and land, but his operations proved ineffectual, and the invention and industry of a philosopher [vid. Archimedes] were able to baffle all the efforts, and to destroy all the great and stupendous machines and military engines of the Romans during three successive years. The perseverance of Marcellus at last obtained the victory. The inattention of the inhabitants during their nocturnal celebration of the festivals of Diana, favoured his operations; he forcibly entered the town, and made himself master of it. The conqueror enriched the capital of Italy with the spoils of Syracuse, and when he was accused of rapaciousness, for stripping the conquered city of all its paintings and ornaments, he confessed that he had done it to adorn the public buildings of Rome, and to introduce a taste for the fine arts and elegance of the Greeks among his countrymen. After the conquest of Syracuse, Marcellus was called upon by his country to oppose a second time Annibal. In this campaign he behaved with greater vigour than before; the greater part of the towns of the Samnites, who had revolted, were recovered by force of arms, and 3000 of the soldiers of Annibal made prisoners. Some time after an engagement with the Carthaginian general proved unfavourable; Marcellus had the disadvantage; but on the morrow a more successful skirmish vindicated his military character, and the honour of the Roman soldiers. Marcellus, however, was not sufficiently vigilant against the snares of his adversary. He imprudently separated himself from his camp, and was killed in an ambuscade in the 60th year of his age, in his 5th consulship, A. U. C. 546. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by the conqueror, and his ashes were conveyed in a silver urn to his son. Marcellus claims our commendation for his private as well as public virtues: and the humanity of a general will ever be remembered, who, at the surrender of Syracuse, wept at the thought that many were going to be exposed to the avarice and rapaciousness of an incensed soldiery, which the policy of Rome and the laws of war, rendered inevitable. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 355.—Pat. c. 2, c. 38.—Plut. in vitâ, &c.—One of his descendants, who bore the same name, signalized himself in the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey, by his firm attachment to the latter. He was banished by Cæsar, but afterwards recalled at the request of the senate. Cicero undertook his defence in an oration, which is still extant.—The grandson of Pompey's friend rendered himself popular by his universal benevolence and affability. He was son of Marcellus by Octavia the sister of Augustus. He married Julia, that emperor's daughter, and was publicly intended as his successor. The suddenness of his death, at the early age of eighteen, was the cause of much lamentation at Rome, particularly in the family of Augustus, and Virgil procured himself great favours by celebrating the virtues of this amiable prince. [vid. Octavia.] Marcellus was buried at the public expense. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 883.—Suet. in Aug.—Plut. in Marcell.—Senec. Consol. ad Marc.—Pat. c. 2, c. 93.

—The son of the great Marcellus who took Syracuse, was caught in the ambuscade which proved fatal to his father, but he forced his way from the enemy and escaped. He received the ashes of his father from the conqueror. Plut. in Marcell.—The husband of Octavia the sister of Augustus.—A native of Pamphylia, who wrote an heroic poem on physic, divided into 42 books. He lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius.

MARCIA LEX, by Marcius Censorinus. It forbid any man to be invested with the office of censor more than once.

MARCIA, the wife of Regulus, who, when she heard that her husband had been put to death at Carthage in the most execrating manner, retorted the punishment, and shut up some Carthaginian prisoners in a barrel which she had previously filled with sharp nails. The senate was obliged to stop her wantonness and cruelty. Diod. 24.—A daughter of Philip, who married Cato the censor. Her husband gave her to his friend Hortensius for the sake of procreating children, and after his death he took her again to his own house.—An ancient name of the island of Rhodes.—A daughter of Cato of Utica.—A stream of water. vid. Martia aqua.

MARCĪANA, a sister of the emperor Trajan, who, on account of her public and private virtues and her amiable disposition, was declared Augusta and empress by her brother. She died A. D. 113.

MARCĪANOPŌLIS, the capital of Lower Mœsia. It received its name in honour of the empress Marciana. [It is now Prebilaw, or, "the illustrious city."]

MARCĪANUS, a native of Thrace, born of an obscure family. After he had for some time served in the army as a common soldier, he was made private secretary to one of the officers of Theodosius. His winning address and uncommon talents raised him to higher stations; and on the death of Theodosius the 2d. A. D. 450, he was invested with the imperial purple in the east. The subjects of the Roman empire had reason to be satisfied with their choice. Marcianus showed himself active and resolute, and when Attila, the barbarous king of the Huns, asked of the emperor the annual tribute which the indolence and cowardice of his predecessors had regularly paid, the successor of Theodosius firmly said, that he kept his gold for his friends, but that iron was the metal which he had prepared for his enemies. In the midst of universal popularity Marcianus died, after a reign of six years, in the 69th year of his age, as he was making warlike preparations against the barbarians that had invaded Africa. His death was lamented, and indeed his merit was great, since his reign has been distinguished by the appellation of the golden age. Marcianus married Pulcheria, the sister of his predecessor. It is said, that in the years of his obscurity he found a man who had been murdered, and that he had the humanity to give him a private burial, for which circumstance he was accused of the homicide and imprisoned. He was condemned to lose his life, and the sentence would have been executed, had not the real murderer been discovered, and convinced the world of the innocence of Marcianus.—Capella, a writer. vid. Capella.

M. MARCIUS SABINUS, was the progenitor of the Marcian family at Rome. He came to Rome with Numa, and it was he who advised Numa to accept of the crown which the Romans offered to him. He attempted to make himself king of Rome, in opposition to Tullus Hostilius; and when his efforts proved unsuccessful, he killed himself. His son, who married a daughter of Numa, was made high-priest by his father-in-law. He was father of Ancus Martius. Plut. in Numa.—A Roman who accused Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, of misdemeanor, in the Roman senate.—A Roman consul, defeated by the Samnites. He was more successful against the Carthaginians, and obtained a victory, &c.

MARCOMANNI, [a German nation, who are supposed to have dwelt originally along the Rhine, south of the Mattiaci. They afterwards migrated to Boiohemum, or that part of the country which answers to modern Bohemia.] They proved powerful enemies to the Roman emperors. Augustus granted them peace, but they were afterwards subdued by Antoninus and Trajan, &c. [Their name is said to signify Border-men.] Plut. c. 2, c. 109.—Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 46 and 62, G. 42.

MARCUS, a prænomem common to many of the Romans. vid. Æmilius, Lepidus, &c.—A son of Cato, killed at Philippi, &c.

MARDI, a people of Persia, on the confines of Media. They were very poor, and generally lived upon the flesh of wild beasts. Their country, in latter times, became the residence of the famous assassins destroyed by Hulakou, the grandson of Zingis Khan. Herodot. 1 and 3.—Plin. 6, c. 16.

MARDIA, a place of Thrace, famous for a battle between Constantine and Licinius, A. D. 315.

MARDONIUS, a general of Xerxes, who, after the defeat of his master at Thermopylæ and Salamis, was left in Greece with an army of 300,000 chosen men, to subdue the country, and reduce it under the power of Persia. His operations were rendered useless by the courage and vigilance of the Greeks; and, in a battle at Platæa, Mardonius was defeated and left among the slain, B. C. 479. He had been commander of the armies of Darius in Europe, and it was chiefly by his advice that Xerxes invaded Greece. He was son-in-law of Darius. [vid. Darius, under which article a farther account is given of Mardonius.] Plut. in Arist.—Herodot. 6, 7 and 8.—Diod. 11.—Justin. 2, c. 13, &c.

MARDUS, a river of Media, falling into the Caspian Sea.

MARE MORTUUM, called also, from the bitumen [ασφαλτος,] it throws up, the lake Asphaltites, is situate in Judea. Its waters are salter than those of the sea, but the vapours exhaled from them are not so pestilential as have been generally represented. It is supposed that the 13 cities, of which Sodom and Gomorrah, as mentioned in the Scriptures, were the chief, were destroyed by a volcano, and on the site a lake formed. Volcanic appearances now mark the face of the country, and earthquakes are frequent. [This lake has been called the Dead Sea, not merely from the dead and stagnant appearance of its waters, but because, owing to the salt vapours exhaled from the surface, no vegetation is seen along its banks. Volumes of smoke are often observed to issue from the lake, and new crevices are found on its margin. As the Jordan, before the celebrated destruction of this plain, discharged itself in the same place that it now does, the conclusion is a necessary one, that the lake which then existed was a subterranean one. It was covered with a crust of earth, which was sustained by the Asphaltus, a pitchy, bituminous substance, which emerged from the bottom of the lake, and collected during a long course of years in large masses. The Asphaltus arises from the lake to this day, floats on its surface, and occasionally explodes. This statement is confirmed by Genesis 14: 10, where mention is made of slime pits, through which the Asphaltus or bitumen penetrated from the subterranean water. This bitumen, being at length set on fire by the lightning, burnt, and the earth, by which it was covered, being deprived of its support, sank in the waters, and the lake made its appearance. The lake is said to be 67 miles from north to south, and 17 in its greatest breadth from west to east. Its waters are a little impregnated with alum, and very much so with salt, hence it is called the Salt Sea, Genesis 14: 4. Whatever is immersed in its waters and taken out again is covered with a crust of salt; which seems to have been the destiny of Lot's wife, unless indeed the Scriptures speak merely of a monument heaped up of incrustated salt.] Plin. 5, c. 6.—Joseph. J. bell. 4, c. 27.—Strab. 16, p. 764.—Justin. 36, c. 3.

MAREÛTIS, now Swah, a lake in Egypt, near Alexandria. Its neighbourhood was famous for wine, though some make the Mareoticum vinum to have been produced in Epirus, or in a certain part of Libya, called also Mareotis, near Egypt. [For many ages this lake was dried up, for though the bed is lower than the surface of the ocean, there is not sufficient rain to keep up any lake in that country in opposition to the force of perpetual evaporation. But in 1801, the English, in order to circumscribe more effectually the communications which the French army in Alexandria maintained with the surrounding country, cut across the walls of the old canal, which had formed a dyke, separating this low ground from lake Maadie, or the lake of Aboukir, on the east. In consequence of this easy operation, the water had a sudden fall of six feet, and the lake Mareotis, which had so long disappeared, and the site of which had been occupied partly by salt marshes, partly by cultivated lands, and even villages, resumed its ancient form. This modern inundation from the sea, indeed, is much more extensive than the ancient lake Mareotis, occupying probably, four times its extent.] Virg. G. 2, v. 91.—Horat. 1, od. 38, v. 14.—Lucan. 3 and 10.—Strab. 17.

MARGIANA, [a country of Asia along the river Margus, from which it derives its name. According to Ptolemy it had Hyrcania on the west, the Oxus on the north, Bactriana on the east, and Aria on the south. It now forms a part of Khorasan.] Pliny speaks of its fertility, and states it to have produced in particular, excellent wine. Its vines were unusually large.

MARGITES, a man, against whom as some suppose. Homer wrote a poem, to ridicule his superficial knowledge, and to expose his affectation. When Demosthenes wished to ridicule Alexander, he called him another Margites. [The name Margites appears to have been a fictitious one, invented by the poet for the occasion. According to Aristotle the poem in question had the same analogy with comedy that the Iliad and Odyssey had with tragedy. The same writer remarks, in speaking of the Margites, and other poems of this class, that the iambic measure belongs to them. It is not clear whether Aristotle means here to say that Homer used iambic verse in the poem; but all uncertainty disappears if we compare this passage of Aristotle with two of Harpocration, by which it appears that the Margites actually contained iambic verses. They were inserted without any other rule than the mere caprice of the poet. We have only four verses remaining of this poem.]

MARGUS, a river of Mœsia falling into the Danube, with a town of the same name, now Kastolatz.

MARIA LEX, by C. Marius, the tribune, A. U. C. 634. It ordered the planks called pontes, on which the people proceeded to give their votes in the comitia, to be narrower, that no other might stand there to hinder the proceedings of the assembly by appeal, or other disturbances.—Another, called also Porcia, by L. Marius and Porcius, tribunes, A. U. C. 691. It fined in a certain sum of money such commanders as gave a false account to the Roman senate of the number of slain in a battle. It obliged them to swear to the truth of their return when they entered the city, according to the best computation.

MARIANÆ FOSSÆ, a town of Gallia Narbonensis, which received its name from the dyke (fossa), which Marius opened from thence to the sea. Plin. 3, c. 4.—Strab. 4.

MARIANDŶNI, [a people of Bithynia, to the east of the river Sangarius. In the north-eastern part of their district was the powerful city of Heraclea Pontica, and to the north-west of this was a small peninsular promontory, called Acherusia Chersonesus. Through a cavern in this promontory Hercules was fabled to have dragged Cerberus from hell. Dionys.—Ptol. 5, c. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 2 and 19. l. 2, c. 7.

MARIĀNUS, a surname given to Jupiter, from a temple built to his honour by Marius. It was in this temple that the Roman senate assembled to recall Cicero, a circumstance communicated to him in a dream. Val. Max. 1, c. 7.

MARICA, a nymph of the river Liris, near Minturnæ. She married king Faunus, by whom she had king Latinus, and she was afterwards called Fauna and Fatua, and honoured as a goddess. A city of Campania bore her name. Some suppose her to be the same as Circe. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 47.—Liv. 27, c. 37.—A wood on the borders of Campania bore also the name of Marica, as being sacred to the nymph. Liv. 27, c. 37.—Horat. 3, od. 17, v. 7.

MARĪTA LEX. vid. Julia de Maritandis. MARĪSUS, a river of Dacia [which falls into the Tibiscus. It is now the Maros.]

C. MARIUS, a celebrated Roman, who, from a peasant, became one of the most powerful and cruel tyrants that Rome ever beheld during her consular government. He was born at Arpinum, of obscure and illiterate parents. His father bore the same name as himself, and his mother was called Fulcinia. He forsook the meaner occupations of the country for the camp, and signalized himself under Scipio, at the siege of Numantia. The Roman general saw the courage and intrepidity of young Marius, and foretold the era of his future greatness. By his seditious and intrigues at Rome, while he exercised the inferior offices of the state, he rendered himself known; and his marriage with Julia, who was of the family of the Cæsars, contributed in some measure to raise him to consequence. He passed into Africa as lieutenant to the consul Metellus against Jugurtha, and after he had there ingratiated himself with the soldiers, and raised enemies to his friend and benefactor, he returned to Rome, and canvassed for the consulship. The extravagant promises he made to the people, and his malevolent insinuations about the conduct of Metellus, proved successful. He was elected, and appointed to finish the war against Jugurtha. He showed himself capable in every degree to succeed to Metellus. Jugurtha was defeated, and afterwards betrayed into the hands of the Romans by the perfidy of Bocchus. No sooner was Jugurtha conquered than new honours and fresh trophies awaited Marius. The provinces of Rome were suddenly invaded by an army of 300,000 barbarians, and Marius was the only man whose activity and boldness could resist so powerful an enemy. He was elected consul, and sent against the Teutones. The war was prolonged, and Marius was a third and fourth time invested with the consulship. At last two engagements were fought, and not less than 200,000 of the barbarian forces of the Ambrones and Teutones were slain in the field of battle, and 90,000 made prisoners. The following year was also marked by a total overthrow of the Cimbræ, another horde of barbarians, in which 140,000 were slaughtered by the Romans, and 60,000 taken prisoners. After such honourable victories, Marius, with his colleague Catulus, entered Rome in triumph, and, for his eminent services, he deserved the appellation of the third founder of Rome. He was elected consul a sixth time; and, as his intrepidity had delivered his country from its foreign enemies, he sought employment at home, and his restless ambition began to raise seditions, and to oppose the power of Sylla. This was the cause and the foundation of a civil war. Sylla refused to deliver up the command of the forces with which he was empowered to prosecute the Mithridatic war, and he resolved to oppose the authors of a demand which he considered as arbitrary and improper. He advanced to Rome, and Marius was obliged to save his life by flight. The unfavourable winds prevented him from seeking a safer retreat in Africa, and he was left on the coasts of Campania, where the emissaries of his enemy soon discovered him in a marsh, where he had plunged himself in the mud, and left only his mouth above the surface for respiration. He was violently dragged to the neighbourhood of Minturnæ, and the magistrates, all devoted to the interest of Sylla, passed sentence of immediate death on their magnanimous prisoner. A Gaul was commanded to cut off his head in the dungeon, but the stern countenance of Marius disarmed the courage of the executioner, and when he heard the exclamation of, Tunc homo, audes occidere Caium Marium? the dagger dropped from his hand. Such an uncommon adventure awakened the compassion of the inhabitants of Minturnæ. They released Marius from prison, and favoured his escape to Africa, where he joined his son Marius, who had been arming the princes of the country in his cause. Marius landed near the walls of Carthage, and he received no small consolation at the sight of the venerable ruins of a once powerful city, which, like himself, had been exposed to calamity, and felt the cruel vicissitude of fortune. This place of his retreat was soon known, and the governor of Africa, to conciliate the favours of Sylla, compelled Marius to fly to a neighbouring island. He soon after learned that Cinna had embraced his cause at Rome, when the Roman senate had stripped him of his consular dignity and bestowed it upon one of his enemies. This intelligence animated Marius: he set sail to assist his friend, only at the head of a thousand men. His army, however, gradually increased, and he entered Rome like a conqueror. His enemies were inhumanly sacrificed to his fury, Rome was filled with blood, and he who had once been called the father of his country, marched through the streets of the city attended by a number of assassins, who immediately slaughtered all those whose salutations were not answered by their leader. Such were the signals for bloodshed. When Marius and Cinna had sufficiently gratified their resentment, they made themselves consuls; but Marius, already worn out with old age and infirmities, died sixteen days after he had been honoured with the consular dignity for the seventh time, B. C. 86. His end was probably hastened by the uncommon quantities of wine which he drank when labouring under a dangerous disease, to remove, by intoxication, the stings of a guilty conscience. Such was the end of Marius, who rendered himself conspicuous by his victories and by his cruelty. As he was brought up in the midst of poverty and among peasants, it will not appear wonderful that he always betrayed rusticity in his behaviour, and despised in others those polished manners and that studied address which education had denied him. He hated the conversation of the learned only because he was illiterate, and if he appeared an example of sobriety and temperance, he owed these advantages to the years of obscurity which he had passed at Arpinum. His countenance was stern, his voice firm and imperious, and his disposition untractable. He always betrayed the greatest timidity in the public assemblies, as he had not been early taught to make eloquence and oratory his pursuit. He was in the 70th year of his age when he died, and Rome seemed to rejoice at the fall of a man whose ambition had proved fatal to so many of her citizens. His only qualifications were those of a great general, and with these he rendered himself the most illustrious and powerful of the Romans, because he was the only one whose ferocity seemed capable to oppose the barbarians of the north. The manner of his death, according to some opinions, remains doubtful, though some have charged him with the crime of suicide. Among the instances which are mentioned of his firmness this may be recorded: Having both his legs full of wens, he applied to a physician to have them cut off, and suffered the operation to be performed on one leg without a groan. Plut. in vitâ.—Paterc. 2, c. 9.—Flor. 3, c. 3.—Juv. 8, v. 245, &c.—Lucan. 2, v. 69.—Caius, the son of the great Marius, was as cruel as his father, and shared his good and his adverse fortune. He made himself consul in the 25th year of his age, and murdered all the senators who opposed his ambitious views. He was defeated by Sylla, and fled to Prænestæ, where he killed himself. Plut. in Mario.—Priscus, a governor of Africa, accused of extortion in his province by Pliny the younger, and banished from Italy. Plin. 2, ep. 11.—Juv. 1, v. 48.—One of the Greek fathers of the 5th century, whose works were edited by Garner, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1673; and Baluzius, ib. 1684, —M. Aurelius, a native of Gaul, who, from the mean employment of a blacksmith, became one of the generals of Gallienus, and at last caused himself to be saluted emperor.

Three days after this elevation, a man who had shared his poverty without partaking of his more prosperous fortune, publicly assassinated him, and he was killed by a sword which he himself had made in the time of his obscurity. Marius has been often celebrated for his great strength, and it is confidently reported that he could stop, with one of his fingers only, the wheel of a chariot in its most rapid course.—Maximus, a Latin writer, who published an account of the Roman emperors from Trajan to Alexander, now lost. His compositions were entertaining, and executed with great exactness and fidelity. Some have accused him of inattention, and complain that his writings abounded with many fabulous and insignificant stories.

MARPESIA, a celebrated queen of the Amazons, who waged a successful war against the inhabitants of Mount Caucasus. The mountain was called Marpesius Mons, from its female conqueror. Justin. 2, c. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6.

MARPESIA, a daughter of the Evenus, who married Idas, by whom she had Cleopatra, the wife of Meleager. Marpesia was tenderly loved by her husband; and when Apollo endeavoured to carry her away, Idas followed the ravisher with a bow and arrows, resolved on revenge. Apollo and Idas were separated by Jupiter, who permitted Marpesia to go with that one of the two lovers whom she most approved of. She returned to her husband. Homer. Il. 9, v. 549.—*Ovid. MARRUVIUM or MARRUBIUM, [the capital of the Marsi, situate on the east bank of the Lacus Fucinus. The inhabitants of this town, as well as the Marsi in general, were famous for disregarding and healing the bites of serpents, and for being excellent swimmers. Its ruins at St. Benadotto present to the investigation of the curious an arena and traces of the circuit of a spacious amphitheatre.] Virg. Æn. 7, v. 750.—Sil. It. 8, v. 497.

MARS, [called Agros by the Greeks, vid. the end of this article,] the god of war among the ancients, was the son of Jupiter and Juno, according to Hesiod, Homer, and all the Greek poets, or of Juno alone, according to Ovid. This goddess, as the poet mentions, wished to become a mother without the assistance of the other sex, like Jupiter, who had produced Minerva all armed from his head, and she was shown a flower by Flora in the plains near Olenus, whose very touch made women pregnant. [vid. Juno.] The education of Mars was intrusted by Juno to the god Priapus, who instructed him in dancing and every manly exercise. His trial before the celebrated court of the Areopagus, according to the authority of some authors, for the murder of Hallrhotius, forms an interesting epoch in history. [vid. Areopagitæ.] The amours of Mars and Venus are greatly celebrated. The god of war gained the affections of Venus, and obtained the gratification of his desires; but Apollo, who was conscious of their familiarities, informed Vulcan of his wife's debaucheries, and awakened his suspicions. Vulcan secretly laid a net around the bed, and the two lovers were exposed, in each others arms, to the ridicule and satire of all the gods, till Neptune prevailed upon the husband to set them at liberty. This unfortunate discovery so provoked Mars that he changed into a cock his favourite Alectryon, whom he had stationed at the door to watch against the approach of the sun, [vid. Alectryon] and Venus also showed her resentment by persecuting with the most inveterate fury the children of Apollo. In the wars of Jupiter and the Titans, Mars was seized by Otus and Ephialtes, and confined for fifteen months, till Mercury procured him his liberty. During the Trojan war Mars interested himself on the side of the Trojans, but whilst he defended these favourites of Venus with uncommon activity, he was wounded by Diomedes and hastily retreated to heaven to conceal his confusion and his resentment, and to complain to Jupiter that Minerva had directed the unerring weapon of his antagonist. The worship of Mars was not very universal among the ancients; his temples were not numerous in Greece, but in Rome he received the most unbounded honours, and the warlike Romans were proud of paying homage to a deity whom they esteemed as the patron of their city and the father of the first of their monarchs. His most celebrated temple at Rome was built by Augustus after the battle of Philippi. It was dedicated to Mars uitor, or the avenger. His priests among the Romans were called Salii; they were first instituted by Numa, and their chief office was to guard the sacred Ancilia, one of which, as was supposed, had fallen down from heaven. Mars was generally represented in the naked figure of an old man armed with a helmet, a pike, and a shield. Sometimes he appeared in a military dress, a long flowing beard, and sometimes without. He generally rode in a chariot drawn by furious horses, which the poets call Flight and Terror. His altars were stained with the blood of the horse, on account of his warlike spirit, and of the wolf, on account of his ferocity. Magpies and vultures were also offered to him, on account of their greediness and voracity. The Scythians generally offered him asses, and the people of Caria dogs. The weed called dog-grass was sacred to him, because it grows, as it is commonly reported, in places which are fit for fields of battle, or where the ground has been stained with the effusion of human blood. The surnames of Mars are not numerous. He was called Gradivus, Mavors, Quirinus, Salisubulus, among the Romans. The Greeks called him Ares, and he was the Enyalus of the Sabines, the Camulus of the Gauls, and the Mamers of Carthage. Mars was father of Cupid, Anteros, and Harmonia, by the goddess Venus. He had Ascalaphus and Ialmenus by Astyoche; Alcippe by Agraulos; Molus, Pylus, Evenus, and Thestius, by Demonice, the daughter of Agenor. Besides these, he was the reputed father of Romulus, Remus, CEnomaus, Eythis, Thrax, Diomedes of Thrace, &c. He presided over gladiators, and was the god of hunting, and whatever exercises or amusements have something manly and warlike. Among the Romans it was usual for the consul, before he went on an expedition, to visit the temple of Mars, where he offered his prayers, and in a solemn manner shook the spear which was in the hand of the statue of the god, at the same time exclaiming, "Mars vigila! god of war, watch over the safety of this city." [We have already spoken of Mars in the remarks appended to the article Jupiter. Mythologists, however, make several of the name. The first, to whom Diodorus attributes the invention of arms, and the art of marshaling troops in battle, was the Belus whom the Scriptures call Nimrod; who after having practised his skill upon wild beasts, turned it against men, and having subdued a great number of them, called himself their king. The second Mars was an ancient king of Egypt. The third was king of Thrace, called Odin, distinguished by his valour and conquests, and promoted to the honour of god of war. The fourth is the Mars of Greece, termed Agon. The fifth and last is the Mars of the Latins. In fine, this name was given to the most warlike princes, and every country valued itself on having one, as well as a Hercules. The Greeks threw into the history of their Mars the adventures of all that have been named.] Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 231. Trist. 2, v. 925.—Hygin. fab. 143.—*Virg. MARSI, a nation of Germany, [vid. the end of this article,] who afterwards came to settle near the lake Fucinus in Italy, in a country chequered with forests abounding with wild boars, and other ferocious animals. They at first proved very inimical to the Romans, but, in process of time, they became their firmest supporters. They are particularly celebrated for the civil war in which they were engaged, and which from them has received the name of the Marsian war. The large contributions they made to support the interest of Rome, and the number of men which they continually supplied to the republic, rendered them bold and aspiring, and they claimed, with the rest of the Italian states, a share of the honour and privileges which were enjoyed by the citizens of Rome, B. C. 21. The petition, though supported by the interest, the eloquence, and the integrity of the tribune Drusus, was received with contempt by the Roman senate; and the Marsi, with their allies, showed their dissatisfaction by taking up arms. Their resentment was increased when Drusus, their friend at Rome, had been basely murdered by the means of the nobles; and they erected themselves into a republic, and Corfinium was made the capital of their new empire. A regular war was now begun, and the Romans led into the field an army of 100 000 men, and were opposed by a superior force. Some battles were fought in which the Roman generals were defeated, and the allies reaped no inconsiderable advantages from their victories. A battle, however, near Asculum, proved fatal to their cause, 4000 of them were left dead on the spot, their general Francus, a man of uncommon experience and abilities was slain, and such as escaped from the field perished by hunger in the Appenines, where they had sought a shelter. After many defeats and the loss of Asculum, one of their principal cities, the allies, grown dejected and tired of hostilities which had already continued for three years, sued for peace one by one, and tranquillity was at last re-established in the republic, and all the states of Italy were made citizens of Rome. The armies of the allies consisted of the Marsi, the Peligni, the Vestini, the Vermini, Pompeiani, Marcini, Picentese, Venusini, Frentani, Apuli, Lucani, and Samnites. The Marsi were greatly addicted to magic. [The parent race of the Marsi, if indeed we be correct in styling them so, were settled in the northern part of the territory of the Sicambri, on both sides of the Lippe, whence they spread south to the Tenthcri. Weakened by the Roman arms, they retired into the interior of Germany, and from this period disappeared from history. *Mannert. Anc. [MARSĀCI, a people who seem to have occupied what is now North-Holland. Tacit. 4, 55.]

MARSŪAS, a celebrated musician of Celæna in Phrygia, son of Olympus, or of Hyagnis, or Cægrus. [According to the Oxford Marbles, he flourished 1506 years B. C.] He was so skilful in playing on the flute, that he is generally deemed the inventor of it. According to the opinion of some, he found it when Minerva had thrown it aside on account of the distortion of her face when she played upon it. Marsyas was enamoured of Cybele, and he travelled with her as far as Nysa, where he had the imprudence to challenge Apollo to a trial of his skill as a musician. The god accepted the challenge, and it was mutually agreed that he who was defeated should be flayed alive by the conqueror. The muses, or, according to Diodorus, the inhabitants of Nysa, were appointed umpires. Each exerted his utmost skill, and the victory with much difficulty, was adjudged to Apollo. The god, upon this, tied his antagonist to a tree and flayed him alive. The death of Marsyas was universally lamented; the Fauns, Satyrs, and Dryads, wept at his fate, and from their abundant tears arose a river of Phrygia, well known by the name of Marsyas. [It seems that, in the contest above alluded to, Apollo played at first a simple air on his instrument, but Marsyas, taking up his pipe, struck the audience so much with the novelty of its tone, and the art of his performance, that he seemed to be heard with more pleasure than his rival. Having agreed upon a second trial of skill, it is said that the performance of Apollo, by his accompanying the lyre with his voice, was allowed greatly to excel that of Marsyas upon the flute alone. Marsyas with indignation protested against the decision of his judges, urging that he had not been fairly vanquished according to the rules stipulated, because the dispute was concerning the excellence of their respective instruments, not their voices; and that it was unjust to employ two arts against one. Apollo denied that he had taken any unfair advantage, since Marsyas had used both his mouth and fingers in playing on his instrument, so that if he was denied the use of his voice, he would be still more disqualified for the contention. On a third trial, Marsyas was again vanquished, and met with the fate already mentioned. It seems, that, according to Pausanias, Apollo accepted the challenge of Marsyas upon the sole condition that the victor might do what he pleased with the vanquished; and from Apuleius, it would appear that each party irritated the other previous to the contest, with severe sarcasms. Ancient writers vary in their character of Marsyas, some making him a skilful musician, and others a mere clown. Plato states that Marsyas and Olympus were the inventors of wind-music, and of the Phrygian and Lydian measures. Some make Marsyas as the author of the double flute, but others ascribe it to his father Hyagnis.] The unfortunate Marsyas is often represented on monuments as tied, his hands behind his back, to a tree, while Apollo stands before him with his lyre in his hands. In independent cities among the ancients the statue of Marsyas was generally erected in the forum, to represent the intimacy which subsisted between Bacchus and Marsyas, as the emblems of liberty. It was also erected at the entrance of the Roman forum, as a spot where usurers and merchants resorted to transact business, being principally intended in terrorem ligatorum, a circumstance to which Horace seems to allude, 1 Sat. 6, v. 120. At Celæna, the skin of Marsyas was shown to travellers for some time; it was suspended in the public place in the form of a bladder or a foot-ball. Hygin. fab. 165.—*Ovid. MARTIĀLIS, Marcus Valerius, a native of Bilbilis in Spain, who came to Rome about the 20th year of his age. [He was sent thither to study the law, but his fondness for poetical composition caused him to abandon his legal studies. His talents gained him the notice of the chief literary men at Rome.] As he was the panegyrist of the emperors, he gained the greatest honours, and was rewarded in the most liberal manner. Domitian gave him the tribuneship; but the poet, unmindful of the favours he received, after the death of his benefactor, exposed to ridicule the vices and cruelties of a monster, whom in his life-time he had extolled as the pattern of virtue, goodness, and excellence. Trajan treated the poet with coldness; and Marti-after he had passed thirty-five years in the capital of the world, in the greatest splendour and affluence, retired to his native country, where he had the mortification to be the object of malevolence, satire, and ridicule. He received some favours from his friends, and his poverty was alleviated by the liberality of Pliny the younger, whom he had panegyrized in his poems. Martial died about the 104th year of the Christian era, in the 75th year of his age. He is now well known by the fourteen books of epigrams which he wrote, and whose merit is now best described by the candid confession of the author in this li e, but the genius which he displays in some of his epigrams deserves commendation, though many critics are liberal in their censure upon his style, his thoughts, and particularly upon his puns, which are often low and despicable. In many of his epigrams the poet has shown himself a declared enemy to decency, and the book is to be read with caution which can corrupt the purity of morals, and initiate the votaries of virtue in the mysteries of vice. It has been observed of Martial, that his talent was epigrams. Every thing he did was the subject of an epigram. He wrote inscriptions upon monuments in the epigrammatic style, and even a new-year's gift was accompanied with a distich, and his poetical pen was employed in begging a favour as well as satirizing a fault. The best editions of Martial are those of Rader, fol. Mogunt, 1627, of Schriverius, 12mo. L. Bat. 1619, and of Smids, 8vo. Amst. 1701.

MARTINIÄNUS, an officer made Cæsar by Licinius, to oppose Constantine. He was put to death by order of Constantine.

MARULLUS, [a tribune of whom Plutarch makes mention in his life of Julius Cæsar. Marullus and another of his colleagues named Flavius, when the statues of Cæsar were seen adorned with royal diadems, went and tore them off. They also found out the persons who had saluted Cæsar king, and committed them to prison. The people followed with joyful acclamations, calling the tribunes Brutuses. Cæsar, highly irritated, deposed them from office.—A poet in the 5th century, who wrote a panegyric on Attila, which the barbarian requited by causing the poet and his poem to be burnt together.]

[MASCA, a river of Mesopotamia, falling into the Euphrates, and having at its mouth the city Corsote, which it surrounds in a circular course. Mannert, after a review of the several authorities which have a bearing on the subject, charges D'Anville with an error in placing the Masca too far to the west of Anatho, and in locating this latter place at too great a distance from the Chaboras, since Isidorus makes the intervening space on y 29 miles, whereas, on D'Anville's chart, it is 35 geographical miles. D'Anville also is alleged to err in giving the Euphrates too large a bend to the south-west of Anatho. The river Masca is also termed by Ptolemy the Saocoras. Mannert thinks that the Masca was nothing more than a canal from the Euphrates. Mannert. Anc. Geogr. vol. 5, p. 323.]

MASINISSA, son of Gala, was king of a small part of Africa, and assisted the Carthaginians in their wars against Rome. He proved a most indefatigable and courageous ally, but an act of generosity made him friendly to the interests of Rome. After the defeat of Asdrubal, Scipio, the first Africanus, who had obtained the victory, found among the prisoners of war one of the nephews of Masinissa. He sent him back to his uncle loaded with presents, and conducted him with a detachment for the safety and protection of his person. Masinissa was struck with the generous action of the Roman general, he forgot all former hostilities, and joined his troops to those of Scipio. This change of sentiments was not the effect of a wavering or unsettled mind, but Masinissa showed himself the most attached and the firmest ally the Romans ever had. It was to his exertions they owed many of their victories in Africa, and particularly in that battle which proved fatal to Asdrubal and Syphax. The Numidian conqueror, charmed with the beauty of Sophonisba, the captive wife of Syphax, carried her to his camp, and married her; but when he perceived that this new connection displeased Scipio, he sent poison to his wife, and recommended her to destroy herself, since he could not preserve her life in a manner which became her rank, her dignity, and fortune, without offending his Roman allies. In the battle of Zama, Masinissa greatly contributed to the defeat of the great Annibal, and the Romans, who had been so often spectators of his courage and valour, rewarded his fidelity with the kingdom of Syphax and some of the Carthaginian territories. At his death Masinissa showed the confidence he had in the Romans, and the esteem he entertained for the rising talents of Scipio Æmilianus, by entrusting him with the care of his kingdom, and empowering him to divide it among his sons. Masinissa died in the 97th year of his age, after a reign of above 60 years, 149 years before the Christian era. He experienced adversity as well as prosperity, and in the first years of his reign he was exposed to the greatest danger, and obliged often to save his life by seeking a retreat among his savage neighbours. But his alliance with the Romans was the beginning of his greatness, and he ever after lived in the greatest affluence. He is remarkable for the health he long enjoyed. In the last years of his life he was seen at the head of his armies, behaving with the most indefatigable activity, and he often remained for many successive days on horseback, without a saddle under him, or a covering upon his head, and without showing the least marks of fatigue. This strength of mind and body he chiefly owed to the temperance which he observed. He was seen eating brown bread at the door of his tent, like a private soldier, the day after he had obtained an immortal victory over the armies of Carthage. He left fifty-four sons, three of whom were legitimate, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Mastanabal. The kingdom was fairly divided among them by Scipio, and the illegitimate children received, as their portions, very valuable presents. The death of Gulussa and Mastanabal soon after left Micipsa sole master of the large possessions of Masinissa. Strab. 17.—Polyb.—Appian. Lybic.—Cic. de Senect.—*Val. MASSAGĒTÆ, [a nation of Scythia, placed by the ancient writers to the east of the river Iaxartes. Their country is supposed to answer to the modern Turkistan. The Macedonians sought for the Massagetæ in the northern regions of Asia, judging from the history of Cyrus's expedition against these barbarians, by which some definiteness was given to the position which they occupied. They missed, indeed, the true Massagetæ, but the term became a general one for the northern nations of Asia, like that of Scythia. Later writers confess their ignorance on this point.] The Massagetæ had no temples, but worshipped the sun, to whom they offered horses, on account of their swiftness. When their parents had come to a certain age they generally put them to death, and ate their flesh mixed with that of cattle. Herodot. 1, od. 3, v. 40.—Dionys Per. 738.—Herodot. 1, c. 204.—Strab. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 2.—Lucan. 3, v. 50.—Justin. 1, c. 8.

MASSICUS, [vid. Cæcubus, and Falernus.]

MASSILIA, a maritime town of Gallia Narbonensis, now called Marseilles, founded B. C. 539, by the people of Phocæa in Asia, who quitted their country to avoid the tyranny of the Persians. [Scymnus of Chios. Livy and Eusebius make it to have been founded in the reign of Tarquinus Priscus at Rome, in the beginning of the 45th Olympiad. The writer on whose authority they all rely, is supposed to be the historian Timæus.] It was celebrated for its laws, its fidelity to the Romans, and for its being long the seat of literature. [Cicero calls it the Athens of the Gauls. Livy says it was as much polished as if it had been in the midst of Greece. It was as much distinguished for its sciences and arts, as for its commerce, and also for the variety and eminence of its colonies.] It acquired great consequence by its commercial pursuits during its infancy, and even waged war against Carthage. By becoming the ally of Rome, its power was established; but in warmly espousing the cause of Pompey and Cæsar, his views were frustrated, and it was so much reduced by the insolence and resentment of the conqueror, that it never after recovered its independence and warlike spirit. Herodot. 1, c. 164.—Plin. 3, c. 4.—Justin. 37, &c.—Strab. 1.—Liv. 5, c. 3.—Horat. ep. 16.—Flor. 4, c. 2.—*Cic. MAURITANIA, [a country of Africa, on the Mediterranean, now the empire of Fes and Morocco. It was bounded on the north by the straits of Gibraltar and the Mediterranean, on the east by Numidia, on the south by Gætulia, and on the west by the Atlantic. It was, properly speaking, in the time of Bogchus the betrayer of Jugurtha, bounded by the river Mulucha, or Molochath, now Malva, and corresponded nearly to the present kingdom of Fes; but in the time of the emperor Claudius, the western part of Numidia was added to this province under the name of Mauritania Cæsariensis, the ancient kingdom of Mauritania being called Tingitana, from its principal city Tingis, or Old Tangier, on the west of the straits. vid. Mauri and Maurusii.]

MAURUS [Terentianus, a grammarian, generally supposed to have been an African by birth. The time when he flourished has been made a matter of dispute. Vossius makes him a contemporary of Martial, and to have been governor of Syene in Egypt. Terentianus declares himself a contemporary of Septimius Serenus, which latter poet Wernsdorff refers to the age of Vespasian. Terentianus, when advanced in life, wrote a poem on syllables, feet and metre, which is still extant. It may be found among the Latin Grammarians published by Putschius, Hanov. 1605, 4to. and in the Corpus Poetarum of Maittaire.]

MAUSÖLUS, a king of Caria. His wife Artemisia was so disconsolate at his death, which happened B. C. 353, that she drank up his ashes, and resolved to erect one of the grandest and most noble monuments of antiquity, to celebrate the memory of a husband whom she tenderly loved. This famous monument, which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world, was called Mausoleum, and from it all other magnificent sepulchres and tombs have received the same name. It was built by four different architects. Scopas erected the side which faced the east, Timotheus had the south, Leochares had the west, and Bruxis the north. Pithis was also employed in raising a pyramid over this stately monument, and the top was adorned by a chariot drawn by four horses. The expenses of this edifice were immense, and this gave an occasion to the philosopher Anaxagoras to exclaim, when he saw it, how much money changed into stones! vid. Artemisia. Herodot. 7, v. 99.—Strab. 14.—Diod. 16.—Paus. 3, c. 16.—Flor. 4, c. 11.—Gell. 10, c. 18.—Propert. 3, el. 2, v. 21.—*Suet. MAXENTIUS, Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a son of the emperor Maximianus Hercules. Some suppose him to have been a supposititious child. The voluntary abdication of Diocletian, and of his father, raised him in the state, and he declared himself independent emperor, or Augustus, A. D. 306. He afterwards incited his father to re-assume his imperial authority, and in a perfidious manner destroyed Severus, who had delivered himself into his hands, and relied upon his honour for the safety of his life. His victories and successes were impeded by Galerius Maximianus, who opposed him with a powerful force. The defeat and voluntarily death of Galerius soon restored peace to Italy, and Maxentius passed into Africa, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelty and oppression. He soon after returned to Rome, and was informed that Constantine was come to dethrone him. He gave his adversary battle near Rome, and after he had lost the victory, he fled back to the city. The bridge over which he crossed the Tiber was in a decayed situation, and he fell into the river and was drowned, on the 24th of September, A. D. 312. The cowardice and luxuries of Maxentius are as conspicuous as his cruelties. He oppressed his subjects with heavy taxes to gratify the cravings of his pleasures, or the avarice of his favourites. He was debauched in his manners, and neither virtue nor innocence were safe whenever he was inclined to voluptuous pursuits. He was naturally deformed, and of an unwieldy body. To visit a pleasure-ground, or to exercise himself under a marble portico, or to walk on a shady terrace, was to him a Herculean labour which required the greatest exertions of strength and resolution.

MAXIMIÄNUS, Herculus Marcus Aurelius Valerius, a native of Sirmium in Pannonia, who served as a common soldier in the Roman armies. When Diocletian had been raised to the imperial throne, he remembered the valour and courage of his fellow-soldier Maximianus, and rewarded his fidelity by making him his colleague in the empire, and by ceding to him the command of the provinces of Italy, Africa, and Spain, and the rest of the western territories of Rome. [The personal superiority of Diocletian was, however, recognized in the assumed name of Jovius, while Maximian took that of Hercules.] Maximianus showed the justness of the choice of Diocletian by his victories over the barbarians. In Britain success did not attend his arms; but in Africa he defeated and put to death Aurelius Julianus, who had proclaimed himself emperor. Soon after Diocletian abdicated the imperial purple, and obliged Maximianus to follow his example, on the 1st of April, A. D. 304. Maximianus reluctantly complied with the command of a man to whom he owed his greatness; but, before the first year of his resignation had elapsed, he was roused from his indolence and retreat by the ambition of his son Maxentius. He re-assumed the imperial dignity, and showed his ingratitude to his son by wishing him to resign the sovereignty, and to sink into a private person. This proposal was not only rejected with the contempt it deserved, but the troops mutinied against Maximianus, and he fled for safety to Gaul, to the court of Constantine, to whom he gave his daughter Fausta in marriage. Here he again acted a conspicuous character, and re-assumed the imperial power, which his misfortunes had obliged him to relinquish. This offended Constantine. But, when open violence seemed to frustrate the ambitious views of Maximianus, he had recourse to artifice. He prevailed upon his daughter Fausta, to leave the doors of her chamber open in the dead of the night; and, when she promised faithfully to execute his commands, he secretly introduced himself to her bed, where he stabbed to the heart the man who slept by the side of his daughter. This was not Constantine; Fausta, faithful to her husband, had apprized him of her father's machinations, and an eunuch had been placed in his bed. Constantine watched the motions of his father-in-law, and, when he heard the fatal blow given to the eunuch, he rushed in with a band of soldiers, and secured the assassin. Constantine resolved to destroy a man who was so inimical to his nearest relations, and nothing was left to Maximianus but to choose his own death. He strangled himself at Marseilles, A. D. 310, in the 60th year of his age. His body was found fresh and entire in a leaden coffin about the middle of the eleventh century. [This is the generally accredited account of the end of Maximian, but Gibbon represents the matter differently: he says that Maximian was delivered into the hands of his son-in-law by the treachery of his army, in consequence of which a secret and irrevocable sentence of death was pronounced against the usurper; and he obtained the favour merely of choosing his own death. It was reported that he strangled himself with his own hands.]—Galerius Valerius, a native of Dacia, who, in the first years of his life, was employed in keeping his father's flocks. He entered the army, where his valour and bodily strength recommended him to the notice of his superiors, and particularly to Diocletian, who invested him with the imperial purple in the east, and gave him his daughter Valeria in marriage. Galerius deserved the confidence of his benefactor. He conquered the Goths and Dalmatians, and checked the insolence of the Persians. In a battle, however, with the king of Persia, Galerius was defeated; and, to complete his ignominy, and render him more sensible of his disgrace, Diocletian obliged him to walk behind his chariot arrayed in his imperial robes. This humiliation stung Galerius to the quick; he assembled another army, and gave battle to the Persians. He gained a complete victory, and took the wives and children of his enemy. This success elated Galerius to such a degree, that he claimed the most dignified appellations, and ordered himself to be called the son of Mars. Diocletian himself dreaded his power, and even, it is said, abdicated the imperial dignity by means of his threats. This resignation, however, is attributed by some to a voluntary act of the mind, and to a desire of enjoying solitude and retirement. As soon as Diocletian had abdicated, Galerius was proclaimed Augustus, A. D. 304, but his cruelty soon rendered him odious, and the Roman people, offended at his oppression, raised Maxentius to the imperial dignity the following year, and Galerius was obliged to yield to the torrent of his unpopularity, and to fly before his more fortunate adversary. He died in the greatest agonies, A. D. 311. The bodily pains and sufferings which preceded his death, were, according to the Christian writers, the effects of the vengeance of an offended providence for the cruelty which he had exercised against the followers of Christ. In his character Galerius was wanton and tyrannical, and he often feasted his eyes with the sight of dying wretches whom his barbarity had delivered to bears and wild beasts. His aversion to learned men arose from his ignorance of letters; and if he was deprived of the benefits of education, he proved the more cruel and the more inexorable. Lactant. de M. P. 33.—Eusebius. 8, c. 16.

MAXIMINUS, Caius Julius Verus, the son of a peasant in Thrace. [His father was a barbarian of the Gothic nation, his mother an Alan.] He was originally a shepherd, and, by heading his countrymen against the frequent attacks of the neighbouring barbarians and robbers, he injured himself to the labours and to the fatigues of a camp. He entered the Roman armies, where he gradually rose to the first offices; and on the death of Alexander Severus he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, A. D. 235. The popularity which he had gained when general of the armies, was at an end when he ascended the throne. He was delighted with acts of the greatest barbarity, and no less than 400 persons lost their lives on the false suspicion of having conspired against the emperor's life. They died in the greatest torments; and, that the tyrant might the better entertain himself with their sufferings, some were exposed to wild beasts, others expired by blows, some were nailed on crosses, while others were shut up in the bellies of animals just killed. The noblest of the Roman citizens were the objects of his cruelty; and, as if they were more conscious than others of his mean origin, he resolved to spare no means to remove from his presence a number of men whom he looked upon with an eye of envy, and who, as he imagined, hated him for his oppression, and despised him for the poverty and obscurity of his early years. Such is the character of the suspicious and tyrannical Maximinus. In his military capacity he acted with the same ferocity; and, in an expedition in Germany, he not only cut down the corn, but he totally ruined and set fire to the whole country, to the extent of 450 miles. Such a monster of tyranny at last provoked the people of Rome. The Gordians were proclaimed emperors, but their innocent and pacific virtues were unable to resist the fury of Maximinus. After their fall, the Roman senate invested twenty men of their number with the imperial dignity, and intrusted into their hands the care of the republic. These measures so highly irritated Maximinus, that, at the first intelligence, he howled like a wild beast, and almost destroyed himself by knocking his head against the walls of his palace. When his fury was abated, he marched to Rome, resolved on slaughter. His bloody machinations were stopped, and his soldiers, ashamed of accompanying a tyrant whose cruelties had procured him the name of Busiris, Cyclops, and Phalaris, assassinated him in his tent before the walls of Aquileia, A. D. 236, in the 65th year of his age. The news of his death was received with the greatest rejoicings at Rome, public thanksgivings were offered, and whole hecatombs flamed on the altars. Maximinus has been represented by historians as of a gigantic stature, he was eight feet high, and the bracelets of his wife served as rings to adorn the fingers of his hand. His voracity was as remarkable as his corpulence, he generally ate forty pounds of flesh every day, and drank 18 bottles of wine. His strength was proportionable to his gigantic shape; he could alone draw a loaded waggon, and, with a blow of his fist, he often broke the teeth in a horse's mouth; he broke the hardest stones between his fingers, and cleft trees with his hand. Herodianus.—Jornand. de reb. Gel.—Capitol.

MAXIMUS, Magnus, a native of Spain, who proclaimed himself emperor, A. D. 383. The unpopularity of Gratian favoured his usurpation, and he was acknowledged by his troops. Gratian marched against him, but he was defeated, and soon after assassinated. Maximus refused the honours of a burial to the remains of Gratian; and, when he had made himself master of Britain, Gaul, and Spain, he sent ambassadors to the east, and demanded of the emperor Theodosius to acknowledge him as his associate on the throne. Theodosius endeavoured to amuse and delay him, but Maximus resolved to support his claim by arms, and crossed the Alps. Italy was laid desolate, and Rome opened her gates to the conqueror. Theodosius now determined to revenge the audaciousness of Maximus, and had recourse to artifice. He began to make a naval armament, and Maximus, not to appear inferior to his adversary, had already embarked his troops, when Theodosius, by secret and hastened marches, fell upon him and besieged him at Aquileia. Maximus was betrayed by his soldiers, and the conqueror, moved with compassion at the sight of his fallen and dejected enemy, granted him life, but the multitude refused him mercy, and instantly struck off his head, A. D. 388. His son Victor, who shared the imperial dignity with him, was soon after sacrificed to the fury of the soldiers. — Petronius, a Roman, descended of an illustrious family. He caused Valentinian III. to be assassinated, and ascended the throne, and, to strengthen his usurpation, he married the empress, to whom he had the weakness and imprudence to betray that he had sacrificed her husband to his love for her person. This declaration irritated the empress; she had recourse to the barbarians to avenge the death of Valentinian, and Maximus was stoned to death by his soldiers, and his body thrown into the Tiber, A. D. 455. He reigned only 77 days. — Pupianus. vid. Pupianus. — A celebrated cynic philosopher and magician of Ephesus. He instructed the emperor Julian in magic, and, according to the opinion of some historians, it was in the conversation and company of Maximus that the apostacy of Julian originated. The emperor not only visited the philosopher, but he even submitted his writings to his inspection and censure. Maximus refused to live in the court of Julian, and the emperor, not dissatisfied with the refusal, appointed him high pontiff in the province of Lydia, an office which he discharged with the greatest moderation and justice. When Julian went into the east, the philosopher promised him success, and even said that his conquests would be more numerous and extensive than those of the son of Philip. He persuaded his imperial pupil that, according to the doctrine of metempsychosis, his body was animated by the soul which once animated the hero whose greatness and victories he was going to eclipse. After the death of Julian, Maximus was almost sacrificed to the fury of the soldiers, but the interposition of his friends saved his life, and he retired to Constantinople. He was soon after accused of magical practices before the emperor Valens, and beheaded at Ephesus, A. D. 366. He wrote some philosophical and rhetorical treatises, some of which were dedicated to Julian. They are all now lost. Am-mian. — Tyrius, a Platonic philosopher in the reign of M. Aurelius. This emperor, who was naturally fond of study, became one of the pupils of Maximus, and paid great deference to his instructions. There are extant of Maximus forty-one dissertations on moral and philosophical subjects, written in Greek; the best editions of which are that of Davis, 8vo. Cantab. 1703; and that of Reiske, 2 vols. 8vo.

MECENAS or MÆCENAS, C. Cilnius, a celebrated Roman knight, descended from the kings of Etruria. He has rendered himself immortal by his liberal patronage of learned men and of letters; and to his prudence and advice Augustus acknowledged himself indebted for the security he enjoyed. His fondness for pleasure removed him from the reach of ambition, and he preferred to die, as he was born, a Roman knight, to all the honours and dignities which either the friendship of Augustus or his own popularity could heap upon him. It was from the result of his advice, against the opinion of Agrippa, that Augustus resolved to keep the supreme power in his hands, and not by a voluntary resignation to plunge Rome into civil commotions. The emperor received the private admonitions of Mecænas in the same friendly manner as they were given, and he was not displeased with the liberty of his friend, who threw a paper to him with these words, Descend from the tribunal, thou butcher! while he sat in the judgment seat, and betrayed revenge and impatience in his countenance. He was struck with the admonition, and left the tribunal without passing sentence of death on the criminals. To the interference of Mecænas, Virgil owed the restitution of his lands, and Horace was proud to boast that his learned friend had obtained his forgiveness from the emperor, for joining the cause of Brutus at the battle of Philippi. Mecænas was himself fond of literature, and, according to the most received opinion, he wrote an history of animals, a journal of the life of Augustus, a treatise on the different natures and kinds of precious stones, besides the two tragedies of Octavia and Prometheus, and other things, all now lost. He died eight years before Christ; and, on his death-bed he particularly recommended his poetical friend Horace to the care and confidence of Augustus. Seneca, who has liberally commended the genius and abilities of Mecænas, has not withheld his censure from his dissipation, indolence, and effeminate luxury. From the patronage and encouragement which the princes of heroic and lyric poetry.

among the Latins received from the favourite of Augustus, all patrons of literature have ever since been called Mecænales. Virgil dedicated to him his Georgics, and Horace his odes. Suet. in Aug. 66, &c.—Plut. in Aug.—Herodian. 7.—Senec. ep. 19 and 92.

MECHANÆUS, a surname of Jupiter, from his patronizing undertakings. He had a statue near the temple of Ceres at Argos, and there the people swore, before they went to the Trojan war, either to conquer or perish. Paus. 2, c. 22.

MEDÆA, a celebrated magician, daughter of Æetes, king of Colchis. Her mother's name, according to the more received opinion, of Hesoid and Hyginus, was Idyia, or, according to others, Ephyre, Hecate, Astero-dia, Antiope, and Neræa. She was the niece of Circe. When Jason came to Colchis in quest of the golden fleece, Medea became enamoured of him, and it was to her well directed labours that the Argonauts owed their preservation. [vid. Jason and Argonautæ.] Medea had an interview with her lover in the temple of Hecate, where they bound themselves by the most solemn oaths, and mutually promised eternal fidelity. No sooner had Jason overcome all the difficulties which Æetes had placed in his way, than Medea embarked with the conquerors for Greece. To stop the pursuit of her father she tore to pieces her brother Apsyrtus, and left his mangled limbs in the way through which Æetes was to pass. This act of barbarity some have attributed to Jason, and not to her. When Jason reached Iolchos, his native country, the return and victories of the Argonauts were celebrated with universal rejoicings; but Æson, the father of Jason, was unable to assist at the solemnity, on account of the infirmities of his age. Medea, at her husband's request, removed the weakness of Æson, and by drawing away the blood from his veins, and filling them again with the juice of certain herbs, she restored to him the vigour and sprightliness of youth. This sudden change in Æson astonished the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias were also desirous to see their father restored, by the same power, to the vigour of youth. Medea, willing to revenge the injuries which her husband's family had suffered from Pelias, increased their curiosity, and by cutting to pieces an old ram and making it again, in their presence, a young lamb, she totally determined them to try the same experiment upon their father's body. They accordingly killed him of their own accord, and boiled his flesh in a caldron, but Medea refused to perform the same friendly offices to Pelias which she had done to Æson, and he was consumed by the heat of the fire, and even deprived of a burial. This action greatly irritated the people of Iolchos; and Medea, with her husband, fled to Corinth to avoid the resentment of an offended populace. Here they lived for ten years with much conjugal tenderness; but the love of Jason for Glaucæ, the king's daughter, soon interrupted their mutual harmony, and Medea was divorced. Medea revenged the infidelity of Jason by causing the death of Glauce, and the destruction of her family. [vid. Glauce.] This action was followed by another still more atrocious. Medea killed two of her children in their father's presence, and, when Jason attempted to punish the barbarity of the mother, she fled through the air upon a chariot drawn by winged dragons. From Corinth Medea came to Athens, where, after she had undergone the necessary purification of her murder, she married King Ægeus, or, according to others, lived in an adulterous manner with him. From her connection with Ægeus, Medea had a son, who was called Medas. Soon after, when Theseus wished to make himself known to his father, [vid. Ægeus.] Medea, jealous of his fame, and fearful of his power, attempted to poison him at a feast which had been prepared for his entertainment. Her attempts, however, failed of success, and the sight of his sword, which Theseus wore by his side, convinced Ægeus that the stranger against whose life he had so basely conspired was no less than his own son. The father and the son were soon reconciled, and Medea, to avoid the punishment which her wickedness deserved, mounted her fiery chariot, and disappeared through the air. She came to Colchis, where, according to some, she was reconciled to Jason, who had sought her in her native country after her sudden departure from Corinth. She died at Colchis, as Justin mentions, when she had been restored to the confidence of her family. After death she married Achilles in the Elysian fields, according to the traditions mentioned by Simonides. The murder of Mermerus and Phereus, the youngest of Jason's children by Medea, is not attributed to their mother, according to Ælian, but the Corinthians themselves assassinated them in the temple of Juno Acræa. To avoid the resentment of the gods, and to deliver themselves from the pestilence which visited their country after so horrid a massacre, they engaged the poet Euripides, for five talents, to write a tragedy, which cleared them of the murder, and represented Medea as the cruel assassin of her own children. And besides, that this opinion might be the better credited, festivals were appointed, in which the mother was represented with all the barbarity of a fury murdering her own sons. [*vid. MEDIA, [an extensive country of Asia, bounded by Assyria on the west, and separated from Armenia by the river Araxes; bounded on the north by the southern shore of the Caspian, on the east by Hyrcania and Aria, and on the south by Persis and Susiana. It is now called Irak Adjami, or Persian Irak, to distinguish it from Irak Arabi, or Babylonian Irak. That part of Media which borders on Armenia, was called Atropatene, from Atropates, a satrap of this province, who erected it after the death of Alexander into an independent kingdom. The northern parts of Media, lying between the Caspian mountains and the sea, are very cold and barren. The present inhabitants make their bread of dried almonds, and their drink of the juice of certain herbs. The snow lies on the mountains for nine months in the year, But the southern parts produce all sorts of grain, and necessaries of life, and are so pleasant that the country adjoining to Tauris, probably the ancient Ecbatana, has been called the garden of Persia. The Medes are said to have sprung from Madai, the third son of Japhet.] The province of Media was first raised into a kingdom by its revolt from the Assyrian monarchy, B. C. 820; and, after it had for some time enjoyed a kind of republican government, Dejoyes, by his artifice, procured himself to be called king, 700 B. C. After a reign of 53 years he was succeeded by Phraotes, B. C. 647; who was succeeded by Cyaxares, B. C. 625. His successor was Astyages, B. C. 585, in whose reign Cyrus became master of Media, B. C. 551, and ever after the empire was transferred to the Persians. The Medes were warlike in the primitive ages of their power; they encouraged polygamy, and were remarkable for the homage which they paid to their sovereigns, who were styled kings of kings. This title was afterwards adopted by their conquerors, the Persians, and it was still in use in the age of the Roman emperors. Justin. 1, c. 5.—Herodot. 1, &c.—Polyb. 5 and 10.—Curt. 5, &c.—*Diod. MEDIOLANUM, [a city of Cisalpine Gaul, among the Insubres, now Milan. It is situate on the small river Olonæ, in a beautiful plain between the Ticinus or Tesino, and the Addua or Adda. In the vicinity of this city, to the west, D'Anville and others locate the Raudii Campi, where Marius defeated the Cimbrî; but Mannert places them near Verona. Mediolanum became in the course of time a very flourishing city, and was honoured with the appellation of "the new Athens." Under the later Roman emperors it was enclosed with a double wall, adorned with public buildings, and in it was established the gold and silver coinage of the north of Italy. In the third and fourth centuries, the frequent inroads of the barbarians of the north compelled the emperors to select as a place of arms some city nearer the scene of action than Rome was. The choice fell on Mediolanum. Here too Maximian resigned the imperial diadem, and the famous St. Ambrose established the see of a bishopric. Although subsequently plundered by Attila, it soon revived, and under Odoacer became the imperial residence. In its vicinity was fought the battle which put Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, in possession of Italy, and Mediolanum under this prince became second only to Rome. It met with its downfall, however.

when, having sided with Belisarius, and been besieged by the Goths and Burgundians, it was taken by the latter, and 300,000 of the inhabitants, according to Procopius, were put to the sword. It never, after this severe blow, regained its former eminence, although, in the middle ages, it became a flourishing and opulent place of trade.] Liv. 5, c. 34, l. 34, c. 46. —Aulercorum, a town of Gaul, now Evreux in Normandy. —Santonum, another, now Saintes in Guienne.

MEDITERRANÆUM MARE, a sea which divides Europe and Asia Minor from Africa. [It is 2000 miles long and between 400 and 500 broad, and contains about 900,000 square miles. vid. the end of this article.] It receives its name from its situation, medio terræ, situate in the middle of the land. It has a communication with the Atlantic by the columns of Hercules, and with the Euxine through the Ægean. The word Mediterranæum does not occur in the classics; but it is sometimes called internum, nostrum, or medius liquor, and is frequently denominated in Scripture the Great Sea. The first naval power that ever obtained the command of it, as recorded in the fabulous epochs of the writer Castor, is Crete under Minos. Afterwards it passed into the hands of the Lydiæns, B. C. 1179; of the Pelagæi, 1058; of the Thracians, 1000; of the Rhodiæns, 916; of the Phrygiæns, 893; of the Cypriæns, 868; of the Phœniciæns, 826; of the Egyptiæns, 787; of the Milesiæns, 753; of the Cariæns, 734; and of the Lesbiæns, 676; which they retained for 69 years. [According to the learned Buffon, the Mediterranean Sea was originally a lake of small extent, and had received, in remote ages, a sudden and prodigious increase, at the time when the Black Sea opened a passage for itself through the Bosporus, and at that period when the sinking of the land which united Europe to Africa, in the part that is now the straits of Gibraltar, permitted the water of the ocean to rush in. It was also his opinion, that most of the islands of the Mediterranean made part of the continent, before the great convulsions that have taken place in this quarter. Sonnini, at his request, and with a view to ascertain the correctness of this opinion, sounded the depth of the sea between Sicily and Malta, and found it from 25 to 30 fathoms, and, in the middle of the channel where the water is deepest, never exceeding 100 fathoms. On the other hand, between the island of Malta and Cape Bon in Africa there is less water, the lead indicating no more than from 25 to 30 fathoms throughout the whole breadth of the channel which separates the two lands. The Mediterranean Sea likewise afforded a very frequent topic of consideration to the ancient writers. Democritus, Diogenes, and others maintained that its waters kept constantly decreasing, and would eventually all disappear. Aristotle (Meteor. 2, c. 3,) held to the opinion that the Mediterranean had at one time covered a large part of Africa and Egypt, and had extended inland as far as the temple of Jupiter Ammon. This doctrine was maintained also by Xanthus the Lydian, Strato, and Eratosthenes, according to Strabo, (Lib. 1, pp. 38, 49, 50.) The ancients appear to have been led to this conclusion by observing in various parts of Africa and Egypt manifest traces and indications of the sea. They found here shells, pebbles evidently rounded or worn smooth by the action of water, incrustations of salt, and many salt lakes. Some of these appearances were particularly frequent on the route through the desert to the temple of Ammon. The authorities on this head are deserving of examination and are as follows: Herod. 2, c. 12.—Plut. de Is. et Os.—Strabo. Lib. 13, p. 309.—Mela, 1, c. 6.—Solin. c. 26.—Seidel. ad Eratosth. fragm. p. 28.—The ancient writers maintained that the temple and oracle of Ammon never could have become so famous if the only approach to them had always been over vast and dangerous deserts. They insisted that the Oases had all originally been islands in the earlier and more widely extended Mediterranean. In this remote period, according to them, there existed as yet no communication between the Pontus Euxinus and Mediterranean Sea, (vid. Lectonia) nor between the latter and the Atlantic. The isthmus connecting Arabia with Egypt was under water, and Eratosthenes believed that Menelaus had sailed over this narrow passage, which is now the isthmus of Suez. When the waters of the Euxine forced a passage into the Mediterranean, the great influx of water opened another outlet for itself through what were called by the ancients the Pillars of Hercules, Spain and Africa having been previously joined. In this tremendous convulsion the ancient land of Lectonia is thought to have been inundated, and to have sunk in the sea, leaving merely the islands of the Archipelago, its mountain tops, to attest its former existence. According to Diodorus Siculus, (Lib. 5, c. 47,) the inhabitants of Samothece had a tradition that a great part of their island, as well as of Asia, was ravaged and laid under water by this inundation, and that in fishing near their island fragments of temples and other buildings were frequently rescued from the waves. (Compare Diod. Sic. Lib. 5, c. 82.—Strabo. Lib. 1, p. 85.—Plato de Legg. 3, p. 677. ed Bip. T. 8, p. 106.—Plin. 2, c. 80.—Philo de mund. non corrup. p. 959.) It is curious to examine, in conjunction with what has been stated, the accounts given by some ancient writers, of Delos and Rhodes having emerged from the waves when the inundation had partially subsided, (Philo. ubi supra), of an anchor having been found on the site of the ancient Ancyra, in Asia M.

nor, far inland, and whence the place received its name, (Pausan. 1, 4, c. 2.—Aristid. Aegypt. T. 2. p. 351. ed. Jebb.) and also what is stated by an Oriental writer (Hadgi-Kalfah. p. 1789, Malte-Brun's Geogr. vol. 2, p. 73.) that the mountains south of Trebisond, in the interior of the country, have, on their summits, rings of iron, to which the inhabitants say that the cables of vessels were attached at the time when the Black Sea, from the want of an outlet, stood at that high level. If there be any truth in the authorities which have been advanced, a basis stands ready on which may be erected the superstructure of a very plausible theory. The Mediterranean may originally have stood at a much higher level than at present, and have extended far inland over the present continent of Africa. The vast accession of water, suddenly received from the Euxine bursting its barriers at the Hellespont, would at first have carried the waves of the Mediterranean still farther onwards over the African continent, until at length, the Pillars of Hercules being formed, or in other and plainer language, Spain and Africa having been rent asunder, and the land of Lætonia being at the same time engulfed, the waters of the Mediterranean would gradually abandon even a large portion of their ancient bed, and the northern part of the continent of Africa would rise to the view. It is no mean argument in favour of the hypothesis which is here advanced, that, if we turn our eyes to the interior of Africa, as far as European discovery has penetrated, we find a succession of vast plains, covered with sand and gravel, with a mixture of sea shells, and incrustated with crystallizations, looking like the basins of evaporated seas. "Shells, crystals of sea-salt, and brackish waters are found every where," observes Malte Brun, "even to the centre of Africa." In other parts we perceive vast plains of a marshy nature, and covered with stagnant lakes. In what is called the valley of the wilderness, sea-salt is found in thin compact layers supported by strata of gypsum. In many of the surrounding deserts this salt is very common, sometimes crystallized under the sand, sometimes on the surface. It is asserted also, by ancient authorities, that the Delta of Egypt was originally covered with the waters of the sea. This is expressly stated by Herodotus (2, c. v. comp. c. 15.) "Any man of understanding," observes the historian, "will easily perceive at sight, though he had never heard these things, that those parts of Egypt which the Greeks frequent with their shipping, are an accession of land bestowed upon the Egyptians by the river, and so is all that country which men see beyond the lake during a passage of three days." This opinion of the formation of the Delta was adopted by all the ancients, and has been received by a great part of the moderns. If it be true, all the country from Memphis to the Mediterranean must have been formerly a gulf at least of the Mediterranean parallel to the Arabian gulf. Shaw says that the black mud appears by soundings at the distance of twenty leagues, and to the same effect is the testimony of Pococke and later travellers. To those who set any value upon etymological researches, an argument from this source in support of the hypothesis which has been advanced, may be adduced with no little appearance of probability on its side. The Greeks termed the continent of Africa Libya, (Λιβυή), and the wind which blows from that quarter, (i. e. the south-west with reference to Greece, but more especially her Asiatic colonies,) they designated by the name of Lips (Λιψή). May not the root of both these terms be the older Greek form Λιπα, (Lipo) "to leave," and Libya hence denote the country left by the waves, the ancient bed of an ocean subsequently dried up or removed? Nor let this etymology be deemed a fanciful one. Precisely the same derivation is given by the scholiast to the word Λιψή in his comments on the 230th line of the Pærsæ of Æschylus, although in support of a different opinion, which has nothing to do with the present discussion, but has reference to the western regions of the world, where the sun sets, i. e. where his light fails.] Horat. 3, od. 3, v. 46.—Plin. 2, c. 68.—*Sallust. MEDITRINA, the goddess of medicines, whose festivals, called Meditrinalia, were celebrated at Rome the last day of September, when they made offerings of fruits. Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.

MEDOACUS or MEDUACUS, [the name of two rivers in Italy, which rise in the territory of the Euganei, and fall into the Adriatic below Venice. They were distinguished by the epithets Major and Minor. The former is now the Brenta, the latter the Bachiglione: on the latter stands Patavium, or Padua.] Liv. 10, c. 2.

MEDON, son of Codrus the 17th and last king of Athens, was the first archon that was appointed with regal authority, B. C. 1070. In the election Medon was preferred to his brother Neleus, by the oracle of Delphi, and he rendered himself popular by the justice and moderation of his administration. His successors were called from him Medontidæ, and the office of archon remained for above 200 years in the family of Codrus under 12 perpetual archons. Paus. 7, c. 2.—Patere. 2, c. 2.—A statuery of Lacedæmon, who made a famous statue of Minerva, seen in the temple of Juno at Olympia. Paus. 7, c. 17.

MEDUACUS, [vid. Medoacus.]

MEDUANA, a river of Gaul, flowing into the Ligeris, now the Mayne. Lucan. 1, v. 438.

MEDUS, now Kur, a river of Media, falling into the Araxes. Some take Medus adjectively, as applying to any of the great rivers of Media. Strab. 15.—Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 21.—A son of Ægeus and Medea, who gave his name to a country of Asia. Medus, when arrived to years of maturity, went to seek his mother, whom the arrival of Theseus in Athens had driven away. [vid. Medea.] He came to Colchis, where he was seized by his uncle Perses, who usurped the throne of Æetes, his mother's father, because the oracle had declared that Perses should be murdered by one of the grandsons of Æetes. Medus assumed another name, and called himself Hippotes, son of Creon. Meanwhile Medea arrived at Colchis, disguised in the habit of a priestess of Diana, and when she heard that one of Creon's children was imprisoned, she resolved to hasten the destruction of a person whose family she detested. To effect this with more certainty she told the usurper, that Hippotes was really a son of Medea, sent by his mother to murder him. She begged Perses to give her Hippotes, that she might sacrifice him to her resentment. Perses consented. Medea discovered that it was her own son, and she instantly armed him with the dagger which she had prepared against his life, and ordered him to stab the usurper. He obeyed, and Medea discovered who he was and made her son Medus sit on his grandfather's throne. Hesiod. Theog.—Paus. 2.—Apollod. 1.—Justin. 42.—Senec. in Med.—Diod.

MEDŪSA, one of the three Gorgons, daughter of Phorcys and Ceto. She was the only one of the Gorgons who was subject to mortality. She is celebrated for her personal charms and the beauty of her locks. Neptune became enamoured of her, and obtained her favours in the temple of Minerva. This violation of the sanctity of the temple provoked Minerva, and she changed the beautiful locks of Medusa, which had inspired Neptune's love, into serpents. According to Apollodorus and others, Medusa and her sisters came into the world with snakes on their heads, instead of hair, with yellow wings and brazen hands. Their body was also covered with impenetrable scales, and their very looks had the power of killing or turning to stones. Perseus rendered his name immortal by the conquest of Medusa. He cut off her head, and the blood that dropped from the wound produced the innumerable serpents that infest Africa. The conqueror placed Medusa's head on the ægis of Minerva, which he had used in his expedition. The head still retained the same petrifying power as before, as it was fatally known in the court of Cepheus. [vid. Andromeda.] Some suppose, that the Gorgons were a nation of women, whom Perseus conquered. (vid. Gorgones.) *Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Hesiod. Theog.—Ovid. MEGABYZUS, one of the noble Persians who conspired against the usurper Smerdis. He was set over an army in Europe by king Darius, where he took Perinthus and conquered all Thrace. He was greatly esteemed by his sovereign. Herodot. 3, &c.—A satrap of Artaxerxes. He revolted from his king, and defeated two large armies that had been sent against him. The interference of his friends restored him to the king's favour, and he showed his attachment to Artaxerxes by killing a lion which threatened his life in hunting. This act of affection in Megabyzus was looked upon with envy by the king. He was discarded, and afterwards reconciled to the monarch by means of his mother. He died in the 76th year of his age, B. C. 447, greatly regretted Ctesias.

MEGACLES, an Athenian archon who involved the greatest part of the Athenians in the sacrilege which was committed in the conspiracy of Cylon. Plut. in Sol.

MEGÆRA, one of the furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron. The word is derived from μεγαλῆρ, invidere, odisse, and she is represented as employed by the gods like her sisters to punish the crimes of mankind, by visiting them with diseases, with inward torments, and with death. Virg. Æn. 12, v. 346. [vid. Eumenides.]

MEGÆLE, the Greek name of Cybele, the mother of the gods, whose festivals were called Megalesia.

MEGALESIA, games in honour of Cybele, instituted by the Phrygians, and introduced at Rome in the second Punic war, when the statue of the goddess was brought from Pessinus. Liv. 29, c. 14.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 337.

MEGALIA, a small island of Campania, near Neapolis. Stat. 2. Sylv. v. 80.

MEGALOPŌLIS, a town of Arcadia, in Peloponnesus, built by Epaminondas, [as a check upon the Spartans.] It was taken by Cleomenes, king of Sparta. [The inhabitants thereupon retired to Messenia. They afterwards returned to Arcadia, and, by the advice and urging of Philopœmen, they rebuilt their city. Polybius states, that, next to Athens, it was the most splendid city of Greece. It is now Leondari.] Strab. 8.—Paus. 9, c. 14.—Liv. 28, c. 8.

MEGANĪDA, the wife of Celeus, king of Eleusis in Attica. She was mother of Trip- tolemus, to whom Ceres, as she travelled over Attica, taught agriculture. She received divine honours after death, and she had an altar raised to her near the fountain where Ceres had first been seen when she arrived in Attica. Paus. 1, c. 39.

MEGĀRA, a daughter of Creon, king of Thebes, given in marriage to Hercules because he had delivered the Thebans from the tyranny of the Orchomenians. (vid. Erginus.) When Hercules went to hell by order of Eurystheus, violence was offered to Megara by Lycus, a Theban exile, and she would have yielded to her ravisher, had not Hercules returned that moment and punished him with death. This murder displeased Juno, and she rendered Hercules so delirious, that he killed Megara and the three children he had by her in a fit of madness, thinking them to be wild beast. Some say that Megara did not perish by the hand of her husband, but that he afterwards married her to his friend Iolas. The names of Megara's children by Hercules were Creontides, Therimachus, and Deicoon. Hygin. fab. 82.—Senec. in Herc.—Apollod. 2, c. 6.—Diod. 4.

MEGĀRA, (æ, and pl. orum.) a city of Achaia, the capital of a country called Megaris, founded about 1131 B. C. It is situate nearly at an equal distance from Corinth and Athens, on the Sinus Saronicus. It was built upon two rocks, and is still in being, and preserves its ancient name. [It was originally called Nysa, and derived its name of Megara either from Megarius, the surname of Minos, a Bœotian chief who succeeded the king of Nisa, or from Megara, the name given to ancient temples erected in honour of Ceres, or from Megara, a supposed wife of Hercules. Under the reign of Codrus, the Peloponnesians, having declared war against the Athenians, and miscarried in their enterprise, returned and took possession of Megara, which they peopled with Corinthians.] At the battle of Salamis the people of Megara furnished 20 ships for the defence of Greece, and at Plataea they had 300 men in the army of Pausanias. There was here a sect of philosophers called the Megaric, who held the world to be eternal. [vid. Euclid and Eubulides.] *Cic. MEGASTHĒNES, a Greek historian about 300 years before Christ. [He was sent by Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria, to Palibothra in India, to renew and confirm a previous treaty with Sandrocottus, monarch of the Prasi. He remained there many years, and after his return, he wrote, under the title of Indica (Indica), an account of whatever he had seen or heard during his travels. His work is lost; but Strabo, Josephus, Arrian, and Elian have preserved some fragments of it. He was the first who made the western nations acquainted with the countries beyond the Ganges, and with the manners of their inhabitants. Strabo has decried him as a fabulous writer, but often unjustly; and Robertson, on the other hand, has acknowledged the utility and justice of many of the observations made by Megasthenes.]

MEGISTA, an island of Lycia, with a harbour of the same name. Liv. 37, c. 22.

MEGISTIAS, a soothsayer, who told the Spartans that defended Thermopylae, that they all should perish, &c. Herodot. 7, c. 219, &c.

MELA POMPONIVS, [a Spaniard who flourished in the reign of the emperor Claudius. He wrote a compendium of geography which is still extant. He follows closely his Grecian predecessors, especially Eratosthenes. He who is acquainted with the system of the latter will be able easily to comprehend the work of Mela, but without this previous knowledge will find him extremely obscure. In the geography of the north-western parts of Europe, he improves upon the statements of the older geographers, in consequence of the discoveries of the Romans in this quarter.] His work is divided into three books. The best editions of this book, called de situ orbis, are those of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1722, and Reinhold, 4to. Eton, 1761.

MELAMPUS, a celebrated soothsayer and physician of Argos, son of Amythaon and Idomeneia, or Dorippe. He lived at Pylos in Peloponnesus. His servants once killed two large serpents who had made their nests at the bottom of a large oak, and Melampus paid so much regard to these two reptiles, that he raised a burning pile and burned them upon it. He also took particular care of their young ones, and fed them with milk. Some time after this the young serpents crept to Melampus as he slept on the grass near the oak, and, as if sensible of the favours of their benefactor, they wantonly played around him, and softly licked his ears. This awoke Melampus, who was astonished at the sudden change which his senses had undergone. He found himself acquainted with the chirping of the birds, and with all their rude notes, as they flew around him. He took advantage of this supernatural gift, and soon made himself perfect in the knowledge of futurity, and Apollo also instructed him in the art of medicine. He had soon after the happiness of curing the daughters of Prætus, by giving them ellebore, which, from this circumstance, has been called melampodium, and as a reward for his trouble he married the eldest of these princesses. (vid. Prætidæ.) The tyranny of his uncle Neleus, king of Pylos, obliged him to leave his native country, and Prætus, to show himself more sensible of his services, gave him part of his kingdom, over which he established himself. About this time the personal charms of Pero, the daughter of Neleus, had gained many admirers, but the father promised his daughter only to him who brought into his hands the oxen of Iphiclus. This condition displeased many; but Bias, who was also one of her admirers, engaged his brother Melampus to steal the oxen, and deliver them to him. Melampus was caught in the attempt, and imprisoned, and nothing but his services as a soothsayer and physician to Iphiclus would have saved him from death. All this pleaded in favour of Melampus, but when he had taught the childless Iphiclus how to become a father, he not only obtained his liberty, but also the oxen, and with them he compelled Neleus to give Pero in marriage to Bias. A severe distemper, which had rendered the women of Argos insane, was totally removed by Melampus; and Anaxagoras, who then sat on the throne, rewarded his merit by giving him part of his kingdom, where he established himself, and where his posterity reigned during six successive generations. He received divine honours after death, and temples were raised to his memory. Homæ. Od.

MELANCHLËNI, a people near the Cimmerian Bosphorus, [so called from their black garments. Mannert conjectures them to have been the progenitors of the modern Russians.]

MELANIPPE, a daughter of Æolus, who had two children by Neptune, for which her father put out both her eyes, and confined her in a prison. Her children, who had been exposed and preserved, delivered her from confinement, and Neptune restored her to her eyesight. She afterwards married Metapoutus. Hygin. fab. 186.

MELANIPPIDES, a Greek poet about 520 years before Christ. His grandson of the same name flourished about 60 years after at the court of Perdiccas the second, of Macedonia. Some fragments of their poetry are extant.

MELANIPPUS, a son of Astacus, one of the Theban chiefs who defended the gate of Thebes against the army of Adrastus king of Argos. He was opposed by Tydeus, whom he slightly wounded, and at last was killed by Amphiaraus, who carried his head to Tydeus. Tydeus, to take revenge of the wound he had received, bit the head with such barbarity, that he swallowed the brains, and Minerva, offended with his conduct, took away the herb which he had given him to cure his wound, and he died. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Æschyl. ante Théb.—Paus. 9, c. 18.

MELANTHIUS, a man who wrote an history of Attica.—A famous painter of Sicily. Plin. 35.—A tragic poet of a very malevolent disposition, in the age of Phocion. Plut.

MELANTHUS, Melantes, or Melanthius, a son of Andropomus, whose ancestors were kings of Pylos. He was driven from his paternal kingdom by the Heraclidæ, and came to Athens, where king Thymætus resigned the crown to him, provided he fought a battle against Xanthus, a general of the Bœotians, who made war against him. He fought and conquered, (vid. Apaturia,) and his family, surnamed the Neleidae, sat on the throne of Athens till the age of Codrus. He succeeded to the crown 1128 years B. C. and reigned 37 years. Paus. 2, c. 18.

MELAS, (æ) a river of Thrace, at the west of the Thracian Chersonesus.—Another in Thessaly, [near Heraclea.]—in Achaia, —in Bœotia, [empty into the Cephisus,] —in Sicily, —in Ionia, —in Cappadocia, [rising near Cæsarea ad Argæum, and falling into the Euphrates near the city of Melitene. It is now called by the Turks Kara-Sou, or "the black water."]

MELDÆ, or Meldorum urbs, a city of Gaul, now Meaux in Champagne.

MELEAGER, a celebrated hero of antiquity, son of CENEUS king of Ætolia by Althæa, daughter of Thestius. The Parcæ were present at the moment of his birth, and predicted his future greatness. Clotho said that he would be brave and courageous; Lachesis foretold his uncommon strength; and Atropos declared that he should live as long as a fire-brand, which was on the fire, remained entire and unconsumed. Althæa no sooner heard this, than she snatched the stick from the fire, and kept it with the most jealous care, as the life of her son was destined to depend upon its preservation. The fame of Meleager increased with his years; he signalized himself in the Argonautic expedition, and afterwards delivered his country from the neighbouring inhabitants, who made war against his father at the instigation of Diana, whose altars CENEUS had neglected. (vid. CENEUS.) No sooner were they destroyed, than Diana punished the negligence of CENEUS by a greater calamity. She sent a huge wild boar, which laid waste all the country, and seemed invincible on account of its immense size. It became soon a public concern; all the neighbouring princes assembled to destroy this terrible animal, and nothing became more famous in mythological history than the hunting of the Calydonian boar. The princes and chiefs who assembled, and who are mentioned by mythologists, are Meleager, son of CENEUS, Idas and Lynceus, sons of Aphareus, Dryas son of Mars, Castor and Pollux sons of Jupiter and Leda, Pirithous son of Ixion, Theseus son of Ægeus, Anceus and Cepheus sons of Lycurgus, Admetus son of Pheres, Jason son of Æson, Pelæus and Telamon sons of Æacus, Iphicles son of Amphitryon, Eurytrion son of Actor, Atalanta daughter of Schœneus, Iolas the friend of Hercules, the sons of Thestius, Amphiaraus son of Oileus, Protheus, Cometes, the brothers of Althæa, Hippothous son of Cercyon, Leucippus, Adrastus, CENEUS, Phileus, Echeon, Lelex, Phoenix son of Amyntor, Panopeus, Hyleus, Hippasus, Nestor, Menœtius, the father of Patroclus, Amphicides, Laertes the father of Ulysses, and the four sons of Hippocoon. This troop of armed men attacked the boar with unusual fury, and it was at last killed by Meleager. The conqueror gave the skin and the head to Atalanta, who had first wounded the animal. This partiality to a woman irritated the others, and particularly Toxeus and Plexippus, the brothers of Althæa, and they endeavoured to rob Atalanta of the honourable present. Meleager defended a woman of whom he was enamoured, and killed his uncles in the attempt. Meantime the news of this celebrated conquest had already reached Calydon, and Althæa went to the temple of the gods to return thanks for the victory which her son had gained. As she went she met the corpses of her brothers that were brought from the chase, and at this mournful spectacle she filled the whole city with her lamentations. She was upon this informed that they had been killed by Meleager, and in the moment of resentment, to revenge the death of her brothers, she threw into the fire the fatal stick on which her son's life depended, and Meleager died as soon as it was consumed. Homer does not mention the fire-brand, whence some have imagined that this fable is posterior to that poet's age. But he says that the death of Toxeus and Plexippus so irritated Althæa, that she uttered the most horrible curses and imprecations upon the head of her son. Meleager married Cleopatra, the daughter of Idas and Marpessa, as also Atalanta, according to some accounts. Apollod. 1, c. 8.—Apollon. 1, arg. 1, v. 997. l. 3, v. 518.—Flacc. 1 and 6.—Paus. 10, c. 31.—Hygin. 14.—*Ovid. —A general, who supported Aridæus when he had been made king after the death of his brother Alexander the Great.—A brother of Ptolemy, made king of Macedonia B. C. 280 years. He was but two months invested with the regal authority.—A Greek poet in the reign of Seleucus the last of the Seleucidæ. He was born at Tyre and died at Cos [He was the first who made a collection of the short poems called by the Greeks epigrams. Of these he formed two sets, under the title of "Anthologia," the first of which was a lamentable proof of the licentiousness of the age; the second, consisting of miscellaneous pieces, has formed the basis of the later Anthologies of Agathæas and Planudes. Many of the poems are the work of Meleager, and possess much elegance.] The best edition of the Anthologia is that of Brunck, in 3 vols. 8vo. Argentorati, 1772. [Brunck's edition of the Analecta has been re-published by Jacobs, with a copious and most valuable commentary, in 12 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1774-1803.—A very valuable edition of the Anthology appeared also in 1795-7, in 4to. edited by De Bosch, with a Latin metrical version by Grotius annexed.]

MÉLAGRIDES, the sisters of Meleager, daughters of Cæneus and Althæa. They were so disconsolate at the death of their brother Meleager, that they refused all aliments, and were, at the point of death, changed into birds called Meleagrides, whose feathers and eggs, as it is supposed, are of a different colour. The youngest of the sisters, Gorge and Dejanira, who had been married, escaped this metamorphosis. Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 540.—Plin. 10, c. 26.

MELES, (Étis), a river of Asia Minor, in Ionia near Smyrna. Some of the ancients supposed that Homer was born on the banks of that river, from which circumstance they call him Melesigenes, and his compositions Meletæa charta. It is even supposed that he composed his poems in a cave near the source of that river. Strab. 12.—Stat. 2.—Sylv. 7, v. 34.—Tibul. 4, el. 1, v. 201.—Paus. 7, c. 5.—A king of Lydia, who succeeded his father Alyattes, about 747 years before Christ. MELESGÈNES, or MELESIGÈNA, a name given to Homer. vid. Meles.

MÉLIBEÀ, a maritime town of Magnesia in Thessaly, at the foot of Mount Ossa, famous for dying wool. [Authors differ about the precise situation of this city. Strabo places it on a gulf between Mount Ossa to the north, and Mount Pelion. This is the place assigned it by D'Anville.] The epithet of Melibæus is applied to Philoctetes because he resided there. *Virg. MELIBEÀ, a shepherd introduced in Virgil's eclogues.

MÉLICERTA, MELICERTES, or MELICERTUS, a son of Athamas and Ino. He was saved by his mother from the fury of his father, who prepared to dash him against a wall as he had done his brother Learchus. The mother was so terrified that she threw herself into the sea with Melicerta in her arms. Neptune had compassion on the misfortunes of Ino and her son, and changed them both into sea-deities. Ino was called Leucothoe or Matuta, and Melicerta was known among the Greeks by the name of Palæmon, and among the Latins by that of Portumnus. Some suppose that the Isthmian games were in honour of Melicerta. vid. Isthmia. Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 4.—Paus. 1, c. 44.—Hygin. fab. 1 and 2.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 529, &c.—*Plut. d. MELGŪNIS, one of the Æolian islands near Sicily.

MELISA, a town of Magna Græcia.

MELISSA, a daughter of Melissus, king of Crete, who, with her sister Amalthea, fed Jupiter with the milk of goats. She first found out the means of collecting honey; whence some have imagined that she was changed into a bee, as her name is the Greek word for that insect. Columell.—A daughter of Procles, who married Periander, the son of Cypselus, by whom in her pregnancy she was killed with a blow of his foot, by the false accusation of his concubines. *Diog. MELISSUS, [a philosopher of Samos of the Eleatic sect, who flourished about 440 B. C. He was a disciple of Parmenides, to whose doctrines he closely adhered. As a public man he was conversant with affairs of state, and acquired great influence among his countrymen, who had a high veneration for his talents and virtues. Being appointed by them to the command of a fleet, he obtained a great naval victory over the Athenians. As a philosopher, he maintained that the principle of all things is one and immutable, or, that whatever exists is one being; that this one being includes all things and is infinite, without beginning or end; that there is neither vacuum or motion in the universe, nor any such things as production or decay; that the changes which it seems to suffer are only illusions of our senses, and that we ought not to lay down any thing positively concerning the gods, since our knowledge of them is so uncertain. The mistocles is said to have been one of his pupils.]

MELITA, an island in the Mediterranean, to the south-west of Sicily, now Malta. It derived its ancient name from the quantity of honey (μελι) which it produced. The soil was fertile, and the country famous for its wool. It was first peopled by the Phœnicians. St. Paul was shipwrecked there, and cursed all venomous creatures, which now are not to be found in the whole island. Some, however, suppose that the island on which the Apostle was shipwrecked, was another island of the same name in the Adriatic on the coast of Illyricum. [The opinion which Lempriere advocates, and which makes Malta the place of St. Paul's shipwreck, is altogether untenable. The vessel, when lost, was in "Adria," the Adriatic Gulph, which cannot by any geographical contrivance be made to extend, as some would wish to have it, to the coast of Africa. The island on which the Apostle was wrecked was an obscure one in the Adriatic Sea, formerly called Melita, and now known by the name of Meleda. This island lies confessedly in the Adriatic, off the coast of Illyricum; it lies, too, nearer the mouth of the Adriatic than any other island of that sea, and would of course be more likely to receive the wreck of any vessel that would be driven by tempests to that quarter. Meleda is situate, moreover, nearly N. W. by N. of the south-west promontory of Crete, and nearly in the direction of a storm from the south-east quarter. The manner likewise in which Melita is described by St. Luke agrees with the idea of an obscure place, but not with the celebrity of Malta at that time. Cicero speaks of Melita (Malta) as abounding in curiosities and riches, and possessing a remarkable manufacture of the finest linen. (Orat. in Verr. lib. 4, c. 13, et c. 46.) Malta, according to Diodorus Siculus, (lib. 5, c. 1.) was furnished with many and very good harbours, and the inhabitants were very rich; for it was full of all sorts of artificers, among whom were excellent weavers of fine linen. The houses were stately and beautiful, and the inhabitants, a colony of Phœnicians, famous for the extent and lucrative nature of their commerce. It is difficult to suppose that a place of this description could be meant by such an expression as "an island called Melite;" nor could the inhabitants, with any propriety of speech, be understood by the epithet "barbarous." But the Adriatic Melite perfectly corresponds with that description. Though too obscure and insignificant to be particularly noticed by ancient geographers, the opposite and neighbouring coast of Illyricum is represented by Strabo in such a way as perfectly corresponds with the expression of the Apostle. Father Giorgi, an ecclesiastic of Melite Adriatica, who has written on this subject, suggests, very properly, that as there are now no serpents in Malta, and as it should seem there were none in the time of Pliny, there never were any there, the country being dry and rocky, and not affording shelter or proper nourishment for animals of this description. But Meleda abounds with these reptiles, being woolly and damp, and favourable to their way of life and propagation. It has been alleged, however, in favour of Malta's having been the island in question, that had Melide been the one, St. Paul would not have called at Syracuse, in his way to Rhegium, "which is so far out of the track" says a writer who advocates this opinion, "that no example can produced in the history of navigation of any ship going so far out of her course, except it was driven by a violent tempest." This argument tends principally to show that the writer had a very incorrect idea of the relative situations of the places to which he refers. The ship which carried St. Paul from the Adriatic to Rhegium would not deviate from its course more than half a day's sail by touching at Syracuse; and the delay so occasioned would probably be but a few hours more than it would have been had they proceeded to Syracuse in their way to the Straits of Messina from Malta. Besides, the master of the ship might have, and probably had, some business at Syracuse, which had originated at Alexandria, from which place it must have been originally intended that the ship should commence her voyage to Puteoli; and in this course, the calling at Syracuse would have been the smallest deviation possible. As regards the wind Euroclydon, it may be observed, that the word evidently implies a south-east wind. It is composed of Euges, "the south-east wind," and κλυδων, "a wave," an addition highly expressive of the character and effects of this wind, but, probably, chiefly applied to it when it became typhonic or tempestuous. Typhon is described by Pliny, (Lib. 2, c. 48.) as "præcipua navigantium pestis, non antennis modo, rerum ipsa navigia contorta frangens." But to return to the island of Malta; it was held by the Knights of St. John from 1530 to 1798, they having this island granted to them by Charles V. in 1530, when they were expelled from Rhodes by the Turks. In 1798 it fell into the hands of the French, and soon after was taken by the British, and was confirmed to them by the treaty of Paris in 1814. It is a very strongly fortified island. In Gibraltar admiration is excited by the works of nature, in Malta by those of art.] Strab. 6.—Melita, 2, c. 7.—Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 46.—An ancient name of Samothrace. Strab. 10.

This island was originally peopled by a Lacedæmonian colony, 1116 years before the Christian era. From this reason the inhabitants refused to join the rest of the islands and the Athenians against the Peloponnesians. This refusal was severely punished. The Athenians took Melos, and put to the sword all such as were able to bear arms. The women and children were made slaves, and the island left desolate. An Athenian colony re-peopled it, till Lysander re-conquered it, and re-established the original inhabitants in their possession. The island produced a kind of earth successfully employed in painting and medicine. [It abounded with iron mines, and was famous for its wines and honey. Its pastures and mineral waters were also commended, and its alum was in great repute among the Romans, and preferred by them to that of any other country except the Egyptian.] Strab. 7.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 4, c. 12, l. 35, c. 9.—Thucyd. 2, &c.

MEMNON, a king of Æthiopia, son of Tithonus and Aurora. [vid. a solution of this fable under the article Memnonium.] He came with a body of 10,000 men to assist his uacle Priam during the Trojan war, where he behaved with great courage, and killed Antilochus, Nestor's son. The aged father challenged the Æthiopian monarch, but Memnon refused it on account of the venerable age of Nestor, and accepted that of Achilles. He was killed in the combat in the sight of the Grecian and Trojan armies. Aurora was so disconsolate at the death of her son, that she flew to Jupiter all bathed in tears, and begged the god to grant her son such honours as might distinguish him from other mortals. Jupiter consented, and immediately a numerous flight of birds issued from the burning pile on which the body was laid, and, after they had flown three times round the flames, they divided themselves into two separate bodies, and fought with such acrimony that above half of them fell down into the fire, as victims to appease the manes of Memnon. These birds were called Memnonides; and it has been observed by some of the ancients, that they never failed to return yearly to the tomb of Memnon, in Troas, and repeat the same bloody engagement, in honour of the hero from whom they received their name. The Æthiopians or Egyptians, over whom Memnon reigned, erected a celebrated statue to the honour of their monarch. [MEMNONIUM, the citadel of Susa, (vid. below.) This name is also given to that part of Thebes in Egypt which lay on the west side of the Nile, and is now called Habon. Near the city of Thebes was the famous statue of Memnon, which was said to utter a sound like the snapping asunder of a musical string, when it was struck by the first beams of the sun. It was a colossal figure, of gigantic size, formed of a very hard granite. Cambyses, who spared not the Egyptian god Apis, suspecting some imposture, broke the statue from the head to the middle of the body, but discovered nothing. Strabo, who visited the spot in a later age, states that he saw two colossal figures, one of them erect, and the other broken off from above, and the fragments lying on the ground. He states, however, a tradition that this had been occasioned by an earthquake. The geographer adds, that he and Ælius Gallus, with many other friends, and a large number of soldiers, were standing by these statues early in the morning, when they heard a certain sound, but could not determine whether it came from the colossus, or the base, or from the surrounding multitude. He mentions also, that it was a current belief that the sound came from that part of the statue which remained on the base. Pliny and Tacitus mention the sound produced from the statue, without having themselves heard it, and Lucian informs us that Demetrius went on purpose to Egypt to see the pyramids and Memnon's statue, from which a voice proceeded at the rising of the sun. It was a general persuasion, indeed, among the Egyptians as well as others, that before Cambyzes broke this colossus, it uttered the seven mysterious vowels. Of the fact that this statue uttered sounds when the sun shone upon it, there can be no doubt, nor can it be difficult to account for the phenomenon. The priests of Thebes might have fabricated, by mechanical art, a speaking head, the springs of which were so arranged that it should pronounce sounds at the rising of the sun. Cambyzes destroyed this wonderful mechanism by overturning the upper part of the statue. The sounds emitted after this from the trunk, which remained on the pedestal, must have been an artifice of the priests. It would seem too, that this was used by them, in a later age, in opposition to the progress of Christianity; for we find that after Christianity became established in Egypt, in the fourth century, nothing more was said of the vocal statue of Memnon. The mutilated fragment, or rather bust of Memnon, which lay on the ground, and consisted of a single mass of stone, weighing 10 or 12 tons, was sent to England by Belzoni in 1818, and is now in the British Museum. But who was Memnon? The answer to this question will involve an explanation also of the term Memnonium. We will first give the ingenious theory of Mannert, and then the discoveries of Champollion. The Egyptian priests, aware that the name Memnon occurred in the traditions of the Greeks, as that of an Assyrian monarch who had marched to the aid of Troy, and indulging their usual propensity of claiming as their own every distinguished personage, with whose name they found one in their own land bearing any degree of similarity, asserted that Memnon was an Egyptian prince who had conquered Assyria, and to which country, therefore, he was erroneously said to have belonged. The Egyptian priests, however, of a later age, went far beyond this, and made Memnon the same with Osymandyas, an Egyptian monarch and conqueror of many nations. On his return from a distant expedition he was said to have built the Memnonium. Here, in the midst of a peristyle, was placed, according to them, his colossal statue, in a sitting posture, together with two smaller and similar ones at some distance in front. All three, says Diodorus, were of one stone, and were Memnon's, the Sylene. These last words are important. On the larger statue was inscribed as follows: "I am Osymandyas, the king of kings. If any one wishes to know how great I am, and where I lie, let him excel one of my works." An attentive examination of what is here detailed will end in the conviction that there is much falsehood on the part of the Egyptian priests intermingled with the narrative of Diodorus. For the latter does not appear to have been himself upon the spot, but gives merely what he heard from the lips of the former. In the inscription mentioned above, Osymandyas is styled king of kings. Suspicion is immediately excited by this peculiar title. Neither tradition nor history furnish us with the least proof that any king of Egypt ever assumed this appellation. The inscriptions on the obelisks designate them as being gods or the descendants of gods, never as being lords over other monarchs. To Egyptian pride this last seemed the necessary consequence of a divine original, and therefore needing no mention. The Persian monarchs alone assumed the title in question, and with justice, if we consider how many petty sovereigns acknowledged their sway. It is from this source that the priests of Egypt borrowed it for their pretended Osymandyas. The remainder of the inscription, moreover, involves a direct contradiction in itself, for a tomb in the very temple showed in fact where the monarch lay. The truth appears to be simply this. There was on the spot a splendid temple of Osiris or Sesostris, adorned with paintings and colossal figures. The later Egyptian priests, no longer perhaps sufficiently well acquainted with ancient traditions, sought for some individual to whom the sacred structure might be attributed, and found such an one in the fabulous Osymandyas. That they should have thus forgotten, in Sesostris, one of their earliest and most renowned monarchs, appears little surprising, when we consider how great a degree of national vanity was blended with the Egyptian character. Their nation they regarded as the first upon earth, and not Sesostris merely, but every individual monarch in the long line of their ancient kings, as having been little inferior to deities. No wonders were too stupendous which their Pharaohs had not performed, and the statement of Strabo is an excellent commentary on this trait of national character, when he informs us that he observed in the tombs of the kings near Thebes, certain small obelisks whose inscriptions stated in pompous terms the immense riches of those monarchs, and the expeditions made by them to the distant east with a million of warriors. But whence came the name Osymandyas? The answer is an easy one; since, according to Strabo, Memnon was in Egyptian Ismandes. Now the latter name, argues Mannert, was found by the priests on the colossal statues just mentioned, and either they knew not that it was the name merely of the architect who reared the splendid edifices of the Memnonium, or, if they actually knew the truth, the suggestions of national vanity taught them to conceal it. This latter supposition is by far the more probable; especially as Diodorus himself was aware that Memnon was merely the maker of these statues; for, when he states that they were Memnon's, he merely means, in accordance with the common rules of Greek phraseology, that they were Memnon's work, the word εργον being understood. After this explanation, the inscription given above becomes that of a boastful artist, with the exception of the words "king of kings," which are evidently an interpolation of the priests. Memnon regarded himself as the prince of architects, and had even procured as a return for his skill the honour of being interred within the sacred precincts. His contemporaries seem to have acknowledged his claims to eminence in this respect, since not only the buildings already spoken of at Thebes bore his name, but other palaces, at Abydos, for example, were styled each Memnonium. Strabo even regards him as the builder of the labyrinth. The conclusion to be drawn then from these premises is, according to Mannert, as follows. There never was a monarch of Egypt by the name of Osymandyas; this name being merely altered by the priests from Ismandes, that of the architect in question. Neither was Memnon a prince of Egypt, but merely a distinguished architect of Syene, and therefore, a building ascribed to him is not styled by the Greek writers Μεμνονος βασιλειον, "a palace of Memnon," implying that he dwelt in it, but merely Μεμνονιον βασιλειον, "a Memnonian Palace," importing that he built it. We have spoken above of three colossal statues, and ancient and modern travellers, after Diodorus, make mention only of two. If an opinion, observes Mannert, be allowed on this subject, it would be as follows. The number of colossal statues was three, according to the statement of Diodorus above cited, the largest representing the architect himself, the two smaller his mother and daughter. The larger statue contained the inscription which has been commented upon, but it fell with the ruins of the temple; the two smaller remained, though in a mutilated state, being situate farther from the sacred edifice. But the Grecian mythology speaks in far different language of Memnon, representing him as the son of Aurora, who came to the aid of the Trojans with the squadrons of the east. Whence did this take its rise? we answer, remarks the same writer, that the whole is based upon a misinterpretation and confounding together of two passages in Homer. In the first of these passages, (Odys. 11, v. 521.) Homer speaks of Memnon as having been the most beautiful of men, but adds not a word to inform us whether he was a Greek or a foreigner. In the second (Od. 4, v. 188), Nestor's son laments

the death of his brother, who had fallen in battle by the hand of the son of Aurora, without in the least hinting that this victor was Memnon, the most beautiful of men. They who came after the poet, however, discovered that Memnon was meant; for, was the hero in question a son of Aurora, he must consequently have been the most beautiful of men: and if the most beautiful of men, he must certainly have been Memnon. Such was the reasoning of those who commented on the bard, and who "saw in Homer more than Homer knew." When the Greeks became better acquainted with the eastern regions of the world, after the conquests of Alexander, they found that the royal city of Susa, and more especially the palace in it, bore the name of Memnonium. Here was a new confirmation of their favourite theory. Susa must have been the residence of Memnon, son of Aurora, and the palace must have derived its appellation from him, as having erected and dwelt in it. Herodotus in fact speaks of Susa as Αστυ Μεμνονιον, and many others before him make mention of it: Histæus of Miletus, too, lived in it at the court of Darius. The Greeks, unfortunately for their theory, soon discovered that Susa was a city of comparatively recent date, and that the monarchs of Assyria had never dwelt in it; but this they disregarded. The Grecian theory was, (Strabo 15, 1058,) that Lithonus, governor of Persia and husband of Eos, had, in the time of the Assyrian king Teutamus, erected, by means of his son, the splendid city of Susa, and then sent him to the aid of the Trojans. But Persia never belonged to the empire of Assyria; and the idea of a single governor founding so large a city as Susa is absurd. The hypothesis in question, however, received a severe blow when the Greeks became acquainted with Upper Egypt, for there they found the Memnonium of Thebes. The Egyptian priests, however, stood ready to relieve their embarrassment. "Memnon," said they, "was a countryman of ours, his true name was Amenophis; he went as conqueror to Assyria, proceeded thence to Troy, and then returned home." This explanation, however, did not, it seems, find a very ready or general reception, and was soon superseded by another. Ethiopian princes, said the priests, ruled for a long period in our land; they were great conquerors, and by them was built the Memnonium of Thebes. Such is the statement of Agatharchides the geographer, who lived under the first Ptolemies. He evidently gives merely the relation of others, since he accompanies it with the term φασι, "they say." It would seem, in truth, that the Memnon at Susa, and the Memnon of Egypt, were one and the same person. Cambyses, who at first lived on such friendly terms with Pharaoh Amasis as to ask his daughter in marriage, may have requested of the Egyptian monarch this famous architect also, in order to have a new palace erected by him at Susa, and hence the name Memnonium might become applied likewise to the latter place. In this way too we may account for the great similarity observed by modern travellers between some parts of the ancient architecture of Persia and that of Egypt. Sir Robert Ker Porter informs us that the Shehel Minar, or "Forty Columns," at Persepolis, both as a whole and in their details, bore a strong resemblance to the architectural style of Egypt. Memnon, no doubt, would be employed also in adorning this splendid capital. But in direct opposition to all that has thus far been advanced is the authority of the learned Champollion. This writer, in his elaborate treatise on the Hieroglyphics of Egypt, maintains the identity of Memnon with the Egyptian monarch Amenophis 2d; and by means of his equally curious and profound researches in the ancient language of Egypt, makes the inscription on the base of Memnon's statue equivalent to Amenoph (AMENOPH.) It would be the height of rashness to oppose a mere theory to a matter of fact, though it must be confessed that if the conclusion of Champollion be the true one, we are again left in utter uncertainty as regards the appellation Memnonian which is applied to the city of Susa by the ancient writers. Nor is this all. How comes it that the earlier priests of Egypt should have thought of assigning the statue in question to the fabulous Osymandyas, when the name of Amenophis was upon it? Or why should the latter name be heard only in a later age? Is it beyond probability to conjecture that the inscription decyphered by Champollion is a forgery of the priests of Egypt, and the production of a later period than that when the statue was originally made? Champollion's chief strength lies on the present occasion in his decyphering of the inscription; for his Greek authorities, Manetho and Pausanias, do not carry much weight with them in the present instance. The former wrote in too late an age to be deemed very decisive testimony on this intricate subject, and Pausanias, in addition to stating that the inhabitants of Thebes assigned the statue, not to Memnon but to Phamenoph, remarks, what the learned Champollion ought in candour to have mentioned, that he had heard persons ascribe it also to Sesostris. The inscription of Balbinus, which Champollion also quotes, is the production of a very late age, that of the emperor Hadrian; and when he speaks of Memnon as having been also called Phamenoph, he no doubt received this information from the priests of the day. We have thus confronted the theory of Manetho with the researches of Champollion, and it is due to candour to say that the former, however ingenious it may be, is mere speculation, while the latter is a curious discovery based upon fact. Besides, even conceding every other point to the German scholar, where is the probability that a mere architect like Memnon would be allowed to make a colossus of himself, or to obtain a burial-place within the precincts of a temple?]

left side of the Nile. Concerning the epoch of its foundation, and its precise situation, writers are not agreed. (vid. Menes.) Diodorus Siculus makes it seven leagues in circumference. With regard to its position, it would seem, from a review of all the authorities which bear upon the subject, that Memphis stood about 15 miles above the apex of the Delta: this at least is D'Anville's opinion. The modern village of Gisa is generally supposed to occupy the site of Memphis, but it is more accurate to make the small town with Memph correspond to the ancient city. Herodotus ascribes the founding of Memphis to Menes, Diodorus to Uchoreus. It seems that after the course of the Nile, which lost itself in the sands of Libya, had been changed, and the Delta was formed out of the mud deposited by its waters, canals were cut to drain Lower Egypt. Upon this the kings of Thebes became desirous of approaching nearer to the mouth of the river, in order to enjoy the cool breezes from the sea. Accordingly they founded Memphis, which soon eclipsed in splendour the ancient capital of Thebes. It maintained its splendour till the time of Cambyses, who almost ruined it. Still, however, it retained enough magnificence to be the first city in the world. It declined after the founding of Alexandria, its population migrating in large numbers to the new capital. Under Augustus, however, it was still a large city. Six hundred years after, it was taken and ravaged by the Arabs.] It once contained many beautiful temples, particularly those of the god Apis, (bos Memphites), whose worship was observed with the greatest ceremonies. (vid. Apis.) It was in the neighbourhood of Memphis that those famous pyramids were built, whose grandeur and beauty still astonish the modern traveller. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 28.—*Sil. MENANDER, a celebrated comic poet of Athens, educated under Theophrastus. He was universally esteemed by the Greeks, and received the appellation of Prince of the New Comedy. He did not disgrace his compositions, like Aristophanes, by mean and indecent reflections and illiberal satire, but his writings were replete with elegance, refined wit, and judicious observations. Of 80 comedies which he wrote, nothing remains but a few fragments. It is said that Terence translated all these, and indeed we have cause to lament the loss of such valuable writings when we are told by the ancients that the elegant Terence, so much admired, was in the opinion of his countrymen reckoned inferior to Menander. [A very faint idea of the manner and spirit of Menander can be formed from the comedies of Terence; for, not content with representing on the Roman stage the action contained in the piece of his Grecian prototype, he generally joined to it some subordinate intrigue drawn from another play of the same poet, and artfully amalgamated with the principal action. This is what Terence calls making one play out of two. Plutarch, Dio Chrysostom, and Ovid speak of the productions of Menander in terms of high admiration, and prefer them to the most finished specimens of the ancient and middle comedy.] It is said that Menander drowned himself in the 52d year of his age, B. C. 293, because the compositions of his rival Philemon obtained more applause than his own. Only eight of his numerous comedies were rewarded with a poetical prize. The name of his father was Diopythus, and that of his mother Hegistrata. His fragments, with those of Philemon, were published by Clericus, 8vo. 1709. MENAS, a freedman of Pompey the Great, who distinguished himself by the active and perfidious part he took in the civil wars which were kindled between the younger Pompey and Augustus. When Pompey invited Augustus to his galley, Menas advised his master to seize the person of his enemy, and at the same time the Roman empire, by cutting the cables of his ship. No, replied Pompey, I would have approved of the measure if you had done it without consulting me; but I scorn to break my word. Suet. in Oct. Horace epod 4, has ridiculed the pride of Menas, and recalled to his mind his former meanness and obscurity.

MENDES, a city of Egypt, near Lycopolis, on one of the mouths of the Nile, called the Mendesian mouth. Pan, under the form of a goat, was worshipped there with the greatest indecency. [Herodotus states, that in the Egyptian language Mendes signifies both Pan and a he-goat.] Herodot. 2, c. 42 and 46.—Strab. 17.—Diod. 1.

MENECRATES, a physician of Syracuse, famous for his vanity and arrogance. He was generally accompanied by some of his patients whose disorders he had cured. He disguised one in the habit of Apollo, and the other in that of Æsculapius, while he reserved for himself the title and name of Jupiter, whose power was extended over those inferior deities. He crowned himself like the master of the gods; and, in a letter which he wrote to Philip king of Macedon, he styled himself in these words, Menebrates Jupiter to king Philip greeting. The Macedonian monarch answered, Philip to Menebrates, greeting, and better sense. Philip also invited him to one of his feasts, but when the meats were served up, a table was put separate for the physician, on which he was served only with perfumes and frankincense, like the father of the gods. This entertainment displeased Menebrates; he remembered that he was a mortal, and hurried away from the company. He lived about 360 years before the Christian era. The book which he wrote on cures is lost. Ælian. V. H. 10, c. 51.—Athen. 7, c. 13.

MENEDÆMUS, [a Greek philosopher, a native of Eretria, who flourished towards the close of the fourth century before Christ. He was of the Eliac school, which he afterwards transferred to his native city, and gave it the name of Eretrian. Though nobly descended, he was obliged, through poverty, to submit to a mechanical employment, either as tent-maker or mason. He formed an early acquaintance with Asclepiades, who was a fellow-labourer with him in the same occupation. Having resolved to devote themselves to philosophy, they abandoned their mean employment and went to Athens, where Plato presided in the Academy. Menedemus was at first ill received by the inhabitants of his native city when he retired thither to open a school, but was afterwards invested with offices of high responsibility and importance. He was entrusted with a public office, to which was annexed an annual stipend of 200 talents. He discharged the trust with fidelity and reputation, but would only accept a fourth part of the salary. He was afterwards sent as ambassador to Ptolemy, Lysander, and Demetrius, and did his countrymen several important services. Antigonus entertained a personal respect for him, and professed himself one of his disciples. His intimacy with this prince made the Eretrians suspect him of a design to betray their city to Antigonus. To save himself he fled to Anti-gonous, and soon after died in the 84th year of his age. It is thought he precipitated his death by abstaining from food, being oppressed with grief at the ingratitude of his countrymen, and on being unable to persuade Antigonus to restore the lost liberties of his country.]—A Cynic philosopher of Lampsacus, who said that he was come from hell to observe the sins and wickedness of mankind. His habit was that of the furies, and his behaviour was a proof of his insanity. He was disciple of Colotes of Lampsacus. Diog.

MENĒLAI PORTUS, an harbour on the coast of Africa, between Cyrene and Egypt. C. Nep. in Ages. 3.—Strab. 1.—Mons, a hill near Sparta, with a fortification called Mene-laium. Liv. 34, c. 23.

MENĒLĀIA, a festival celebrated at Therapnæ in Laconia, in honour of Menelaus. He had there a temple, where he was worshipped with his wife Helen as one of the supreme gods.

MENĒLĀUS, a king of Sparta, brother to Agamemnon. His father's name was Atreus, according to Homer, or, according to the more probable opinion of Hesiod, Apollodorus, &c. he was the son of Plisthenes and Ærope. [vid. Plisthenes.] He was educated with his brother Agamemnon in the house of Atreus, but soon after the death of this monarch, Thyestes his brother usurped the kingdom and banished the two children of Plisthenes. Menelaus and Agamemnon came to the court of Ceneus, king of Calydonia, who treated them with tenderness and paternal care. From Calydonia they went to Sparta, where, like the rest of the Grecian princes, they solicited the marriage of Helen the daughter of king Tyndarus. By the artifice and advice of Ulysses, Helen was permitted to choose a husband, and she fixed her eyes upon Menelaus and married him, after her numerous suitors had solemnly bound themselves by an oath to defend her, and protect her person against the violence or assault of every intruder. [vid. Helena.] As soon as the nuptials were celebrated, Tyndarus resigned the crown to his son-in-law, and their happiness was complete. This was, however, of short duration; Helen was the fairest woman of the age, and Venus had promised Paris the son of Priam to reward him with such a beauty. [vid. Paris.] The arrival of Paris in Sparta was the cause of great revolutions. The absence of Menelaus in Crete gave opportunities to the Trojan prince to corrupt the fidelity of Helen, and to carry away home what the goddess of beauty had promised to him as his due. This action was highly resented by Menelaus; he reminded the Greek princes of their oath and solemn engagements when they courted the daughter of Tyndarus, and immediately all Greece took up arms to defend his cause. [vid. the true account of the origin of the Trojan war in the remarks under the article Troja.] The combined forces assembled at Aulis in Bœotia, where they chose Agamemnon for their general, and Calchas for their high-priest: and after their applications to the court of Priam for the recovery of Helen had proved fruitless, they marched to meet their enemies in the field. During the Trojan war Menelaus behaved with great spirit and courage, and Paris must have fallen by his hand, had not Venus interposed and redeemed him from certain death. He also expressed his wish to engage Hector, but Agamemnon hindered him from fighting with so powerful an adversary. In the tenth year of the Trojan war, Helen, as it is reported, obtained the forgiveness and the good graces of Menelaus by introducing him with Ulysses, the night that Troy was reduced to ashes, into the chamber of Deiphobus whom she had married after the death of Paris. This perfidious conduct totally reconciled her to her first husband; and she returned with him to Sparta, during a voyage of eight years. He died some time after his return. He had a daughter called Hermione, and Nicostratus according to some, by Helen, and a son called Megapenthes by a concubine. Some say that Menelaus went to Egypt on his return from the Trojan war to obtain Helen who had been detained there by the king of the country. [vid. Helena.] The palace which Menelaus once inhabited was still entire in the days of Pausanias, as well as the temple which had been raised to his memory by the people of Sparta. *Homer. MENĒNIUS AGRIPPA, a celebrated Roman who appeased the Roman populace in the infancy of the consular government by repeating the well-known fable of the belly and limbs. He flourished 495 B. C. Liv. 2, c. 16, 32, 33.

MENES, [considered by most as the founder of the Egyptian empire, is supposed to have reigned 117 years after the birth of Phaleg, son of Heber, which was the year of the dispersion of the people throughout the earth. He built the town of Memphis, and, in the prosecution of his work, stopped the course of the Nile, near it, by constructing a causeway several miles broad, and caused it to run through the mountains. For his ability and popularity he was deified after death. He is supposed to be the Misraim of Scripture. Bishop Clayton, however, contends that Menes was not the first king of Egypt, but that he only transferred the seat of empire from Thebes to Memphis; for Diodorus expressly says that Memphis was not built until eight generations after the building of Thebes, and that the rise of Memphis was the fall of Thebes.] Herodot. 2, c. 1 and 90.—Diod. 1.

MENESTHĒI PORTUS, a town of Hispania Bætica, [opposite Gades, near the modern Puerto Real. If we follow Ptolemy and Strabo, however, it will be more to the south, near the castle of St. Luis.]

MENESTHEUS or MENESTHEUS or MNESTHEUS, a son of Pereus, who so insinuated himself into the favour of the people of Athens, that during the long absence of Theseus, he was elected king. The lawful monarch at his return home was expelled, and Mnestheus established his usurpation by his popularity and great moderation. As he had been one of Helen's suitors, he went to the Trojan war at the head of the people of Athens, and died in his return in the island of Melos. He reigned 23 years, 1205, and was succeeded by Demophoon, the son of Theseus. Plut. in Thes.—A son of Iphicrates who distinguished himself in the Athenian armies. C. Nep. in Tim.

MENINX, or LOTOPHAGITIS INSULA, now Zerbi, an island on the coast of Africa, near the Syrtis Minor. It was peopled by the people of Neritos, and thence called Neritia. [It was rather called Neritia by Silius Italicus, because rendered illustrious by Ulysses having touched there and erected an altar. vid. Neritos. Meninx was afterwards called Gerba, whence comes the modern name. It was one of the places where the shell-fish was found whence purple was obtained.] Plin. 5, c. 7.—Strab. 17.—Sil. It. 3, v. 318.

MENIPPUS, a Cynic philosopher of Phœnicia. He was originally a slave, and obtained his liberty with a sum of money, and became one of the greatest usurers at Thebes. He grew so desperate from the continual reproaches and insults to which he was daily exposed on account of his meanness, that he destroyed himself. He wrote 13 books of satires which have been lost. M. Varro composed satires in imitation of his style, and called them Menippean. [The Menippean satire consisted of verse and prose intermixed.]—A native of Stratonicæ who was preceptor to Cicero for some time. Cic. Br. 91.

MENNIS, a town of Assyria, [four days' march south of Arbela. The adjacent country abounded in bitumen. Mannert locates it near the modern Dus-Churnalu.] Curt. 5, c. 1.

MENŒCEUS, a Theban, father of Hippocome, Jocasta, and Creon.—A young Theban, son of Creon. He offered himself to death, when Tiresias, to ensure victory on the side of Thebes against the Argive forces, ordered the Thebans to sacrifice one of the descendants of those who sprang from the dragon's teeth, and he killed himself near the cave where the dragon of Mars had formerly resided. The gods required this sacrifice because the dragon had been killed by Cadmus, and no sooner was Creon dead than his countrymen obtained the victory. *Stat. Theb. 10, v. 614.—Eurip. MENŒTIUS, a son of Actor and Ægina after her amour with Jupiter. He left his mother and went to Opus, where he had by Sthenela, or, according to others, by Philomela or Polymela. Patroclus, often called from him Menœtiades. Menœtius was one of the Argonauts. Apollod. 3, c. 24.—Homer. Il. 1, v. 307.—Hygin. fab. 97.

MENON, a Thessalian commander in the expedition of Cyrus the younger against his brother Artaxerxes. [He commanded the left wing in the battle of Cunaxa. He was taken along with the other generals after the battle by Tissaphernes, but was not put to death with them. Xenophon states that he lived an entire year, after having had some personal punishment inflicted, and then met with an end of his existence. Diodorus states that he was not punished with the other generals, because it was thought that he was inclined to betray the Greeks, and he was therefore allowed to escape unhurt. Marcellinus, in his life of Thucydides, accuses Xenophon of calumniating Menon, on account of his enmity towards Plato, who was a friend of Menon.] Diod. 14.

MERCURII PROMONTORIUM, a cape of Africa, near Clypea. Liv. 26, c. 44, l. 29, c. 27.—Plin. 5, c. 4.

MERCÛRIUS, a celebrated god of antiquity, called Hermes by the Greeks. [vid. the end of this article.] There were no less than five of this name according to Cicero; a son of Cœlus and Lux; a son of Valens and Coronis; a son of the Nile; a son of Jupiter and Maia; and another called by the Egyptians Thaut. Some add a sixth, a son of Bacchus and Proserpine. To the son of Jupiter and Maia the actions of all the others have been probably attributed, as he is the most famous and the best known. Mercury was the messenger of the gods, and of Jupiter in particular; he was the patron of travellers and of shepherds; he conducted the souls of the dead into the infernal regions, and not only presided over orators, merchants, declaimers, but he was also the god of thieves, pickpockets, and all dishonest persons. His name is derived a mercibus, because he was the god of merchandize among the Latins. He was born, according to the more received opinion, in Arcadia, on Mount Cyllene, and in his infancy he was intrusted to the care of the Seasons. The day that he was born, or more probably the following day, he gave an early proof of his craftiness and dishonesty, in stealing away the oxen of Admetus which Apollo tended. He gave another proof of his thievish propensity, by taking also the quiver and arrows of the divine shepherd, and he increased his fame by robbing Neptune of his trident, Venus of her girdle, Mars of his sword, Jupiter of his sceptre, and Vulcan of many of his mechanical instruments. These specimens of his art recommended him to the notice of the gods, and Jupiter took him as his messenger, interpreter, and cup-bearer in the assembly of the gods. This last office he discharged till the promotion of Ganymede. He was represented with a winged cap, called petasus, and with wings for his feet, called talaria. He had also a short sword, called herpe, which he lent to Perseus. With these he was enabled to go into whatever part of the universe he pleased with the greatest celerity, and besides he was permitted to make himself invisible, and to assume whatever shape he pleased. As messenger of Jupiter he was intrusted with all his secrets. He was the ambassador and plenipotentiary of the gods, and he was concerned in all alliances and treaties. He was the confidant of Jupiter's amours, and he often was sent to watch over the jealousy and intrigues of Juno. The invention of the lyre and its seven strings is ascribed to him. This he gave to Apollo, and received in exchange the celebrated caduceus with which the god of poetry used to drive the flocks of king Admetus. [vid. Caduceus.] In the wars of the giants against the gods, Mercury showed himself brave, spirited, and active. He delivered Mars from the long confinement which he suffered from the superior power of the Aloides. He purified the Danaïdes of the murder of their husbands, he tied Ixion to his wheel in the infernal regions, he destroyed the hundred-eyed Argus, he sold Hercules to Omphale the queen of Lydia, he conducted Priam to the tent of Achilles, to redeem the body of his son Hector, and he carried the infant Bacchus to the nymphs of Nysa. Mercury had many surnames and epithets. He was called Cyllenius, Caduceator, Acacetos, from Acacus, an Arcadian; Acacesius, Tricephalos, Triplex, Chthonius, Camillus, Agoneus, Delius, Arcas, &c. His children were also numerous as well as his amours. He was father of Autolyces, by Chione; Myrtilus, by Cleobula; Libys, by Libya; Echion and Eurytus, by Antianira; Cephalus, by Creusa; Pryllis, by Isa; and of Priapus, according to some. He was also father of Hermaphroditus, by Venus; of Eudorus, by Polimela; of Pan, by Dryope, or Penelope. His worship was well established, particularly in Greece, Egypt, and Italy. He was worshipped at Tanagra in Bœotia, under the name of Criophorus, and represented as carrying a ram on his shoulders, because he delivered the inhabitants from a pestilence by telling them to carry a ram in that manner round the walls of their city. The Roman merchants yearly celebrated a festival on the 15th of May, in honour of Mercury, in a temple near the Circus Maximus. A pregnant sow was sacrificed, and sometimes a calf, and particularly the tongues of animals were offered. After the votaries had sprinkled themselves with water with laurel leaves, they offered prayers to the divinity, and entreated him to be favourable to them, and to forgive whatever artful measures, false oaths or falsehoods they had used or uttered in the pursuit of gain. Sometimes Mercury appears on monuments with a large cloak round his arm, or tied under his chin. The chief ensigns of his power and offices are his caduceus, his petasus, and his talaria. Sometimes he is represented sitting upon a cray fish, holding in one hand his caduceus, and in the other the claws of the fish. At other times he is like a young man without a beard, holding in one hand a purse, as being a tutelary god of merchants, with a cock on his wrists as an emblem of vigilance, and at his feet a goat, a scorpion, and a fly. Some of his statues represented him as a youth facino erecto. Sometimes he rests his foot upon a tortoise. In Egypt his statue represented him with the head of a dog, whence he was often confounded with Anubis, and received the sacrifice of a stork. Offerings of milk and honey were made because he was the god of eloquence, whose powers were sweet and persuasive. The Greeks and Romans offered tongues to him by throwing them into the fire, as he was the patron of speaking, of which the tongue is the organ. Sometimes his statues represent him as without arms, because, according to some, the power of speech can prevail over every thing, even without the assistance of arms. [It has been said, and not without reason, that the Mercury of the Latins was the same deity with the Hermes of the Greeks, the Theutat of the Gauls, and the Thot or Thaut of the Egyptians, from whom some have thought that the rest were derived. His name Hermes signified Interpreter, or, according to Proclus, Messenger; or, if we trace it to a Celtic original, it was the same with Armes, which signifies divination, a character which belonged by way of eminence to Mercury, who was distinguished by his knowledge and practice of this art. Banier allows of none but the ancient Mercury, the Thot or Thaut of the Egyptians. Bochart traces the history of Mercury to that of Canaan. Both, he says, were the sons of Jupiter or Ammon, who was the same with Ham, one taking his name from Mercuratus, merchandize, and Canaan, he says, had in Hebrew the same signification. The wings of Mercury he makes to be the sails of the Phœnician vessels. He was the god of eloquence and the inventor of letters, because the Phœnicians brought the use of them from the west. Others make Mercury the same with Moses, and compare his caduceus with the miraculous rod of that legislator. We have already given an explanation of the office and character of Mercury in the remarks under the article Jupiter. According to Schaaff, however, his Phœnician name was Casmilus, and his caduceus was originally nothing more than a branch of a tree twined around with green leaves, and adorned with a knot skilfully tied, the symbol of trade. The knot and leaves were subsequently changed to wings and serpents. According to the same authority, the Hermæ were originally nothing more than boundary stones consecrated in the Phœnician factories. These the Greeks afterwards erected in different places, especially in the gymnasia, and in process of time these rude and shapeless stones were modelled after the young and athletic antagonists of the palaestra; the petasus also being in imitation of the broad hat which they wore previous to engaging and while on their way to the places of exercise.] *Homer. MERMNADÆ, a race of kings in Lydia, of whom Gyges was the first. They sat on the Lydian throne till the reign of Croesus, who was conquered by Cyrus king of Persia. They were descendants of the Heraclidæ, and probably received the name of the Mermnadæ from Mermnas, one of their own family. son of Omphale by Hercules. Herodot. 1, c. 7 and 14.

MÉRÔE, [according to the ancient writers, an island of Ethiopia. Modern geographers have generally made the ancient Meroë coincide with a region nearly insulated by the two branches of the Nile, the Astapus and Astaboras, and which would be an island if these two last mentioned streams communicated above towards their sources. Malte-Brun makes Meroë the same with the modern kingdom of Sennaar: but a very recent French traveller, M. Cailloux, seems to have set the question at rest. He found the Nile bending outwards in a part of its course, and, after making a wide circuit, returning to almost the very spot where the bend commenced. It thus encloses a very large peninsula, to travel around which is a journey of many weeks, while at the neck of the peninsula, the distance across is one day's travel. The land thus enclosed is called Merve, and presents numerous traces of ancient civilization. It appears to have been inhabited by a people equally as far advanced in refinement as the Egyptians, and whose style of architecture bears a close resemblance to that of the latter. This becomes all extremely interesting when we call to mind what is stated by the ancient writers, that Meroë was the cradle of the religious and political institutions of Egypt.] Strab. 17.—Herodot. 2, c. 31.—Plin. 2, c. 173.—Mela, 1.—Lucan. 4, v. 333, l. 10, v. 163 and 303.

MÉRÔPE, one of the Atlantides. She married Sisyphus son of Æolus, and, like her sisters, was changed into a constellation after death. (vid. Pleiades.) It is said, that in the constellation of the Pleiades the star of Merope appears more dim and obscure than the rest, because she, as the poets observe, married a mortal, while her sisters married some of the gods, or their descendants. *Ovid. MESOMĒDES, a lyric poet in the age of the emperor Antoninus.

MESOPOTAMIA, [an extensive province of Asia, the Greek name of which denotes "between the rivers," (from μεσος and ποταμός).] It was situate between the Euphrates and the Tigris. In Scripture this country is called Aram, and Aramæa; but as Aram also signifies Syria, it is denominated Aram Naharaim, or the Syria of the rivers. It was first peopled by Aram, the father of the Syrians. This province, which inclines from the south-east to the north-west, commenced at lat. 33° 40' N. and terminated near N. lat. 37° 30'. Towards the south it extended as far as the bend formed by the Euphrates at Cunaxa, and to the wall of Semiramis which separated it from Messene. Towards the north it was bounded by a part of Mount Taurus. The modern name given by the Arabs to this quarter is of the same import with the ancient appellation. They call it "isle," or, in their language, Al-Dgezera. The north-western part of Mesopotamia was called Osroene, from Osroes, a prince who wrested from the Seleucidæ a principality here about 120 B. C. The lower part of Mesopotamia is now Irak Arabi, the upper Diar-Bekr. Mesopotamia, according to Strabo, was fertile in vines, and produced good wines. book, de Augusti progenie, was edited 12mo. L. Bat. 1648.

MESSALINA VALERIA, a daughter of Messala Barbatus. She married the emperor Claudius, and disgraced herself by her cruelties and incontinence. Her husband's palace was not the only seat of her lasciviousness, but she prostituted herself in the public streets, and few men there were at Rome who could not boast of having enjoyed the favours of the impure Messalina. Her extravagancies at last irritated her husband: he commanded her to appear before him to answer to all the accusations which were brought against her, upon which she attempted to destroy herself, and when her courage failed, one of the tribunes, who had been sent to her, dispatched her with his sword, A. D. 48. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 37.—Suet. in Claud.—Dio.—Another, called also Statilia. She was descended of a consular family, and married the consul Atticus Vistinus whom Nero murdered. She received with great marks of tenderness her husband's murderer, and married him. She had married four husbands before she came to the imperial throne; and after the death of Nero she retired to literary pursuits and peaceful occupations. Otho courted her, and would have married her had he not destroyed himself. In his last moments he wrote her a very pathetic and consolatory letter, &c. Tacit. Ann.

MESSALINUS M. VALER, a Roman officer in the reign of Tiberius. He was appointed governor of Dalmatia, and rendered himself known by his opposition to Piso, and by his attempts to persuade the Romans of the necessity of suffering women to accompany the camps on their different expeditions. Tacit. Ann. 3.

MESSANA, an ancient and celebrated town of Sicily on the straits which separate Italy from Sicily. It was anciently called Zancle, and was founded 1600 years before the Christian era. [It was called Zancle from the resemblance which its harbour bore to a hook or scythe, (ζαγκλη.)] The inhabitants, being continually exposed to the depredations of the people of Cuma, implored the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnesus, and with them repelled the enemy. After this victorious campaign, the Messenians entered Zancle, and lived in such intimacy with the inhabitants that they changed their name, and assumed that of the Messenians, and called their city Messana. Another account says, that Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium, made war against the Zancleans with the assistance of the Messenians of Peloponnesus, and that after he had obtained a decisive victory, he called the conquered city Messana in compliment to his allies, about 494 years before the Christian era. After this revolution at Zancle, the Mamertini took possession of it and made it the capital of the neighbouring country. [vid. Mamertini.] It afterwards fell into the hands of the Romans, and was for some time the chief of their possessions in Sicily. The inhabitants were called Messenti. Messanienses.

and Mamertini. The straits of Messina have always been looked upon as very dangerous, especially by the ancients, on account of the rapidity of the currents, and the irregular and violent flowing and ebbing of the sea. Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Paus. 4, c. 23.—Diod. 4.—Thucyd. 1, &c.—Herodot. 6, c. 23, l. 7, c. 28.

MESSAFIA, [called also Japygia, a country of Italy in Magna Græcia, forming what is termed the heel. Its principal towns were Brundisium, Rudia, Lupæ, Hydruntum, Callipolis, and Tarentum. This country, though scantily watered, was covered with trees and pastures. It was occupied by two nations, the Calabri on the north-east, and the Salentini on the south-west side of the heel.] Ovid. Met. 14, v. 513.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 691, l. 8, v. 6, l. 9, v. 27.

MESSÈNE, a daughter of Triopas, king of Argos, who married Polycaon, son of Lelex king of Laconia. She encouraged her husband to levy troops, and to seize a part of Peloponnesus, which, after it had been conquered, received her name. She received divine honours after her death, and had a magnificent temple at Ithome, where her statue was made half of gold and half of Parian marble. Paus. 4, c. 1 and 13.

MESSÈNE or MESSÈNA, now Maura Matra, a city in the Peloponnesus, the capital of the country called Messenia. The inhabitants rendered themselves famous for the war which they carried on against the Spartans, and which received the appellation of the Messenian war. The first Messenian war arose from the following circumstances; The Messenians offered violence to some Spartan women who had assembled to offer sacrifices in a temple which was common to both nations, and which stood on the borders of their respective territories, and besides they killed Teleclus, the Spartan king, who attempted to defend the innocence of the females. This account, according to the Spartan traditions, is contradicted by the Messenians, who observe that Teleclus with a chosen body of Spartans assembled at the temple before mentioned, disguised in women's clothes, and all secretly armed with daggers. This hostile preparation was to surprise some of the neighbouring inhabitants; and, in a quarrel which soon after arose, Teleclus and his associates were all killed. These quarrels were the cause of the first Messenian war, which began B. C. 743 years. It was carried on with vigour and spirit on both sides, and after many obstinate and bloody battles had been fought and continued for 19 years, it was at last finished by the taking of Ithome by the Spartans, a place which had stood a siege of ten years, and been defended with all the power of the Messenians. The insults to which the conquered Messenians were continually exposed at last excited their resentment, and they resolved to shake off the yoke. They suddenly revolted, and the second Messenian war was begun 685 B. C. and continued 14 years. The Messenians at first gained some advantage, but a fatal battle in the third year of the war so totally disheartened them that they fled to Ira, where they resolved to maintain an obstinate siege against their victorious pursuers. The Spartans were assisted by the Samians in besieging Ira, and the Messenians were at last obliged to submit to the superior power of their adversaries. The taking of Ira by the Lacedæmonians, after a siege of 11 years, put an end to the second Messenian war. Peace was re-established for some time in Peloponnesus, but after the expiration of 200 years, the Messenians attempted a third time to free themselves from the power of Lacedæmon, B. C. 465. At that time the Helots had revolted from the Spartans, and the Messenians, by joining their forces to these wretched slaves, looked upon their respective calamities as common, and thought themselves closely interested in each other's welfare. The Lacedæmonians were assisted by the Athenians, but they soon grew jealous of one another's power, and their political connection ended in the most inveterate enmity, and at last in open war. Ithome was the place in which the Messenians had a second time gathered all their forces, and though ten years had already elapsed, both parties seemed equally confident of victory. The Spartans were afraid of storming Ithome, as the oracle of Delphi had threatened them with the greatest calamities if they offered any violence to a place which was dedicated to the service of Apollo. The Messenians, however, were soon obliged to submit to their victorious adversaries, B. C. 453, and they consented to leave their native country, and totally to depart from the Peloponnesus, solemnly promising that if they ever returned into Messenia, they would suffer themselves to be sold as slaves. The Messenians upon this, miserably exiled, applied to the Athenians for protection, and were permitted to inhabit Naupactus, whence some of them were afterwards removed to take possession of their ancient territories in Messenia, during the Peloponnesian war. The third Messenian war was productive of great revolutions in Greece, and though almost a private quarrel, it soon engaged the attention of all the neighbouring states, and kindled the flames of dissention every where. Every state took up arms as if in its own defence, or to prevent additional power and dominion to be lodged in the hands of its rivals. The descendants of the Messenians at last returned to Peloponnesus, B. C. 370, after a long banishment of 300 years. *Paus. MESSÈNIA, a province of Peloponnesus, situate between Laconia, Elis, Arcadia, and the sea. Its chief city is Messena. vid. Messene.

MESŪLA, a town of Italy, in the country of the Sabines.

METĀBUS, a tyrant of the Privernates. He was father of Camilla, whom he consecrated to the service of Diana, when he had been banished from his kingdom by his subjects. Virg. Æn. 11, v. 540.

METAGITNIA, a festival in honour of Apollo, celebrated by the inhabitants of Melite, who migrated to Attica. It receives its name from its being observed in the month called Metagitaion.

METAPONTUM, a town of Lucania in Italy, founded about 1269 years B. C. by Metabus, the father of Camilla, or Epeus, one of the companions of Nestor. Pythagoras retired there for some time, and perished in a sedition. Annibal made it his head-quarters when in that part of Italy, and its attachment to Carthage was afterwards severely punished by the Roman conquerors, who destroyed its liberties and independence. A few broken pillars of marble are now the only vestiges of Metapontum. Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Justin. 12, c. 2.—Liv. 1, 8, 25, 27, &c.

METAURUS, [a river of Umbria, now the Metro, falling into the sea below Pisaurum. It is celebrated for the defeat of Asdrubal the brother of Annibal, by the consuls Livius Salinator and Claudius Nero, B. C. 207. It rises in the Umbrian Appenines.] Horat. 4, od. 4, v. 38.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Lucan. 1, v. 495.

METELLI, the surname of the family of the Cæciliai at Rome, the most known of whom were—Q. Cæcilius, who rendered himself illustrious by his successes against Jugurtha, the Numidian king, from which he was surnamed Numidicus. He took, in this expedition, the celebrated Marius as his lieutenant, and he had soon cause to repent of the confidence he had placed in him. Marius raised himself to power by defaming the character of his benefactor, and Metellus was recalled to Rome, and accused of extortion and ill management. Marius was appointed successor to finish the Numidian war, and Metellus was acquitted of the crimes laid to his charge before the tribunal of the Roman knights, who observed that the probity of his whole life and the greatness of his exploits were greater proofs of his innocence than the most powerful arguments. Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48.—Salust. de bell. Jug.—L. Cæcilius, another, who saved from the flames the palladium, when Vesta's temple was on fire. He was then high-priest. He lost his sight and one of his arms in doing it, and the senate, to reward his zeal and piety, permitted him always to be drawn to the senate-house in a chariot, an honour which no one had ever before enjoyed. He also gained a great victory over the Carthaginians in the first Punic war, and led in his triumph 16 generals, and 120 elephants taken from the enemy. He was honoured with the dictatorship, and the office of master of horse, &c.—Q. Cæcilius Celer, another who distinguished himself by his spirited exertions against Catiline. He married Clodia the sister of Clodius, who disgraced him by her incontinence and lasciviousness. He died 57 years before Christ. He was greatly lamented by Cicero, who shed tears at the loss of one of his most faithful and valuable friends. Cic. de Cæl.—L. Cæcilius, a tribune in the civil wars of J. Cæsar and Pompey. He favoured the cause of Pompey, and opposed Cæsar when he entered Rome with a victorious army. He refused to open the gates of Saturn's temple, in which were deposited great treasures, upon which they were broke open by Cæsar, and Metellus retired, when threatened with death.—Q. Cæcilius, the grandson of the high-priest who saved the palladium from the flames, was a warlike general, who, from his conquest of Macedonia, was surnamed Macedonicus. He had six sons, of which four are particularly mentioned by Plutarch.—Q. Cæcilius, surnamed Balearius, from his conquest of the Baleares.—L. Cæcilius, surnamed Diadematus, but supposed the same as that called Lucius with the surname of Dalmaticus, from a victory obtained over the Dalmatians during his consulship with Mutius Scævola.—Caius Cæcilius, surnamed Caprarius, who was consul with Carbo, A. U. C. 641.—The fourth was Marcus, and of these four brothers it is remarkable that two of them triumphed in one day, but over what nations is not mentioned by Eutrop. 4.—Nepos, a consul, &c.—Another, who accused C. Curio, his father's detractor, and who also vented his resentment against Cicero when going to banishment.—Another, who, as tribune, opposed the ambition of Julius Cæsar.—A general of the Roman armies against the Sicilians and Carthaginians. Before he marched he offered sacrifices to all the gods, except Vesta, for which neglect the goddess was so incensed, that she demanded the blood of his daughter Metella. When Metella was going to be immolated, the goddess placed a heifer in her place, and carried her to a temple at Lanuvium, of which she became the priestess.—Lucius Cæcilius, or Quintus, surnamed Creticus, from his conquest in Crete, B. C. 66, is supposed by some to be the son of Metellus Macedonicus.—Cimber, one of the conspirators against J. Cæsar. It was he who gave the signal to attack and murder the dictator in the senate-house.—Pius, a general in Spain against Sertorius, on whose head he set a price of 100 talents and 20,000 acres of land. He distinguished himself also in the Marsian war, and was high-priest. He obtained the name of Pius from the sorrows he showed during the banishment of his father Metellus Numidicus, whom he caused to be recalled. Patere. 2, c. 5.—*Salust. METHODIUS, a bishop of Tyre, who maintained a controversy against Porphyry. The best edition is that of Paris, fol. 1657.]—[Another, bishop of Constantinople, who introduced the superstition of image-worship into the Greek church.]

—[Another in Macedonia above Pydna, now Lenterochori. It was memorable in the contentions between Philip and the Athenians, and the scene of his first victory over them. In the siege of this city Philip lost his right eye. vid. Aster.] Homer. Il. 2, v. 71.

METHYMNA, (now Porto Petero), a town of the island of Lesbos, which receives its name from a daughter of Macareus. It is the second city of the island in greatness, population, and opulence, and its territory is fruitful, and the wines it produces, excellent. It was the native place of Arion. When the whole island of Lesbos revolted from the power of the Athenians, Methymna alone remained firm to its ancient allies. Diod. 5, Thucyd. 3.—Horat. 2, sat. 8, v. 50.—Virg. G. 3, v. 90.

METILIA LEX, enacted A. U. C. 516, [that Minucius, master of the horse, should be equal in command with Fabius the dictator.]

METIS, one of the Oceanides. She was Jupiter's first wife, celebrated for her great prudence and sagacity above the rest of the gods. [But vid. remarks under the article Jupiter.] Jupiter, who was afraid lest she should bring forth into the world a child wiser and greater than himself, devoured her in the first month of her pregnancy. Some time after this adventure the god had his head opened, from which issued Minerva armed from head to foot. According to Apollodorus, 1, c. 2, Metis gave a potion to Saturn, and obliged him to throw up the children he had devoured. Hesiod. Theog. v. 390.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.—Hygin.

METIUS CURTIUS, one of the Sabines who fought against the Romans on account of the stolen virgins.—Suffetius, a dictator of Alba, in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. He fought against the Romans, and at last, finally to settle their disputes, he proposed a single combat between the Horatii and Curiatii. The Albans were conquered, and Metius promised to assist the Romans against their enemies. In a battle against the Veientes and Fidenates Metius showed his infidelity by forsaking the Romans at the first onset, and retired to a neighbouring eminence, to wait for the event of the battle, and to fall upon whatever side proved victorious. The Romans obtained the victory, and Tullus ordered Metius to be tied between two chariots, which were drawn by four horses two different ways, and his limbs were torn away from his body, about 669 years before the Christian era. Liv. 1, c. 23, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 3.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 642.—A critic. vid. Tarpa.—Carus, a celebrated informer under Domitian, who enriched himself with the plunder of those who were sacrificed to the emperor's suspicion.

METEGCIA, festivals instituted by Theseus in commemoration of the people of Attica having removed to Athens.

METON, an astrologer and mathematician of Athens. His father's name was Pausanias. He refused to go to Sicily with his countrymen, and pretended to be insane, because he foresaw the calamities that attended that expedition. In a book called Enneadecaterides, or the cycle of 19 years, he endeavoured to adjust the course of the sun and of the moon, and supported that the solar and lunar years could regularly begin from the same point in the heavens. [This is called the Metonic period or cycle. It is also called the golden number, from its great use in the calendar.] He flourished B. C. 432. Vitruv. 1.—Plut. in Nicia.

METRA, a daughter of Eresichthon, a Thesalian prince, beloved by Neptune. When her father had spent all his fortune to gratify the canine hunger under which he laboured, she prostituted herself to her neighbours, and received for reward oxen, goats, and sheep, which she presented to Eresichthon. Some say that she had received from Neptune the power of changing herself into whatever animal she pleased, and that her father sold her continually to gratify his hunger, and that she instantly assumed a different shape, and became again his property. Ovid. Met. 8, fab. 21.

METRÓCLES, a pupil of Theophrastus, who had the care of the education of Cleombrotus and Cleomenes. He suffocated himself when old and infirm. Diog.

METRODÓRUS, [an intimate friend of Epicurus. He first attached himself to that philosopher at Lampsacus, and continued with him till his death. He maintained the cause of his friend and master with great intrepidity, both by his discourses and his writings, against the Sophists and Dialectics, and consequently partook largely of the obloquy which fell upon his sect. Plutarch charges him with having reprobated the folly of his brother Timocrates, in aspiring to the honours of wisdom, whilst nothing was of any value but eating and drinking, and indulging the animal appetites. But it is probable that this calumny originated with Timocrates himself, who, from a personal quarrel with Metrodorus, deserted the sect, and therefore can deserve little credit.]—Another, a physician of Chios, B. C. 444. He was a disciple of Democritus, and had Hippocrates among his pupils. His compositions on medicine, &c. are lost. He supported that the world was eternal and infinite, and denied the existence of motion. Diog.—A painter and philosopher of Stratonice, B. C. 171. He was sent to Paulus Emilius, who, after the conquest of Perseus, demanded of the Athenians a philosopher and a painter, the former to instruct his children, and the latter to make a painting of his triumphs. Metrodorus was sent, as in him alone were united the philosopher and the painter. Plin. 35, c. 11.—Cic. 5, de Finib. 1, de Orat. 4. Acad.—Diog. in Epic.—A friend of Mithridates, sent as ambassador to Tigranes, king of Armenia. He was remarkable for his learning, moderation, humanity, and justice. He was put to death by his royal master for his infidelity, B. C. 72. Strab.—Plut.—Another, of a very retentive memory.

METULUM, a town of Liburnia, in besieging of which Augustus was wounded. Diog. 49.

MEVANIA, now Bevagna, a town of Umbria, on the Clitumnus, the birth-place of the poet Propertius. Lucan. 1, v. 473.—Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 124.

MEZENTIUS, a king of the Tyrrhenians when Æneas came into Italy. He was remarkable for his cruelties, and put his subjects to death by slow tortures, or sometimes tied a man to a dead corpse face to face, and suffered him to die in that condition. He was expelled by his subjects, and fled to Turnus, who employed him in his war against the Trojans. He was killed by Æneas, with his son Lausus. *Dionys. MICIPSA, a king of Numidia, son of Masinissa, who, at his death, B. C. 119, left his kingdom between his sons Adherbal and Hiempsal, and his nephew Jugurtha. Jugurtha abused his uncle's favours by murdering his two sons. Sallust. de Jug.—Flor. 3, c. 1.—Plut. in Gr.

MIDAS, a king of Phrygia. [vid. the end of this article.] In the early part of his life, according to some traditions, he found a large treasure to which he owed his greatness and opulence. The hospitality he showed to Silenus, the preceptor of Bacchus, who had been brought to him by some peasants, was liberally rewarded; and Midas, when he conducted the old man back to the god, was permitted to choose whatever recompense he pleased. He had the imprudence and the avarice to demand of the god that whatever he touched might be turned into gold. His prayer was granted, but he was soon convinced of his injudicious choice; and when the very meats which he attempted to eat became gold in his mouth, he begged Bacchus to take away a present which must prove so fatal to the receiver. He was ordered to wash himself in the river Pactolus, whose sands were turned into gold by the touch of Midas. Some time after this adventure, Midas had the imprudence to support that Pan was superior to Apollo in singing and in playing upon the flute, for which rash opinion the offended god changed his ears into those of an ass, to show his ignorance and stupidity. This Midas attempted to conceal from the knowledge of his subjects, but one of his servants saw the length of his ears, and being unable to keep the secret, and afraid to reveal it, apprehensive of the king's resentment, he opened a hole in the earth, and after he had whispered there that Midas had the ears of an ass, he covered the place as before, as if he had buried his words in the ground. On that place, as the poets mention, grew a number of reeds, which, when agitated by the wind, uttered the same sound that had been buried beneath, and published to the world that Midas had the ears of an ass. Some explain the fable of the ears of Midas by the supposition that he kept a number of informers and spies, who were continually employed in gathering every seditious word that might drop from the mouths of his subjects. Midas, according to Strabo, died of drinking bull's hot blood. This he did, as Plutarch mentions, to free himself from the numerous ill dreams which continually tormented him. Midas, according to some, was son of Cybele. He built a town which he called Ancyra. [According to the best accounts, Midas was king of the Bryges, a Thracian nation, who dwelt near Macedonia, and migrated with his subjects to Asia Minor, where they settled in that part which, from them, by a slight alteration of letters, was called Phrygia. The scene of the story respecting Silenus was in Thrace, but succeeding writers transferred it to Phrygia; and Xenophon, in his account of the younger Cyrus, mentions a fountain called that of Midas, near which he adds, however, that Midas himself caught the satyr Silenus, by mingling wine in its waters. The fable respecting Midas and the sands of the Pactolus has been explained as follows: Midas, frugal to avarice, reigned over a very rich country, and made considerable sums by the sale of his corn, wine, and cattle. His avarice afterwards changed its object, and having learned that the Pactolus furnished gold-dust, he abandoned the care of the country and employed his subjects in gathering the gold of that river which brought him a new and ample supply. Midas, on account of his attention to religion among his people, was reckoned a second Numa according to Justin. He appears to have been versed in the ceremonies and mysteries of Orpheus, which no doubt he learned in Thrace. Xenophon places the fountain of Midas on the road near Thymbrium.] *Ovid. MILESIUS, a surname of Apollo.—A native of Miletus.

MILÆTIUM, a town of Calabria, built by the people of Miletus of Asia.—A town of Crete. Homer. Il. 2, v. 154.

MILÆTUS, a son of Apollo, who fled from Crete to avoid the wrath of Minos, whom he meditated to dethrone. He came to Caria, where he built a city which he called by his own name. Some suppose that he only conquered a city there called Anactoria, which assumed his name. They farther say, that he put the inhabitants to the sword, and divided the women among his soldiers. Cyanea, a daughter of the Mæander, fell to his share. Strab.—Ovid. Met. 9, v. 446.—Paus. 7, c. 2.—Apollo. 3, c. 1.—A celebrated town of Asia Minor, the capital of all Ionia. [It was situate on the southern shore of the gulf into which the Mæander emptied, but this river gradually accumulated its deposit in this gulf, so that the town of Miletus was removed in process of time more than a league inland.] It was founded by a Cretan colony under Miletus, or, according to others, by Neleus, the son of Codrus, or by Sarpedon, Jupiter's son. [This city was anciently called Leleges, from the Leleges, afterwards Pityusa from the quantity of pines which its territory produced, at a later period Anactoria, and last of all Miletus.] The inhabitants were very powerful, and long maintained an obstinate war against the kings of Lydia. They early applied themselves to navigation, and planted no less than 80 colonies, or, according to Seneca, 380, in different parts of the world. Miletus gave birth to Thales, Anaximenes, Anaximander, Hecataeus, Timotheus the musician, Pittacus one of the seven wise men, &c. Miletus was also famous for a temple and an oracle of Apollo Didymæus, and for its excellent wool, with which were made stuffs and garments, held in the highest reputation both for softness, elegance, and beauty. The words Milesiæfabulæ, or Milesiaca, were used to express wanton and ludicrous plays, Ovid. Trist. 2, v. 413.—Capitolin. in Alb. 11.—*Virg. MILICHIUS, a freedman who discovered Piso's conspiracy against Nero. Tact. 15, Ann. c. 54.

MILÓ, a celebrated athlete of Crotona in Italy. His father's name was Diotimus. He early accustomed himself to carry the greatest burdens, and by degrees became a monster in strength. It is said that he carried on his shoulders a young bullock four years old, for above forty yards, and afterwards killed it with one blow of his fist, and eat it up in one day. He was seven times crowned at the Pythian games, and six at Olympia. He presented himself a seventh time, but no one had the courage or boldness to enter the lists against him. He was one of the disciples of Pythagoras, and to his uncommon strength, the learned preceptor and his pupils owed their life. The pillar which supported the roof of the school suddenly gave way, but Milo supported the whole weight of the building, and gave the philosopher and his auditors time to escape. In his old age Milo attempted to pull up a tree by the roots and break it. He partly effected it, but his strength being gradually exhausted, the tree when half cleft reunited, and his hands remained pinched in the body of the tree. He was then alone, and being unable to disentangle himself, he was eaten up by the wild beasts of the place, about 500 years before the Christian era. Ovid. Met. 15.—Cic. de Senect.—Val. Max. 9,

c. 12.—Strab. 16.—Paus. 6, c. 11.—T. Annius, a native of Lanuvium, who attempted to obtain the consulship at Rome by intrigue and seditious tumults. Clodius the tribune opposed his views, yet Milo would have succeeded, had not an unfortunate event totally frustrated his hopes. As he was going into the country, attended by his wife and a numerous retinue of gladiators and servants, he met on the Appian road his enemy Clodius, who was returning to Rome with three of his friends and some domestics completely armed. A quarrel arose between the servants. Milo supported his attendants, and the dispute became general. Clodius received many severe wounds, and was obliged to retire to a neighbouring cottage. Milo pursued his enemy in his retreat, and ordered his servants to despatch him. Eleven of the servants of Clodius shared his fate, as also the owner of the house who had given them reception. The body of the murdered tribune was carried to Rome, and exposed to public view. The enemies of Milo inveighed bitterly against the violence and barbarity with which the sacred person of a tribune had been treated. Cicero undertook the defence of Milo, but the continual clamours of the friends of Clodius, and the sight of an armed soldiery, which surrounded the seat of judgment, so terrified the orator, that he forgot the greatest part of his arguments, and the defence he made was weak and injudicious. Milo was condemned and banished to Massilia. Cicero soon after sent his exiled friend a copy of the oration which he had delivered in his defence, in the form in which we have it now; [and Milo, after he had read it, wrote, according to Dio Cassius, a letter to Cicero, in which he stated that it was a fortunate thing for himself that Cicero had not pronounced the oration which he sent, since otherwise he (Milo) would not then have been eating such fine mullets at Marseilles. This city was the place of his exile.] The friendship and cordiality of Cicero and Milo were the fruits of long intimacy and familiar intercourse. It was by the successful labours of Milo that the orator was recalled from banishment and restored to his friends. [This is altogether erroneous. Velleius Paterculus and Dio Cassius both contradict the fact of Milo's return, by what we find in their respective histories. According to Dio Cassius, Milo was the only one of the exiles whom Cæsar refused to recall, because, as is supposed, he had been active in exciting the people of Marseilles to resist Cæsar. Velleius Paterculus states that Milo returned without permission to Italy, and there busily employed himself in raising opposition to Cæsar during that commander's absence in Thessaly against Pompey. He adds, that Milo was killed by a blow of a stone while laying siege to Compa, a town of the Hirpini.] Cic. pro Milon.—Paterc. 2, c. 47 and 68.—Dio. 40.—A general of the forces of Pyrrhus. MILTIADES, an Athenian, son of Cypselus, who obtained a victory in a chariot race at the Olympic games, and led a colony of his countrymen to the Chersonesus. The causes of this appointment are striking and singular. The Thracian Dolonci, harassed by a long war with the Apsynthians, were directed by the oracle of Delphi to take for their king the first man they met in their return home, who invited them to come under his roof and partake of his entertainment. [The Dolonci, after receiving the oracle, returned by the sacred way, passed through Phocis and Bœotia, and, not being invited by either of these people, turned aside to Athens. Miltiades, as he sat in this city before the door of his house, observed the Dolonci passing by, and as by their dress and armour he perceived they were strangers, he called to them and offered them the rites of hospitality. They accepted his kindness, and being hospitably treated, revealed to him all the will of the oracle, with which they entreated his compliance. Miltiades, disposed to listen to them because weary of the tyranny of Pisistratus, first consulted the oracle at Delphi, and the answer being favourable, he went with the Dolonci. He was invested by the inhabitants of the Chersonese with sovereign power.] The first measure he took was to stop the farther incursions of the Apsynthians, by building a strong wall across the Isthmus. When he had established himself at home, and fortified his dominions against foreign invasion, he turned his arms against Lampsacus. His expedition was unsuccessful; he was taken in an ambuscade and made prisoner. His friend Cræsus, king of Lydia, was informed of his captivity, and he procured his release by threatening the people of Lampsacus with his severest displeasure. He lived a few years after he recovered his liberty. As he had no issue, he left his kingdom and possessions to Stesagoras the son of Cimon, who was his brother by the same mother. The memory of Miltiades was greatly honoured by the Dolonci, and they regularly celebrated festivals and exhibited shows in commemoration of a man to whom they owed their greatness and preservation. Some time after Stesagoras died without issue, and Miltiades, the son of Cimon, and the brother of the deceased, was sent by the Athenians with one ship to take possession of the Chersonesus. At his arrival Miltiades appeared mournful, as if lamenting the recent death of his brother. The principal inhabitants of the country visited the new governor to condole with him; but their confidence in his sincerity proved fatal to them. Miltiades seized their persons, and made himself absolute in Chersonesus; and to strengthen himself he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of Olorus the king of the Thracians. His prosperity, however, was of short duration. In the third year of his government his dominions were threatened by an invasion of the Scythian Nomades, whom Darius had some time before irritated by entering their country. He fled before them, but as their hostilities were but momentary, he was soon restored to his kingdom. Three years after he left Chersonesus and set sail for Athens, where he was received with great applause. He was present at the celebrated battle of Marathon, in which all the chief officers ceded their power to him, and left the event of the battle to depend upon his superior abilities. He obtained an important victory [vid. Marathon] over the more numerous forces of his adversaries; but when he had demanded of his fellow-citizens an olive-crown as the reward of his valour in the field of battle, he was not only refused, but severely reprimanded for presumption. The only reward, therefore, that he received for a victory which proved so beneficial to the interests of universal Greece, was in itself simple and inconsiderable, though truly great in the opinion of that age. He was represented in the front of a picture among the rest of the commanders who fought at the battle of Marathon, and he seemed to exhort and animate his soldiers to fight with courage and intrepidity. Some time after Miltiades was intrusted with a fleet of 70 ships, and ordered to punish those islands which had revolted to the Persians. He was successful at first, but a sudden report that the Persian fleet was coming to attack him, changed his operations as he was besieging Paros. He raised the siege and returned to Athens, where he was accused of treason, and particularly of holding correspondence with the enemy. The falsity of these accusations might have appeared, if Miltiades had been able to come into the assembly. A wound which he had received before Paros detained him at home, and his enemies, taking advantage of his absence, became more eager in their accusations and louder in their clamours. He was condemned to death, but the rigour of the sentence was retracted on the recollection of his great services to the Athenians, and he was put into prison till he had paid a fine of 50 talents to the state. His inability to discharge so great a sum detained him in confinement, and soon after his wounds became incurable, and he died about 489 years before the Christian era. His body was ransomed by his son Cimon, who was obliged to borrow and pay the 50 talents, to give his father a decent burial. The crimes of Miltiades were probably aggravated in the eyes of his countrymen, when they remembered how he made himself absolute in Chersonesus; and in condemning the barbarity of the Athenians towards a general who was the source of their military prosperity, we must remember the jealousy which ever reigns among a free and independent people, and how watchful they are in defence of the natural rights which they see wrested from others by violence and oppression. Cornelius Nepos has written the life of Miltiades the son of Cimon, but his history is incongruous and not authentic; and the author, by confounding the actions of the son of Cimon with those of the son of Cypselus, has made the whole dark and unintelligible. Greater reliance in reading the actions of both the Miltiades is to be placed on the narration of Herodotus, whose veracity is confirmed, and who was indisputably more informed and more capable of giving an account of the life and exploits of men who flourished in his age, and of which he could see the living monuments. Herodotus was born about six years after the famous battle of Marathon, and C. Nepos, as a writer of the Augustan age, flourished about 450 years after the age of the father of history. *C. MINNERMUS, a Greek poet and musician of Colophon in the age of Solon. He chiefly excelled in elegiac poetry, whence some have attributed the invention of it to him, and, indeed, he was the first poet who made elegy an amorous poem, instead of a mournful and melancholy tale. [He was a votary of love and pleasure, and is so distinguished by a line in Propertius,

Plus in amore valet Minnermi versus Homero.

Horace likewise refers to him in a similar connection, though in much stronger terms, Si Minnermus uti censet, sine amore jocisque Nil est jucundum, vivas in amore jocisque.

His manners are thought to have corresponded with his poetry.] In his old age Mimmermus became enamoured of a young girl called Nanno. Some few fragments of his poetry remain collected by Stobæus. He is supposed by some to be the inventor of the pentameter verse, which others, however, attribute to Callinus or Archilochus. The surname of Ligustiaides, λυγυς, (shrill voiced), has been applied to him, though some imagine the word to be the name of his father. Strab. 1 and 14.—Paus. 9, c. 29.—

MINÉIDES, the daughters of Mynas or Mineus, king of Orchomenos, in Bœotia. They were three in number, Leuconoe, Leucippe, and Alcithoe. Ovid calls the two first Clymene and Iris. They derided the orgies of Bacchus, for which impiety the god inspired them with an unconquerable desire of eating human flesh. They drew lots which of them should give up her son as food to the rest. The lot fell upon Leucippe, and she gave up her son Hippasus, who was instantly devoured by the three sisters. They were changed into bats. In commemoration of this bloody crime, it was usual among the Orchomenians for the high-priest, as soon as the sacrifice was finished, to pursue with a drawn sword all the women who had entered the temple, and even to kill the first he came up to. Ovid. Met. 4, fab. 12.—Plut. Quest. Gr. 38.

MINERVA, the goddess of wisdom, war, and all the liberal arts, was produced from Jupiter's brain without a mother. [vid. the end of this article.] The god, as it is reported, married Metis, whose superior prudence and sagacity above the rest of the gods, made him apprehend that the children of such an union would be of a more exalted nature, and more intelligent than their father. To prevent this, Jupiter devoured Metis in her pregnancy, and some time after, to relieve the pains which he suffered in his head, he ordered Vulcan to cleave it open. Minerva came all armed and grown up from her father's brain, and immediately was admitted into the assembly of the gods, and made one of the most faithful counsellors of her father. The power of Minerva was great in heaven; she could hurl the thunders of Jupiter, prolong the life of men, bestow the gift of prophecy, and, indeed, she was the only one of all the divinities whose authority and consequence were equal to those of Jupiter. The actions of Minerva are numerous, as well as the kindness by which she endeared herself to mankind. Her quarrel with Neptune concerning the right of giving a name to the capital of Cecropia deserves attention. The assembly of the gods settled the dispute by promising the preference to which ever of the two gave the most useful and necessary present to the inhabitants of the earth. Neptune, upon this, struck the ground with his trident, and immediately a horse issued from the earth. Minerva produced the olive, and obtained the victory by the unanimous voice of the gods, who observed that the olive, as the emblem of peace, is far preferable to the horse, the symbol of war and bloodshed. The victorious deity called the capital Athenæ, and became the tutelary goddess of the place. [Plutarch, in the life of Themistocles, explains the fabulous contest between

Minerva and Neptune by referring it to the endeavours of the ancient kings of Attica to withdraw their people from a sea-faring life to the labours of agriculture. Dr. Clark, however, in his "Travels in Greece, Egypt, and the Holy Land," thinks that it must have reference to the circumstance of the plains of Greece, and especially of Attica, having been rescued from retiring waters which were gradually carried off by evaporation and other causes, leaving behind, however, numerous lakes and marshes.] Minerva was always very jealous of her power, and the manner in which she punished the presumption of Arachne is well known. [vid. Arachne.] The attempts of Vulcan to offer her violence are strong marks of her virtue. Jupiter had sworn by the Styx to give to Vulcan, who made him a complete suit of armour, whatever he desired. Vulcan demanded Minerva, and the father of the gods, who had permitted Minerva to live in perpetual celibacy, consented, but privately advised his daughter to make all the resistance she could to frustrate the attempts of her lover. The prayers and the force of Vulcan proved ineffectual, and her chastity was not violated, though the god left on her body the marks of his passion, and, from the impurity which proceeded from this scuffle, and which Minerva threw down upon the earth wrapped up in wool, was born Erichthon, an uncommon monster. [vid. Erichthonius.] Minerva was the first who built a ship, and it was her zeal for navigation and her care for the Argonauts which placed the prophetic tree of Dodona behind the ship Argo when going to Colchis. She was known among the ancients by many names. She was called Athena, Pallas, [vid. Pallas,] Parthenos, from her remaining in perpetual celibacy; Tritonia, because worshipped near the lake Tritonis; Glaucopis, from the blueness of her eyes; Agorea, from her presiding over markets; Hippia, because she first taught mankind how to manage the horse; Stratea and Area, from her martial character; Coryphagenes, because born from Jupiter's brain; Sais, because worshipped at Sais, &c. Some attributed to her the invention of the flute, whence she was surnamed Andon, Luscinia, Musica, Salpiga, &c. She, as it is reported, once amused herself in playing upon her favourite flute before Juno and Venus, but the goddesses ridiculed the distortion of her face in blowing the instrument. Minerva, convinced of the justness of their remarks by looking at herself in a fountain near Mount Ida, threw away the musical instrument, and denounced a melancholy death to him who found it. Marsyas was the miserable proof of the veracity of her expressions. The worship of Minerva was universally established; she had magnificent temples in Egypt, Phœnicia, all parts of Greece, Italy, Gaul, and Sicily. Sais, Rhodes, and Athens, particularly claimed her attention, and it is even said, that Jupiter rained a shower of gold upon the island of Rhodes, which had paid so much veneration and such an early reverence to the divinity of his daughter. The festivals celebrated in her honour were solemn and magnificent. [vid. Panathenæa.] She was invoked by every artist, and particularly such as worked in wool, embroidery, painting, and sculpture. It was the duty of almost every member of society to implore the assistance and patronage of a deity who presided over sense, taste, and reason. Hence the poets have had occasion to say,

Tu nihil invitâ dices, faciesve Minervâ,

[i. e. against the bent of your nature or natural genius;] and,

Qui bene placârit Pallada, doctus erit.

Minerva was represented in different ways, according to different characters in which she appeared. She generally appeared with a countenance full more of masculine firmness and composure than of softness and grace. Most usually she was represented with a helmet on her head, with a large plume nodding in the air. In one hand she held a spear, and in the other a shield, with the dying head of Medusa upon it. Sometimes this Gorgon's head was on her breast-plate, with living serpents writhing round it, as well as round her shield and helmet. In most of her statues she is represented as sitting, and sometimes she holds, in one hand, a distaff instead of a spear. When she appeared as the goddess of the liberal arts, she was arrayed in a variegated veil, which the ancients called peplum. Sometimes Minerva's helmet was covered at the top with the figure of a cock, a bird which, on account of his great courage, is properly sacred to the goddess of war. Some of her statues represented her helmet with a sphinx in the middle, supported on either side by griffins. In some medals, a chariot drawn by four horses, or sometimes a dragon or a serpent, with winding spires, appear at the top of her helmet. She was partial to the olive-tree; the owl and the cock were her favourite birds, and the dragon among reptiles was sacred to her. The functions, offices, and actions of Minerva, seem so numerous that they undoubtedly originate in more than one person. Cicero speaks of five persons of this name; a Minerva, mother of Apollo; a daughter of the Nile, who was worshipped at Sais in Egypt; a third, born from Jupiter's brain; a fourth, daughter of Jupiter and Coryphe; and a fifth, daughter of Pallas, generally represented with winged shoes. This last put her father to death because he attempted her virtue. [It is probable that the Romans considered Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, as one and the same divinity, under three different names: among which names that of Jupiter might signify supreme goodness, that of Minerva supreme wisdom, and that of Juno supreme power. Thus, Cudworth in his "Intellectual System" observes, that the three Capitoline gods, Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, may be understood to have been nothing else than several names and notions of one supreme deity, according to its several attributes and manifestations.] Paus. 1, 2, 3, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 16, l. 3, od. 4.—Virg. Æn. 2, &c.—Strab. 6, 9 and 13.—Philost. Icon. 2.—Ovid. Fast. 3, &c. Met. 6.—*Cic. de Nat. MINOS, a king of Crete, son of Jupiter and Europa, who gave laws to his subjects B. C. 1406, [according to the Arundelian marbles, 1642 B. C. and according to Banier, 1340 B. C.] These still remained in full force in the age of the philosopher Plato. His justice and moderation procured him the appellation of the favourite of the gods, the confidant of Jupiter, the wise legislator, in every city of Greece; and, according to the poets, he was rewarded for his equity, after death, with the office of supreme and absolute judge in the infernal regions. In this capacity he is represented sitting in the middle of the shades, and holding a sceptre in his hand. The dead plead their different causes before him, and the impartial judge shakes the fatal urn, which is filled with the destinies of mankind. He married Ithona, by whom he had Lycastes, who was the father of Minos 2d. [Minos, in order to give greater authority to his laws, is said by some to have retired into a cave in Crete, where he feigned that Jupiter, his father, dictated them to him, and every time he returned from the cave he announced some new law. Huet makes Minos and Moses to have been the same; this, however, is going too far. Banier's opinion appears a better one, that some confused knowledge of the laws of Moses furnished Minos with a model for those of Crete. According to the poets, Minos, as chief president of the court in the lower world, decided all differences that arose between the other two judges, Æacus and Rhadamanthus, of whom the former judged the Europeans, and the latter the Asiatics and Africans.] *Homer. —The 2d. was a son of Lycastes, the son of Minos 1. and king of Crete. He married Pasiphae, the daughter of Sol and Perseis, and by her he had many children. He increased his paternal dominions by the conquest of the neighbouring islands, but he showed himself cruel in the war which he carried on against the Athenians, who had put to death his son Androgeus. [vid. Androgeus.] He took Megara by the treachery of Scylla, [vid. Scylla] and, not satisfied with a victory, he obliged the vanquished to bring him yearly to Crete seven chosen boys and the same number of virgins to be devoured by the Minotaur. [vid. Minotaurus] This bloody tribute was at last abolished when Theseus had destroyed the monster. [vid. Theseus.] When Dædalus, whose industry and invention had fabricated the labyrinth, and whose imprudence in assisting Pasiphae in the gratification of her unnatural desires, had offended Minos, fled from the place of the confinement with wings, [vid. Dædalus] and arrived safe in Sicily, the incensed monarch pursued the offender, resolved to punish his infidelity. Cocalus, king of Sicily, who had hospitably received Dædalus, entertained his royal guest with dissembled friendship; and that he might not deliver to him a man whose ingenuity and abilities he so well knew, he put Minos to death. Some say that it was the daughters of Cocalus who put the king of Crete to death, by detaining him so long in a bath till he fainted, after which they suffocated him. Minos died about 35 years before the Trojan war. He was father of Adrogeus, Glaucus, and Deucalion, and two daughters, Phædra and Ariadne. Many authors have confounded the two monarchs of this name, the grandfather and the grandson, but Homer, Plutarch, and Diodorus prove plainly that they were two different persons. Paus. in Ach. 4.—Plut. in Thes.—Hygin. fab. 44.—*Ovid. MINŌTAURUS, a celebrated monster, half a man and half a bull, according to this verse of Ovid, A. A. 2, v. 24, Semibovemque virum, semivirumque bovem.

It was the fruit of Pasiphae's amour with a bull. Minos refused to sacrifice a white bull to Neptune, an animal which he had received from the god for that purpose. This offended Neptune, and he made Pasiphae, the wife of Minos, enamoured of this fine bull, which had been refused to his altars. Dædalus prostituted his talents in being subservient to the queen's unnatural desires, and, by his means,

Pasiphae's horrible passions were gratified, and the Minotaur came into the world. Minos confined in the labyrinth a monster which convinced the world of his wife's lasciviousness and indecency, and reflected disgrace upon his family. The Minotaur usually devoured the chosen young men and maidens, which the tyranny of Minos yearly exacted from the Athenians. Theseus delivered his country from this shameful tribute, when it had fallen to his lot to be sacrificed to the voracity of the Minotaur, and, by means of Ariadne, the king's daughter, he destroyed the monster, and made his escape from the windings of the labyrinth. The fabulous tradition of the Minotaur and of the infamous commerce of Pasiphae with a favourite bull, has been often explained. Some suppose that Pasiphae was enamoured of one of her husband's courtiers, called Taurus, and that Dædalus favoured the passions of the queen by suffering his house to become the retreat of the two lovers. Pasiphae, some time after, brought twins into the world, one of whom greatly resembled Minos, and the other Taurus. In the natural resemblance of their countenance with that of their supposed fathers originated their name, and consequently the fable of the Minotaur. *Ovid. soon after this, fought with ill success against Annibal, and was saved by the interference of Fabius; which circumstance had such an effect upon him, that he laid down his power at the feet of his deliverer, and swore that he would never act again but by his directions. D. He was educated to the profession of the law, and became an eminent pleader at Rome, where he renounced the heathen religion and embraced that of Christ.] He has written an elegant dialogue in defence of the Christian religion, called Octavius, from the principal speaker in it. [The dialogue is between a heathen and a Christian, in which Minutius himself sits as a judge and moderator. By this contrivance he replies to the objections and arguments brought forward by the adversary, and refutes the calumny cast upon Christianity by the heathen philosophers, and at the same time exposes the absurdities of their creed and worship, powerfully demonstrating the reasonableness and excellence of the Christian religion.] This book was long attributed to Arnobius, and even printed as an 8th book (Octavius), till Balduin discovered the imposition in his edition of Felix, 1560. The two last editions are that of Davies, 8vo. Cantab. 1712; and of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1709.

MINYÆ, a name given to the inhabitants of Orchomenos, in Bœotia, from Minyas, king of the country. Orchomenos, the son of Minyas, gave his name to the capital of the country, and the inhabitants still retained their original appellation in contradistinction to the Orchomenians of Arcadia. A colony of Orchomenians passed into Thessaly and settled in Iolchos; from which circumstance the people of the place, and particularly the Argonauts, were called Minyæ. This name they received, according to the opinion of some, not because a number of Orchomenians had settled among them, but because the chief and noblest of them were descended from the daughters of Minyas. Part of the Orchomenians accompanied the sons of Codrus when they migrated to Ionia. The descendants of the Argonauts, as well as the Argonauts themselves, received the name of Minyæ. They first inhabited Lemnos, where they had been born from the Lemnian women who had murdered their husbands. They were driven from Lemnos by the Pelasgi about 1160 years before the Christian era, and came to settle in Laconia, from whence they passed into Calliste by a colony of Lacedæmonians. Hygin. fab. 14.—Paus. 9, c. 6.—Apollon. 1. arg.—Herodot. 4, c. 145.

MINYAS, a king of Bœotia, son of Neptune and Tritogenia, the daughter of Æolus. Some make him the son of Neptune and Callirhoe, or of Chryses, Neptune's son, and Chryso-genia, the daughter of Halmus. He married Clytadora, by whom he had Presbon, Periclemeus, and Eteoclymenus. He was father of Orchomenos, Diocithondes, and Athamas, by a second marriage with Phanasora, the daughter of Paon. According to Plutarch and Ovid, he had three daughters, called Leucœnoe, Alcithoe, and Leucippe. They were changed into bats. (vid. Mineides.) Paus. 9, c. 36.—Plut. Quæst. Græc. 33.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 1 and 468.

MINEIDES. (vid. Mineides.)

MINYIA, a festival observed at Orchomenos in honour of Minyas, the king of the place. The Orchomenians were called Minyæ, and the river upon whose banks their town was built, Mynos.—A small island near Patmos.

MISENUM or MISENUS. (vid. Misenus.)

MISENUS, a son of Æolus, who was trumpeter to Hector. After Hector's death he followed Æneas to Italy, and was drowned on the coast of Campania, because he had challenged one of the Tritons. Æneas afterwards found his body on the sea-shore, and buried it on a promontory which bears his name, now Miseno. There was also a town of the same name on the promontory at the west of the bay of Naples, and it had also a capacious harbour, where Augustus and some of the Roman emperors generally kept stationed one of their fleets. [The station of the fleet in the upper sea was at Ravenna.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 239, 1. 6, v. 164 and 234.—Strab. 5.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Liv. 24, c. 13.—Tacit. H. 2, c. 9. An. 15, c. 51.

MISITHEUS, a Roman celebrated for his virtues and his misfortunes. He was father-in-law to the emperor Gordian, whose counsels and actions he guided by his prudence and moderation. He was sacrificed to the ambition of Philip, a wicked senator, who succeeded him as præfect of the prætorian guards. He died A. D. 243, and left all his possessions to be appropriated for the good of the public.

MITHRAS, a god of Persia, supposed to be the sun, or, according to others, Venus Urania. His worship was introduced at Rome, and the Romans raised him altars, on which was this inscription, Deo Soli Mithræ, or Soli Deo invicto Mithræ. He is generally represented as a young man, whose head is covered with a turban after the manner of the Persians. He supports his knee upon a bull that lies on the ground, and one of whose horns he holds in one hand, while with the other he plunges a dagger into his neck.

MITHRADATES, a herdsman of Astyages, ordered to put young Cyrus to death. He refused, and educated him at home as his own son, &c. Herodot.—Justin.

MITHRIDATES 1st, was the third king of Pontus. He was tributary to the crown of Persia, and his attempts to make himself independent proved fruitless. He was conquered in a battle, and obtained peace with difficulty. Xenophon calls him merely a governor of Cappadocia. He was succeeded by Ariobarzanes, B. C. 363. Diod.—Xenoph.—The second of that name, king of Pontus, was grandson to Mithridates I. He made himself master of Pontus, which had been conquered by Alexander, and been ceded to Antigonus at the general division of the Macedonian empire among the conqueror's generals. He reigned about 26 years, and died at the advanced age of 84 years, B. C. 302. He was succeeded by his son Mithridates III. Some say that Antigonus put him to death, because he favoured the cause of Cassander. Appian. Mith.—Diod.—The III. was son of the preceding monarch. He enlarged his paternal possessions by the conquest of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, and died after a reign of 36 years. Diod.—The IV. succeeded his father Ariobarzanes, who was the son of Mithridates III.—The V. succeeded his father Mithridates IV. and strengthened himself on his throne by an alliance with Antiochus the Great, whose daughter Laodice he married. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces.—The VI. succeeded his father Pharnaces. He was the first of the kings of Pontus who made alliance with the Romans. He furnished them with a fleet in the third Punic war, and assisted them against Arstonicus, who laid claim to the kingdom of Pergamus. This fidelity was rewarded; he was called Euergetes, and received from the Roman people the province of Phrygia Major, and was called the friend and ally of Rome. He was murdered B. C. 123. Appian. Mithr.—Justin. 37, &c.—The VII. surnamed Eupator and The Great, succeeded his father Mithridates VI. though only at the age of 11 years. The beginning of his reign was marked by ambition, cruelty, and artifice. He murdered his own mother, who had been left by his father coheir of the kingdom, and he fortified his constitution by drinking antidotes against the poison with which his enemies at court attempted to destroy him. He early inured his body to hardship, and employed himself in many manly exercises, often remaining whole months in the country, and making the frozen snow and the earth the place of his repose. Naturally ambitious and cruel, he spared no pains to acquire himself power and dominion. He murdered the two sons whom his sister Laodice had had by Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, and placed one of his own children, only eight years old, on the vacant throne. These violent proceedings alarmed Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, who had married Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes. He suborned a youth to be king of Cappadocia, as the third son of Ariarathes, and Laodice was sent to Rome to impose upon the senate, and assure them that her third son was now alive, and that his pretensions to the kingdom of Cappadocia were just and well grounded. Mithridates used the same arts of dissimulation. He also sent to Rome Gaudius, the governor of his son, who solemnly declared before the Roman people, that the youth who sat on the throne of Cappadocia was the third son and lawful heir of Ariarathes, and that he was supported as such by Mithridates. This intricate affair displeased the Roman senate, and, finally to settle the dispute between the two monarchs, the powerful arbiters took away the kingdom of Cappadocia from Mithridates, and Paphlagonia from Nicomedes. These two kingdoms being thus separated from their original possessors, were presented with their freedom and independence; but the Cappadocians refused it, and received Ariobarzanes for king. Such were the first seeds of enmity between Rome and the king of Pontus. [vid. Mithridaticum bellum.] Mithridates never lost an opportunity by which he might lessen the influence of his adversaries; and the more effectually to destroy their power in Asia, he ordered all the Romans that were in his dominions to be massacred. This was done in the night, and no less than 150,000, according to Plutarch, or 80,000 Romans, as Appian mentions, were made, at one blow, the victims of his cruelty. This universal massacre called aloud for revenge. Aquilius, and soon after Sylla, marched against Mithridates with a large army. The former was made prisoner, but Sylla obtained a victory over the king's generals, and another decisive engagement rendered him master of all Greece, Macedonia, Ionia, and Asia Minor, which had submitted to the victorious arms of the monarch of Pontus. This ill fortune was aggravated by the loss of about 200,000 men, who were killed in the several engagements that had been fought; and Mithridates, weakened by repeated ill success by sea and land, sued for peace from the conqueror, which he obtained on condition of defraying the expenses which the Romans had incurred by the war, and of remaining satisfied with the possessions which he had received from his ancestors. While these negotiations of peace were carried on, Mithridates was not unmindful of his real interest. His poverty, and not his inclinations, obliged him to wish for peace. He immediately took the field with an army of 140,000 infantry, and 16,000 horse, which consisted of his own forces and those of his son-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. With such a numerous army he soon made himself master of the Roman provinces in Asia; none dared to oppose his conquests, and the Romans, relying on his fidelity, had withdrawn the greatest part of their armies from the country. The news of his warlike preparations was no sooner heard, than Lucullus, the consul, marched into Asia, and, without delay, he blocked up the camp of Mithridates, who was then besieging Cyzicus. The Asiatic monarch escaped from him, and fled into the heart of his kingdom. Lucullus pursued him with the utmost celerity, and would have taken him prisoner after a battle, had not the avidity of his soldiers preferred the plundering of a mule loaded with gold to the taking of a monarch who had exercised such cruelties against their countrymen, and shown himself so faithless to the most solemn engagements. After this escape, Mithridates was more careful about the safety of his person, and he even ordered his wives and sisters to destroy themselves, fearful of their falling into the enemy's hands. The appointment of Glabrio to the command of the Roman forces instead of Lucullus, was favourable to Mithridates, and he recovered the greatest part of his dominions. The sudden arrival of Pompey, however, soon put an end to his victories. A battle, in the night, was fought near the Euphrates, in which the troops of Pontus laboured under every disadvantage. The engagement was by moonlight, and, as the moon then shone in the face of the enemy, the lengthened shadows of the arms of the Romans having induced Mithridates to believe that the two armies were close together, the arrows of his soldiers were darted from a great distance, and their efforts rendered ineffectual. An universal overthrow ensued; Mithridates, bold in his misfortunes, rushed through the thick ranks of the enemy, at the head of 800 horsemen, 500 of which perished in the attempt to follow him. He fled to Tigranes, but that monarch refused an asylum to his father-in-law, whom he had before supported with all the collected forces of his kingdom. Mithridates found a safe retreat among the Scythians, and, though destitute of power, friends, and resources, yet he meditated the destruction of the Roman empire, by penetrating into the heart of Italy by land. These wild projects were rejected by his followers, and he sued for peace. It was denied to his ambassadors, and the victorious Pompey declared, that, to obtain it, Mithridates must ask it in person. He scorned to trust himself into the hands of his enemy, and resolved to conquer or to die. His subjects refused to follow him any longer, and they revolted from him, and made his son Pharnaces king. The son showed himself ungrateful to his father, and even, according to some writers, ordered him to be put to death. This unnatural treatment broke the heart of Mithridates; he obliged his wife to poison herself, and attempted to do the same himself. It was in vain; the frequent antidotes he had taken in the early part of his life strengthened his constitution against the poison, and, when this was unavailing, he attempted to stab himself. The blow was not mortal; and a Gaul, who was then present, at his own request, gave him the fatal stroke, about 63 years before the Christian era, in the 72d year of his age.

Such were the misfortunes, abilities, and miserable end of a man who supported himself so long against the power of Rome, and who, according to the declaration of the Roman authors, proved a more powerful and indefatigable adversary to the capital of Italy than the great Annibal, and Pyrrhus, Perseus, or Antiochus. Mithridates has been commended for his eminent virtues, and censured for his vices. As a commander he deserves the most unbounded applause, and it may create admiration to see him waging war with such success during so many years, against the most powerful people on earth, led to the field by a Sylla, a Lucullus, and a Pompey. He was the greatest monarch that ever sat on a throne, according to the opinion of Cicero; and, indeed, no better proof of his military character can be brought, than the mention of the great rejoicing which happened in the Roman armies and in the capital at the news of his death. No less than twelve days were appointed for public thanksgivings to the immortal gods, and Pompey, who had sent the first intelligence of his death to Rome, and who had partly hastened his fall, was rewarded with the most uncommon honours. [vid. Ampia lex.] It is said, that Mithridates conquered 24 nations, whose different languages he knew, and spoke with the same ease and fluency as his own. As a man of letters he also deserves attention. He was acquainted with the Greek language, and even wrote in that dialect a treatise on botany. His skill in physic is well known, and even now there is a celebrated antidote which bears his name, and is called Mithridate. Superstition, as well as nature, had united to render him great; and if we rely upon the authority of Justin, his birth was accompanied by the appearance of two large comets, which were seen for seventy days successively, and whose splendour eclipsed the mid-day sun, and covered the fourth part of the heavens. Justin. 37, c. 1, &c.—Strab.—Diod. 14.—Flor. 3, c. 5, &c.—*Plut. in Syll. MITHRIDATICUM BELLUM, begun 89 years B. C. was one of the longest and most celebrated wars ever carried on by the Romans against a foreign power. The ambition of Mithridates, from whom it receives its name, may be called the cause and origin of it. His views upon the kingdom of Cappadocia, of which he was stripped by the Romans, first engaged him to take up arms against the republic. Three Roman officers, L. Cassius, the proconsul, M. Aquilius, and Q. Oppius, opposed Mithridates with the troops of Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, and Gallo-Græcia. The army of these provinces, together with the Roman soldiers in Asia, amounted to 70,000 men, and 6000 horse. The forces of the king of Pontus were greatly superior to these; he led 250,000 foot, 40,000 horse, and 130 armed chariots, into the field of battle, under the command of Neoptolemus and Archelaus. His fleet consisted of 400 ships of war, well manned and provisioned. In an engagement the king of Pontus obtained the victory, and dispersed the Roman forces in Asia. He became master of the greatest part of Asia, and the Hellespont submitted to his power. Two of the Roman generals were taken, and M. Aquilius, who was the principal cause of the war, was carried about in Asia, and exposed to the ridicule and insults of the populace, and at last put to death by Mithridates, who ordered melted gold to be poured down his throat, as a slur upon the avidity of the Romans. The conqueror took every possible advantage; he subdued all the islands of the Ægean Sea, and, though Rhodes refused to submit to his power, yet all Greece was soon overrun by his general Archelaus, and made tributary to the kingdom of Pontus. Meanwhile the Romans, incensed against Mithridates on account of his perfidy, and of his cruelty in massacring 30,000 of their countrymen in one day all over Asia, appointed Sylla to march into the east. Sylla landed in Greece, where the inhabitants readily acknowledged his power; but Athens shut her gates against the Roman commander, and Archelaus, who defended it, defeated, with the greatest courage, all the efforts and operations of the enemy. This spirited defence was of short duration. Archelaus retreated into Bœotia, where Sylla soon followed him. The two hostile armies drew up in a line of battle near Chæroneæ, and the Romans obtained the victory, and, of the almost innumerable forces of the Asiatics, no more than 10,000 escaped. Another battle in Thessaly, near Orchomenos, proved equally fatal to the king of Pontus. Dorylaus, one of his generals, was defeated, and he soon after sued for peace. Sylla listened to the terms of accommodation, as his presence at Rome was now become necessary to quell the commotions and cabals which his enemies had raised against him. He pledged himself to the king of Pontus to confirm him in the possession of his dominions, and to procure him the title of friend and ally of Rome; and Mithridates consented to relinquish Asia and Paphlagonia, to deliver Cappadocia to Ariobarzanes, and Bithynia to Nicomedes, and to pay to the Romans 200 talents to defray the expenses of the war, and to deliver into their hands 70 galleys with all their rigging. Though Mithridates seemed to have re-established peace in his dominions, yet Fimbria, whose sentiments were contrary to those of Sylla, and who made himself master of any army by intrigue and oppression, kept him under continual alarms, and rendered the existence of his power precarious. Sylla, who had returned from Greece to ratify the treaty which had been made with Mithridates, rid the world of the tyrannical Fimbria; and the king of Pontus, awed by the resolution and determined firmness of his adversary, agreed to the conditions, though with reluctance. The hostile preparations of Mithridates, which continued in the time of peace, became suspected by the Romans, and Muræna, who was left as governor of Asia in Sylla's absence, and who wished to make himself known by some conspicuous action, began hostilities by taking Comana, and plundering the temple of Bellona. Mithridates did not oppose him, but he complained of the breach of peace before the Roman senate. Muræna was publicly reprimanded; but, as he did not cease from hostilities, it was early understood that he acted by the private directions of the Roman people. The king upon this marched against him, and a battle was fought, in which both the adversaries claimed the victory. This was the last blow which the king of Pontus received in this war, which is called the second Mithridatic war, and which continued for about three years. Sylla, at that time, was made perpetual dictator at Rome, and he commanded Muræna to retire from the kingdom of Mithridates. The death of Sylla changed the face of affairs; the treaty of peace between the king of Pontus and the Romans, which had never been committed to writing, demanded frequent explanations, and Mithridates at last threw off the mask of friendship, and declared war. Nicomedes, at his death, left his kingdom to the Romans, but Mithridates disputed their right to the possessions of the deceased monarch, and entered the field with 120,000 men, besides a fleet of 400 ships in his ports, 16,000 horsemen to follow him, and 100 chariots armed with scythes. Lucullus was appointed over Asia, and trusted with the care of the Mithridatic war. His valour and prudence showed his merit; and Mithridates, in his vain attempts to take Cyzicum, lost no less than 300,000 men. Success continually attended the Roman arms. The king of Pontus was defeated in several bloody engagements, and with difficulty saved his life, and retired to his son-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. Lucullus pursued him, and when his application for the person of the fugitive monarch had been despised by Tigranes, he marched to the capital of Armenia, and terrified, by his sudden approach, the numerous forces of the enemy. A battle ensued. The Romans obtained an easy victory, and no less than 100,000 foot of the Armenians perished, and only five men of the Romans were killed. Tigranocerta, the rich capital of the country, fell into the conqueror's hands. After such signal victories, Lucullus had the mortification to see his own troops mutiny, and to be dispossessed of the command by the arrival of Pompey. The new general showed himself worthy to succeed Lucullus. He defeated Mithridates, and rendered his affairs so desperate, that the monarch fled for safety into the country of the Scythians, where, for a while, he meditated the ruin of the Roman empire, and with more wildness than prudence, secretly resolved to invade Italy by land, and march an army across the northern wilds of Asia and Europe to the Appenines. Not only the kingdom of Mithridates had fallen into the enemy's hands, but also all the neighbouring kings and princes were subdued, and Pompey saw prostrate at his feet Tigranes himself, that king of kings who had lately treated the Romans with such contempt. Meantime, the wild projects of Mithridates terrified his subjects; and they, fearful to accompany him in a march of above 2000 miles across a barren and uncultivated country, revolted and made his son king. The monarch, forsaken in his old age, even by his own children, put an end to his life, (vid. Mithridates VII.) and gave the Romans cause to rejoice, as the third Mithridatic war was ended in his fall, B. C. 63. Such were the unsuccessful struggles of Mithridates against the power of Rome. He was always full of resources, and the Romans had never a greater or more dangerous war to sustain. The duration of the Mithridatic war is not precisely known. According to Justin, Orosius, Florus, and Eutropius, it lasted for forty years; but the opinion of others, who fix its duration to 30 years, is far more credible; and, indeed, by proper calculation, there elapsed no more than 26 years from the time that Mithridates first entered the field against the Romans, till the time of his death. Apian. in Mithrid.—Justin. 37, &c.—Flor. 2, &c.—Liv.—Plut. in Luc. &c.—Orostus.—Paterc.—Dion.

It was greatly commended by the ancients for the stateliness of its buildings, and the fruitfulness of its soil, but more particularly for the great men it produced. Pittacus, Alcæus, Sappho, Terpander, Theophanes, Hellenicus, &c. were all natives of Mitylene. It was long a seat of learning, and, with Rhodes and Athens, it had the honour of having educated many of the great men of Rome and Greece. In the Peloponnesian war the Mityleneans suffered greatly for their revolt from the power of Athens; and, in the Mithridatic wars, they had the boldness to resist the Romans, and disdain the treaties which had been made between Mithridates and Sylla. Cic. de leg. ag.—Strab. 13.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Diod. 3 and 12.—Paterc. 1, c. 4.—Horat. 1, od. 7, &c.—Thucyd. 3, &c.—Plut. in Pomp. &c.

MŒRIS, [a lake of Egypt, supposed to have been the work of a king of the same name, concerning the situation and extent, and even the existence of which authors have differed. It has been represented as the boldest and most wonderful of all the works of the kings of Egypt, and accordingly Herodotus considers it superior even to the pyramids and labyrinth. As to its situation, Herodotus and Strabo mark it out by placing the labyrinth on its borders, and by fixing the towns which were around it, such as Achantus to the south, Aphroditopolis towards the east, and Arsinoe to the north. Diodorus and Pliny confirm this statement by placing it at 24 leagues from Memphis, between the province of that name and Arsinoe. The position thus indicated is supposed to answer to the modern Birket-Caroun, a lake more than 50 leagues in circumference. Herodotus makes the lake Mœris 3600 stadia in circumference, and its greatest depth 200 cubits. Bossuet has vindicated the statement of its large extent, against the raillery of Voltaire. Rollin, however, deeming it to be incredible, adopts the opinion of Pomponius Mela, and makes it 20,000 paces. D'Anville, with a view of reconciling the contending parties, has marked on his map of Egypt, two lakes of this name, one of which is in fact a canal running parallel with the Nile; this he makes the Mœris of Herodotus and Diodorus, while the other is situate to the north-west, and corresponds, according to him, with the Mœris of Strabo and Ptolemy. This last is the Birket-Caroun mentioned above; the former, which still subsists, is known by the name of Bahr Jouseph, or Joseph's river. It opens near Tarout Eccheriff, and ends near Birket-Caroun. The explanation given by Malte-Brun is, however, the simplest. He supposes that the canal dignified with the name of Joseph, like many other remarkable works, was executed by order of king Mœris. The waters then filled the basin of the lake Birket-Caroun, which received the name of the prince who effected this great change. Thus a reason is given why the ancients say that the lake was of artificial formation, while the Birket-Caroun gives no evidence of any such operation. If we listen, however, merely to the relation of Herodotus, the lake Mœris was entirely the work of human art; and to show this, two pyramids were to be seen in its centre, each of which was 200 cubits above and as many below the water, while on the summit of each was a colossus in a sitting posture. The object of the excavation was to regulate the inundations of the Nile. When the waters of the river were high, a large portion were carried off by the canal to the lake, in order that it might not remain too long on the soil of Egypt, (lower at that time than in our days,) and occasion sterility; when the inundation had declined, a second one was produced by the waters in lake Mœris. The lapse of nearly 1200 years has made a great change in this as in the other Egyptian works of art. Mœris is now nearly 50 leagues in circumference. It might still, however, be made to answer its ancient purposes, if the canal of Joseph were cleared of the immense quantity of mud collected in it, and the dykes restored. The pyramids in this lake were no longer visible in the time of Strabo. The lake itself is said to have afforded a most abundant supply of fish. The profits of this fishery were appropriated to find the queen with clothes and perfumes.]—A king of Egypt. MÆSIA, [a country of Europe, bounded on the west by Pannonia and Illyricum, on the south by Macedonia and Thrace, on the east by the Euxine, and on the north by the Danube, occupying the present provinces of Serbia and Bulgaria. Under the reign of Augustus it was reduced to a Roman province under the names of Mœsia Superior, nearer to Pannonia, and Mœsia Inferior, nearer to Thrace. The centre of Mœsia was called Dacia Cis-Danubiana, or Dacia Aureliani, by the emperor Aurelian, when he abandoned the province beyond the Danube called Dacia Trajani.] Plin. 3, c. 26.—Virg. G. 1, v. 102.

MOLEIA, a festival in Arcadia, in commemoration of a battle in which Lycurgus obtained the victory.

MORO, a philosopher of Rhodes, called also Apollonius. Some are of opinion that Apollonius and Molo are two different persons, who were both natives of Alabanda, and disciples of Menecles of the same place. They both visited Rhodes, and there opened a school, but Molo flourished some time after Apollonius. Molo had Cicero and J. Cæsar among his pupils. (vid. Apollonius.) Cic. de Orat.—A prince of Syria, who revolted against Antiochus, and killed himself when his rebellion was attended with ill success.

MOLÔEIS, a river of Bœotia, near Plataea.

MOLORCUS, an old shepherd near Cleonæ, who received Hercules with great hospitality. The hero, to repay the kindness he received, destroyed the Nemæan lion, which laid waste the neighbouring country, and therefore the Nemæan games, instituted on this occasion, are to be understood by the words Ludus Molorchii. There were two festivals instituted in his honour, called Molorchææ. Martial. 9, ep. 44, l. 14, ep. 44.—Apollod. 2, c. 5.—Virg. G. 3, v. 19.—Stat. Theb. 4, v. 160.

MOLOSSI, a people of Epirus, who inhabited that part of the country which was called Molossia or Molossis from king Molossus. This country had the bay of Ambracia on the south, and the country of the Perthæbeans on the east. The dogs of the place were famous, and received the name of Molossi among the Romans. Dodona was the capital of the country according to some writers. Others, however, reckon it as the chief city of Thesprotia. Lucret. 5, v. 10, 62.—Lucan. 4, v. 440.—Strab. 7.—Liv.—Justin. 7, c. 6.—C. Nep. 2, c. 8.—Virg. G. 3, v. 495.—Horat. 2, Sat. 6, v. 114.

MOLOSSIA, or MOLOSSIS. vid. Molossi.

MOLOSSUS, a son of Pyrrhus and Andromache. He reigned in Epirus after the death of Helenus, and part of his dominions received the name of Molossia from him. Paus. 1, c. 11.—A surname of Jupiter in Epirus.

MOLPUS, an author who wrote an history of Lacedæmon.

MOLYCRION, a town of Æolia between the Evenus and Naupactum. Paus. 5, c. 3.

MOMUS, the god of pleasantry among the ancients, son of Nox, according to Hesiod. He was continually employed in satirizing the gods, and whatever they did was freely turned to ridicule. He blamed Vulcan, because, in the human form which he had made of clay, he had not placed a window in his breast, by which, whatever was done or thought there might be easily brought to light. [Vitruvius ascribes this reflection to Socrates.] He censured the house which Minerva had made, because the goddess had not made it moveable, by which means a bad neighbourhood might be avoided. In the bull which Neptune had produced, he observed that his blows might have been surer if his eyes had been placed nearer the horns. Venus herself was exposed to his satire; and when the sneering god had found no fault in the body of the naked goddess, he observed as she retired, that the noise of her slippers was too loud, and greatly improper in the goddess of beauty. These illiberal reflections upon the gods were the cause that Momus was driven from heaven. He is generally represented raising a mask from his face, and holding a small figure in his hand. Hesiod. in Theog.—Lucian. in Herm.

MONA, an island between Britain and Hibernia, anciently inhabited by a number of Druids. It is supposed by some to be the modern island of Anglesey, and by others, the island of Man. [The Mona described by Tacitus in his life of Agricola, is the isle of Anglesea; and the one described by Cæsar, the isle of Man.] The former was the great seat of the Druids. vid. Ierne. Tacit. 14, Ann. c. 13 and 29.

MONÆSES, a king of Parthia, who favoured the cause of M. Antony against Augustus. Horat. 3, od. 6, c. 9.

MONDA, a river, between the Durius and Tagus, in Portugal, [now the Mondego.] Plin. 4, c. 22.

MONĒTA, a surname of Juno among the Romans. She received it because she warned them to sacrifice a pregnant sow to Cybele, to avert an earthquake. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 15.—Livy says, (7, c. 28,) that a temple was vowed to Juno, under this name, by the dictator Furius, when the Romans waged war against the Aurunci, and that the temple was raised to the goddess by the senate on the spot where the house of Manlius Capitolinus had formerly stood.—Suidas, however, says, that Juno was surnamed Moneta, from assuring the Romans, when in the war against Pyrrhus they complained of want of pecuniary resources, that money never could fail to those who cultivated justice. [Money was coined in the temple of Juno Moneta, whence our English term money. This goddess is represented upon medals with the instruments of coinage, the hammer, the anvil, the pincers, and the die, with the Latin word Moneta.]

MONĪMA, a beautiful woman of Miletus, whom Mithridates the Great married. When his affairs grew desperate, Mithridates ordered his wives to destroy themselves; Monima attempted to strangle herself, but when her efforts were unavailing, she ordered one of her attendants to stab her. Plut. in Luc.

MONÓDUS, a son of Prusias. He had one continued bone instead of a row of teeth whence his name (μονῶς, ὀδῶς). Plin. 7, c. 16.

MONÆCUS [or Herculis Monæci Portus, a maritime town in the south-west corner of Liguria, near Nicea, where Hercules had a temple.] It is now Monaco. Strab. 4.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 830.

MONS SACER, a mountain about three miles from Rome,] where the Roman populace retired in a tumult, which was the cause of the election of the tribunes.

MONS SEVĒRUS, a mountain near Rome, &c.

MONTĀNUS, a poet who wrote in hexameter and elegiac verses. Ovid. ex Pont. 4.

MONŪCHUS, a powerful giant, who could root up trees and hurl them like a javelin. He receives his name from his having a solid hoof, as the word implies. Juv. 1, v. 11.

MONŪMUS, a servant of Corinth, who, not being permitted by his master to follow Diogenes the Cynic, pretended madness, and obtained his liberty. He became a great admirer of the philosopher, and also of Crates, and even wrote something in the form of facetious stories. Diog. Laert.

MOPSIUM, a hill and town of Thessaly, between Tempe and Larissa. Liv. 42.

MOPSOPĪA, an ancient name of Athens, from Mopsus one of its kings, and from thence the epithet of Mopsopi is often applied to an Athenian.

MOPSIHESTIA, or Mopsos, a town of Cilicia near the sea. [The name is supposed to come from Μόψου ἱστῆια, "the home of Mopsus," from a tradition that the city was founded by Mopsus after the Trojan war. It was situate to the south-west of Anazarbus, on the banks of the river Pyramus. Its early origin, however, is contradicted by the silence of Xenophon, and also of the historians of Alexander. Strabo is the first who mentions it.] Cic. Fam. 3, c. 8.

MOPSUS, a celebrated prophet, son of Manto and Apollo, during the Trojan war. He was consulted by Amphimachus, king of Colophon, who wished to know what success would attend his arms in a war which he was going to undertake. He predicted the greatest calamities; but Calchas, who had been a soothsayer of the Greeks during the Trojan war, promised the greatest successes. Amphimachus followed the opinion of Calchas, but the opinion of Mopsus was fully verified. This had such an effect upon Calchas that he died soon after. His death is attributed by some to another mortification of the same nature. The two soothsayers, jealous of each other's fame, came to a trial of their skill in divination. Calchas first asked his antagonist how many figs a neighbouring tree bore; ten thousand except one, replied Mopsus, and one single vessel can contain them all. The figs were gathered and his conjectures were true. Mopsus now, to try his adversary, asked him how many young ones a certain pregnant sow would bring forth. Calchas confessed his ignorance, and Mopsus immediately said, that the sow would bring forth on the morrow ten young ones, of which only one should be a male, all black, and that the females should all be known by their white streaks. The morrow proved the veracity of his prediction, and Calchas died by excess of the grief which his defeat produced. Mopsus after death was ranked among the gods; and had an oracle at Malia, celebrated for the true and decisive answers which it gave. Strab. 9.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Ammian. 14, c. 8.—Plut. de orac. defect.—A son of Ampyx and Chloris, born at Titaressa in Thessaly. He was the prophet and soothsayer of the Argonauts, and died at his return from Colchis by the bite of a serpent in Libya. Jason erected him a monument on the sea-shore, where afterwards the Africans built him a temple where he gave oracles. He has often been confounded with the son of Manto, as their professions and their names were alike. Hygin. fab. 14, 128, 173.—Strab. 9.—A shepherd of that name in Virg. Ecl.

MORGANTIUM, (or IA), a town of Sicily, near the mouth of the Simethus. Cic. in Verr. 3, c. 18.

MORINI, a people of Belgic Gaul, on the shores of the British ocean. [Their name is derived from the Celtic Mor, which signifies the sea, denoting a maritime people.] The shortest passage in Britain was from their territories. They were called extremi hominum by the Romans, because situate on the extremities of Gaul. Their city, called Morinorum castellum, is now Mount Cassel, in Artois;

and Morinorum civitas, is Terouenne, on the Ris. [Pliny says that their country swarmed with geese, and that these furnished a principal article of trade. He adds, that their linen cloth was also a commodity in which they had considerable traffic.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 726.—Cæs. 4, Bell. G. 21.

MORPHEUS, the son and minister of the god Somnus, who naturally imitated the grimaces, gestures, words, and manners, of mankind. [Hence his name, from μορφη, forma.] He is sometimes called the god of sleep. He is generally represented as a sleeping child of great corpulence, and with wings. He holds a vase in one hand, and in the other are some poppies. He is represented by Ovid as sent to inform by a dream and a vision the unhappy Alyce of the fate of her husband Ceyx. Ovid. Met. 11, fab. 10.

MORS, one of the infernal deities born of Night, without a father. She was worshipped by the ancients, particularly by the Lacedæmonians, with great solemnity, and represented not as an actually existing power, but as an imaginary being. Euripides introduces her in one of his tragedies on the stage. The moderns represent her as a skeleton armed with a scythe and a scymetar.

MORTUUM MARE. [vid. Mare Mortuum.]

MOSA, a river of Belgic Gaul falling into the German ocean, and now called the Maese or Meuse. The bridge over it, Mosæ pons, is now supposed to be Maestricht. Tacit. H. 4, c. 66.

MOSCHA, now Mascat, a port of Arabia [at the mouth of the Sinus Persicus.]

MOSCHI, a people of Asia, at the west of the Caspian Sea. Mela, 1, c. 2, l. 3, c. 5.—Lucan. 3, v. 270.

MOSCHION, a name common to four different writers, whose compositions, character, and native place are unknown. Some fragments of their writings remain, some few verses and a treatise de morbis mulierum, edited by Gesner, 4to. Basil. 1566.

MOSCHUS, a Phœnician who wrote the history of his country in his own mother tongue. —A philosopher of Sidon. He is supposed to be the founder of anatomical philosophy. Strab.—[A celebrated Greek pastoral poet, born at Syracuse. It is not clearly ascertained in what period he lived. Some authors made him a pupil of Bion, but Suidas and others speak of him as the friend of Aristarchus who flourished about 160 years B. C. The tenderness with which he speaks of Bion, in his beautiful elegy on that poet, is mentioned as a proof of his personal acquaintance with him. In the time of the latter Grecians all the ancient Idyllia were collected and attributed to Theocritus, but the claims of Moschus and Bion have been admitted with respect to a few little pieces. Moschus possessed great elegance of style, and more delicacy and ingenuity in his conceptions than is usual among Bucolic poets. His works are usually printed with those of Theocritus and Bion. The best edition is that of Valekenæer, Lugd. Bat. 1310. 8vo.]—A Greek rhetorician of Pergamus in the age of Horace, defended by Torquatus in an accusation of having poisoned some of his friends. Horat. 1, ep. 5, v. 9.

[MOSCHYLUS. vid. Mosychlus.]

MOSELLA, a river of Belgic Gaul falling into the Rhine at Coblentz, and now called the Moselle. Flor. 3, c. 10.—Tacit. Ann. 13, c. 53.

MOSES, a celebrated legislator and general among the Jews, well known in sacred history. He was born in Egypt, 1571 B. C. and after he had performed his miracles before Pharaoh, conducted the Israelites through the Red Sea, and gave them laws and ordinances, during their peregrination of 40 years in the wilderness of Arabia; he died at the age of 120. His writings have been quoted and commended by several of the heathen authors, who have divested themselves of their prejudices against an Hebrew, and extolled his learning and the effects of his wisdom. [Moses signifies in the Hebrew, taken out of the water, and the name alludes to his preservation by the daughter of Pharaoh. Moses is the most ancient writer of whom there remain any authentic works. He has left us the Pentateuch, or the five books of the Old Testament, Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. Probably these books were not originally separate works, as we find them now. Moses composed only one single work, of which the law was, as it were, the body, and Genesis was the preface. Afterwards they were divided for convenience in reading. Besides the Pentateuch, the Jews ascribe to Moses eleven Psalms, from Psalm 90 to 100: but there is no sufficient proof that Moses was the author of these. Some ancients thought that he was the author of the book of Job. Origen pretends that he translated it out of the Syriac, but this opinion is rejected by both Jews and Christians.] Longinus.—Diod. 1.

MOSYCHLUS, a mountain of Lemnos. [Moschylus, or Mosychlus, was the oldest volcano known to the Greeks. It was situate on the eastern side of the island, and is thought to have sunk in the sea a short time after the age of Alexander, together with the island Chryse. When the western parts of Europe became better known to the Greeks, and Ætna with the Æolian isles attracted their attention, they seem to have transferred the forges of Vulcan to this quarter. According to other mythological fables, Typhon or Typhoeus lay buried beneath Ætna; and the battle ground between the Gods and Giants was placed by some in Sicily, by others near Cumæ in Italy. Almost every volcanic situation, however, in the ancient world seems to have had this honour in succession conferred upon it.] Nicand.

MOSYNÆCI, [a people of Pontus in Asia Minor, on the coast near Cerasus. The 10,000 Greeks passed through their country in their retreat. Their name is one given them by the Greeks from the circumstance of their dwelling in wooden towers or forts, (μοσυν. turris lignea, and οικος. domus.)]

MULCIBER, a surname of Vulcan, (a mulcendo ferrum), from his occupation. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 5. (vid. Vulcanus.)

MULVIUS PONS. [vid. Milvius pons.]

L. MUMMIUS, a Roman consul, sent against the Achæans, whom he conquered, B. C. 147. He destroyed Corinth, Thebes, and Chalcis, by order of the senate, and obtained the surname of Achaicus from his victories. He did not enrich himself with the spoils of the enemy, but returned home without any increase of fortune. He was so unacquainted with the value of the paintings and works of the most celebrated artists of Greece which were found in the plunder of Corinth, that he said to those who conveyed them to Rome, that if they lost them or injured them, they should make others in their stead. Pat. c. 1, c. 13.—Strab. 8.—Plin. 34, c. 7, l. 37, c. 1.—Flor. 2, c. 6.—Paus. 5, c. 24.—Publius, a man commended by C. Publicus, for the versatility of his mind and the propriety of his manners. Cic. de Orat. 2.—A Latin poet. Macrobius. 1.—Satur. 10.—Spurius, a brother of Achaius before mentioned, distinguished as an orator, and for his fondness for the Stoic philosophy. Cic. ad Brut. 25, ad Att. 13, ep. 6.

MUNATIUS PLANCUS, a consul sent to the rebellious army of Germanicus. He was almost killed by the incensed soldiery, who suspected that it was through him that they had not all been pardoned and indemnified by a decree of the senate. Calpurnius rescued him from their fury.—An orator and disciple of Cicero. His father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, bore the same name. He was with Cæsar in Gaul, and was made consul with Brutus. He promised to favour the republican cause for some time, but he deserted again to Cæsar. He was long Antony's favourite, but he left him at the battle of Actium to conciliate the favours of Octavius. His services were great in the senate; for, through his influence and persuasion, that venerable body flattered the conqueror of Antony with the appellation of Augustus. He was rewarded with the office of censor. Plut. in Ant.

MUNDA, [a strongly fortified, and large city of Hispania Bætica, on the coast south-west of Malaca. In its vicinity was fought the famous battle between Cæsar and the sons of Pompey, which put an end to the war. It was a most desperate action, and even the veterans of Cæsar, who for upwards of fourteen years had signalized their valour, were compelled to give way. It was only by the most vigorous exertions that the sons of Pompey were at last defeated. Cæsar is said to have given up all for lost at one period of the fight, and to have been on the point of destroying himself. As he retired after the battle he told his friends that he had often fought for victory, but that this was the first time he had fought for his life. Cæsar is said to have lost 1000 of his best soldiers, the enemy had 30,000 slain. The battle was fought the 17th March, B. C. 45. After the battle, the siege of Munda ensued, and the assailants are said actually to have made use of the dead bodies of the enemy in elevating their mound to a sufficient height. The little village of Monda in Grenada is supposed to lie near the ancient city.] Sil. Ital. 3, v. 400.—Hirt. Bell. Hisp. 27.—Lucan. 1.

MUNYCHIA, (and $\mu\epsilon$), a port of Attica, [vid. the end of this article,] between the Piræus and the promontory of Sunium, called after king Munychys, who built there a temple to Diana, and in whose honour he instituted festivals called Munychia. The temple was held so sacred that whatever criminals fled there for refuge were pardoned. During the festivals they offered small cakes which they called amphiphontes, απο του αμψιπαιου, from shining all round, because there were lighted torches hung round when they were carried to the temple, or because they were offered at the full moon, at which time the solemnity was observed. It was particularly in honour of Diana who is the same as the moon, because it was full moon when Themistocles conquered the Persian fleet at Salamis. The port of Munychia was well fortified, and of great consequence; therefore the Lacedæmonians, when sovereigns of Greece, always kept a regular garrison there. [There was also near the harbour the Munychian promontory, which Hobhouse describes as high and rocky. The same writer, in speaking of the Munychian harbour, observes, "the old harbour of Munychia is of a circular form: there are several remains of wall running into the water, and a piece of pier is to be seen at each side of the mouth of it; so that the entrance, as well as the whole port, is smaller than that of Piræus. The direction of the port is from south to north. If the harbour once contained four hundred ships, each vessel must have been a wherry." See more on this subject in the remarks to the articles Phalerus and Piræus.] Plut.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 709.—Strab. 2.—Paus. 1, c. 1.

MURÆNA, a celebrated Roman, left at the head of the armies of the republic in Asia by Sylla. He invaded the dominions of Mithridates with success, but soon after met with a check. He was honoured with a triumph at his return to Rome. He commanded one of the wings of Sylla's army at the battle against Archelaus near Chæronea. He was ably defended in an oration by Cicero, when his character was attacked and censured. [Muræna, the father, triumphed over Mithridates, not the son. The latter was quite a young man at that time, and followed in the triumphal procession of his father. The charge against the son was that of having been guilty of bribery in suing for the consulship.]

MURGANTIA, a town of Samium. Liv. 25, c. 27.

MURSA, now Essek, a town of Hungary, where the Drave falls into the Danube.

MURTIA, or MYRTIA, (a μυρτη) a supposed surname of Venus, because she presided over the myrtle. This goddess was the patron of idleness and cowardice. Varro de L. L. 4, c. 32.

MUS, a Roman consul. [vid. Decius.]

MUSA ANTONIUS, a freedman and physician of Augustus. He cured his imperial master of a dangerous disease under which he laboured, by recommending to him the use of the cold bath. He was greatly rewarded for this celebrated cure. He was honoured with a brazen statue by the Roman senate, which was placed in the temple of Æsculapius, and Augustus permitted him to wear a golden ring, and to be exempted from all taxes. He was not so successful in recommending the use of the cold bath to Marcellus as he had been to Augustus, and his illustrious patient died under his care. [This is the account given by Dio Cassius. Suetonius, however, Velleius Paterculus, Pliny and Tacitus make no such reproach to the memory of Musa; and Servius, in a note to Virgil (Æn. 6, v. 362.) attributes the death of Marcellus to a different cause.] The cold bath was for a long time discontinued, till Charmis of Marseilles introduced it again, and convinced the world of its great benefits. Musa was brother to Euphorbus the physician of king Juba. Two small treatises, de herbâ Betonicâ, and de tuendâ Valetudine, are supposed to be the productions of his pen. [He was the first who made use of the flesh of vipers in the cure of ulcers, and who employed, as simples, succory and endives.]—A daughter of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. She attempted to recover her father's kingdom from the Romans, but to no purpose, though Cæsar espoused her cause. Paterc. 2.—Suet. in Cæs.

MUSÆ, certain goddesses who presided over poetry, music, dancing, and all the liberal arts. [They derived their name, according to some, from their being like each other (Μουσai, quasi ἰσομοσαι, id est, similes;) because there is an affinity and relation between all the sciences. Others, however, derive it from a Greek word signifying to enquire, (ἄπο του μῶσαι,) because men, by inquiring of them, learnt the things of which they were before ignorant. vid. the end of this article.] They were daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, and were nine in number; Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polyhymnia, Calliope, and Urania. Some suppose that there were in ancient times only three muses, Melete, Mneme, and Aœde; others four, Telziopie, Aœde, Arche, Melete. [vid. the end of this article.] They were, according to others, daughters of Pierus and Antiope, from which circumstance they are all called Pierides. The name of Pierides might probably be derived from Mount Pierus where they were born. They have been severally called Castalides, Aganippides, Lebe-thrides, Aonides, Heliconiades, &c. from the places where they were worshipped, or over which they presided. Apollo, who was the patron and the conductor of the muses, has received the name of Musagetes, or leader of the muses. The same surname was also given to Hercules. The palm tree, the laurel, and all the fountains of Pindus, Helicon, Parnassus, &c. were sacred to the muses. They were generally represented as young, beautiful, and modest virgins. They were fond of solitude, and commonly appeared in different attire, according to the arts and sciences over which they presided. [vid. Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, &c.] Sometimes they were represented as dancing in a chorus, to intimate the near and indissoluble connexion which exists between the liberal arts and sciences. The muses sometimes appear with wings, because by the assistance of wings they freed themselves from the violence of Pyrenæus. Their contest with the daughters of Pierus is well known. [vid. Pierides.] The worship of the muses was universally established, particularly in the enlightened parts of Greece, Thessaly, and Italy. No sacrifices were ever offered to them, though no poet ever began a poem without a solemn invocation to the goddesses who presided over verse. There were festivals instituted in their honour in several parts of Greece, especially among the Thespians, every fifth year. The Macedonians observed also a festival in honour of Jupiter and the muses. It had been instituted by king Archelaus, and it was celebrated with stage plays, games, and different exhibitions, which continued nine days according to the number of the muses. [The number of muses at first was but three, viz. Melete, Mneme, and Aœde, (Μελετη, Μνημη, Αοιδη.) or Meditation, Memory, and Singing: but a sculptor of Sicyon, according to Varro, having orders to make three statues of the three muses for the temple of Apollo, and mistaking his instructions, made three several statues of each muse. These, however, were found so beautiful, that they were all set up in the temple, and from that time they began to reckon nine muses. Diodorus Siculus says that these goddesses, so famous among the Greeks, were fine singers, whom Osiris carried about with him in his conquests, and that he gave to two of his generals, Apollo and Hercules, the name of Musagetes, because they were the conductors of these singers. The truth is, the poetry of the Greeks, being originally of a sacred character, came in with a part of their religion from the north, and may be plainly traced through Thrace, Macedonia, Thessaly, and Bœotia, in the various places consecrated throughout those countries to Apollo and the Muses. According to the best authorities, the nine Muses are represented as follows: Clio (History) holds in her hand a half-opened scroll. Melpomene (Tragedy) is veiled and leans upon a pillar, holding in her left hand a Tragic Mask. Thalia (Comedy) holds in one hand a Comic Mask, in the other a staff resembling a lituus or augur's wand. Euterpe (Music) holds two flutes. Terpsichore (the Dance) is represented in a dancing attitude, and plays upon a seven-stringed lyre. Erato (Amatory Poetry) holds a nine-stringed instrument.

Calliope (Epic Poetry) has a roll of parchment in her hand, and sometimes a straight trumpet, or tuba. Urania (Astronomy) holds in her left hand a globe, in her right a rod with which she appears to point out some object to the beholder. Polyhymnia (Eloquence and Imitation) places the fore-finger of the right hand upon her mouth, or else bears a scroll in her hand.] Plut. Mus.—Juv. 7.—Di-od. 1.—Martial. 4, ep. 14.

MUSÆUS, an ancient Greek poet, supposed to have been a son or disciple of Linus or Orpheus, and to have lived about 1410 years before the Christian era. Virgil has paid great honour to his memory by placing him in the Elysian fields attended by a great multitude, and taller by the head than his followers. None of the poet's compositions are extant. The elegant poem of the loves of Leander and Hero was written by a Musæus who flourished in the fourth century, according to the more received opinions. Among the good editions of [the latter] Musæus two may be selected as the best, that of Rover, 8vo. L. Bat. 1727; and that of Schroëder, 8vo. Leonard, 1743. [Musæus is allowed to have been one of the first poets who versified the oracles. He is placed in the Arundelian marbles 1426 B. C. at which time his hymns are there said to have been received in the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries. Diogenes Laertius tells us that Musæus not only composed a Theogony, but formed a sphere for the use of his companions; yet as this honour is generally given to Chiron, it is more natural to suppose with Sir Isaac Newton that he enlarged it with the addition of several constellations after the conquest of the Golden Fleece. A hill near the citadel of Athens was called Musæum, according to Pausanias, from Musæus, who used to retire thither to meditate and compose his religious hymns, and at which place he was afterwards buried. As regards the origin of Musæus, it would seem, according to the best authorities, that he was descended in the third or fourth degree from Eumolpus. This family derived their origin from Thrace, and Eumolpus, who came to settle in Attica, was a priest of Ceres at Eleusis, where Pausanias saw his tomb. The family of the Eumolpidæ were in possession of certain mysteries and peculiar rites of initiation, and claimed, from father to son, the gift of prophecy. Some authorities make Musæus not the disciple but the preceptor of Orpheus, and Suidas states expressly, that although a disciple of the latter, he was older than him, and that to Musæus the poet Orpheus bequeathed his lyre. According to another tradition, the instrument just mentioned was confided to Musæus by the Muses, who had found it, after the death of Orpheus, on the sea-shore. The poems of Musæus, neglected very probably at a later period, when the poetry of Ionia, more consonant with the genius of the Greek nation, became widely diffused, were interpolated to such a degree, that, when in a subsequent age they became the subject of critical investigation, it was no longer possible to distinguish between what was original and what had been added. Pausanias regarded the hymn in honour of Ceres as the only genuine one: all the rest appeared to him the work of Onomacritus, who was contemporary with the Pisistratidæ. This hymn is lost as well as, with the exception of a very few verses, all the other productions of Musæus.] Virg. Æn. 6, v. 677.—Diog.—A Latin poet whose compositions were very obscene. Martial. 12, ep. 96.—A poet of Thebes who lived during the Trojan war.

MUTA, a goddess who presided over silence among the Romans. Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 580.

MUTIA, a daughter of Q. Mutius Scævola and sister of Metellus Celer. She was Pompey's third wife. Her incontinent behaviour so disgusted her husband, that, at his return from the Mithridatic war, he divorced her, though she had borne him three children. She afterwards married M. Scaurus. Augustus greatly esteemed her. Plut. in Pomp.—A wife of Julius Cæsar, beloved by Claudius the tribune. Suet. in Cæs. 50.—The mother of Augustus.

MUTIA LEX, the same as that which was enacted by Licinius Crassus, and Q. Mutius, A. U. C. 657. [vid. Licinia Lex.]

MUTICA, or MUTYCE, a town of Sicily west of the cape Pachynus. Cic. in Verr. 3, c. 43.

MUTINA, a Roman colony of Cisalpine Gaul, where M. Antony besieged D. Brutus, whom the consuls Pansa and Hirtius delivered. Two battles on the 15th of April B. C. 43, were fought, in which Antony was defeated and at last obliged to retire. Mutina is now called Modena. Lucan. 1, v. 41, l. 7, v. 872.—Sil. 8, v. 592.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 822.—Cic. Fam. 10, ep. 14.—Brut. ep. 5.

MUTINES, one of Annibal's generals, who was honoured with the freedom of Rome on delivering up Agrigentum. Liv. 25, c. 41, l. 27, c. 5.

MUTINUS. [vid. Mutunus.]

MUTIUS, [more properly Mucius,] a Roman who saved the life of young Marius by conveying him away from the pursuits of his enemies in a load of straw.—A friend of Tiberius Gracchus, by whose means he was raised to the office of a tribune.—C. Scævola, surnamed Cordus, became famous for his courage and intrepidity. When Porsenna, king of Etruria, had besieged Rome to reinstate Tarquin in all his rights and privileges, Mutius determined to deliver his country from so dangerous an enemy. He disguised himself in the habit of a Tuscan, and, as he could fluently speak the language, he gained an easy introduction into the camp, and soon into the royal tent. Porsenna sat alone with his secretary when Mutius entered. The Roman rushed upon the secretary and stabbed him to the heart, mistaking him for his royal master. This occasioned a noise, and Mutius, unable to escape, was seized and brought before the king. He gave no answer to the inquiries of the courtiers, and only told them that he was a Roman, and to give them a proof of his fortitude, he laid his right hand on an altar of burning coals, and sternly looking at the king, and without uttering a groan, he boldly told him, that 300 young Romans like himself had conspired against his life, and entered his camp in disguise, determined either to destroy him or perish in the attempt. This extraordinary confession astonished Porsenna; he made peace with the Romans and retired from their city. Mutius obtained the surname of Scævola, because he had lost the use of his right hand by burning it in the presence of the Etrurian king. Plut. in Par.—Flor. 2, c. 60.—Liv. 2, c. 12.—Q. Scævola, a Roman consul. He obtained a victory over the Dalmatians, and signalized himself greatly in the Marsian war. He is highly commended by Cicero, whom he instructed in the study of civil law. *Cic.—Plut.—*Another, appointed proconsul of Asia, which he governed with so much popularity, that he was generally proposed to others as a pattern of equity and moderation. Cicero speaks of him as eloquent, learned, and ingenious, equally eminent as an orator and as a lawyer. He was murdered in the temple of Vesta, during the civil war of Marius and Sylla, 82 years before Christ. Plut.—Cic. de Orat. 1, c. 48.—Paterc. 2, c. 22.

MUTŪNUS, or MUTĪNUS, a deity among the Romans, much the same as the Priapus of the Greeks. The Roman matrons, and particularly new-married women, disgraced themselves by the obscene ceremonies which custom obliged them to observe before the statue of this impure deity. August. de Civ. D. 4, c. 9, l. 6, c. 9.—Lactant. 1, c. 20.

MUZERIS, a town of India, now Visindruk. [Mannert makes it to be the modern Mirzno or Mirdschno.] Plin. 6, c. 23.

MYAGRUS or MYODES, a divinity among the Egyptians, called also Achor. He was entreated by the inhabitants to protect them from flies and serpents. His worship passed into Greece and Italy. Plin. 10, c. 28.—Paus. 3, c. 26.

MŪCĀLE, a celebrated magician, who boasted that he could draw down the moon from her orb. *Ovid. Met. 12, v. 263.—*A city and promontory of Asia Minor, [vid. the end of this article,] opposite Samos, celebrated for a battle which was fought there between the Greeks and Persians on the 22d of September, 479 B. C. the same day that Marstonius was defeated at Plataea. [The battle of Mycale took place in the morning, that of Plataea in the evening.] The Persians were about 100,000 men, who had just returned from the unsuccessful expedition of Xerxes into Greece. They had drawn their ships to the shore and fortified themselves, as if determined to support a siege. They suffered the Greeks to disembark without the least molestation, and were soon obliged to give way before the cool and resolute intrepidity of an inferior number of men. The Greeks obtained a complete victory, slaughtered some thousands of the enemy, burned their camp, and sailed back to Samos with an immense booty, in which were seventy chests of money among other very valuable things. [The Athenians who, with their own immediate followers, constituted one half of the Grecian army, were led on by the Archon Xantippus, the father of the famous Pericles, and, according to Herodotus, distinguished themselves the most of any of the combined forces. They advanced by the coast and along the plain, the Lacedæmonians and their auxiliaries by the more woody and mountainous places. Whilst the latter, therefore, were making a circuit, the Athenians were already engaged. The Athenian forces stormed the Persian ramparts, and the victory was already half-achieved before the Lacedæmonians arrived. Herodotus states, that after the disembarkation of the Greeks, and previous to the battle, a herald's wand was discovered by them on the beach as they were advancing towards the enemy, and that a rumour in consequence circulated among the Greeks, that a victory had been obtained by their countrymen over the forces of Marstonius. This, no doubt, was a mere contrivance of the Greek commanders to animate their troops. It has been a subject of considerable discussion among commentators to ascertain the meaning of Cornelius Nepos, in his life of Cimon, where he makes this commander to have gained a victory at Mycale, over the combined fleets of the Cyprians and Phœnicians. The battle is described by Diodorus Siculus (2, c. 61,) and by Plutarch in his life of Cimon (p. 486, cap. 12 et seqq.) It is mentioned also by Thucydides (1, c. 100,) by Plato (in Menezeno), by Polyænus, by Frontinus (4, 7, 45,) and by Mela (1, 14). But all these authorities uniformly make the battle to have been fought at the river Eurymedon, not far from Cyprus. In order to free Cornelius Nepos from the charge of a gross error, it is best to adopt the opinion of Tzschucke, who thinks that there must have been a second and obscurer Mycale, near the Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the battle above referred to was fought.] Herodot.—Justin. 2, c. 14.—Diod.

MŪCALESSUS, an inland town of Bœotia, where Ceres had a temple. Paus. 9, c. 19.

MŪCENÆ, a town of Argolis, in Peloponnesus, built by Perseus, son of Danae. It was situate on a small river at the east of the Inachus, about 50 stadia from Argos, and received its name from Mycene, a nymph of Laconia. It was once the capital of a kingdom, whose monarchs reigned in the following order: Acrisius 1344 B. C.; Perseus, Electryon, Mæstor and Sthenelus; and Sthenelus alone for eight years; Atreus and Thyestes, Agamemnon, Ægysthus, Orestes, Æpytus, who was dispossessed 1104 B. C. on the return of the Heraclidae. The town of Mycenæ was taken and laid in ruins by the Argives, B. C. 568; and it was almost unknown where it stood in the age of the geographer Strabo. [Strabo is often very erroneous in his account of Greece. He says that even the ruins of Mycenæ were not to be found in his time. It is apparent from this, that he had never been upon the spot, for modern travellers, even at the present day, find numerous traces of this ancient city. The cause of its destruction by the Argives is said to have been the jealousy they felt towards its inhabitants, because 80 of the warriors of Mycenæ had immortalized themselves at Thermopylæ with the followers of Leonidas. The most remarkable among the remains of antiquity at Mycenæ, is what is termed the Treasury of Atreus. It is a hollow cone of 50 feet in diameter, and as many in height. It is composed of enormous masses of a very hard breccia, or sort of pudding-stone. This extraordinary edifice has obviously been raised by the projection of one stone above another, and they nearly meet at the top. The central stone at the top has been removed along with two or three others, and yet the building remains as durable as ever, and will probably last to the end of time. Mr. Gell discovered brass nails placed at regular distances throughout the interior, which he thinks must have served to fasten plates of brass to the wall. Dr. Clarke opposes the opinion of this being the Treasury of Atreus, principally on the ground that it was without the walls of the city, deeming it far more probable, and more in conformity with what we find in ancient writers, that the Treasury was within the walls, in the very citadel. He considers it to be the Heroum of Perseus. Whatever may have been its use, it is worthy of notice, that cells of bronze or brass, i. e. covered within with plates of brass, were very common in ancient Argolis. Such, no doubt, were the brazen places of confinement of Danae, and the lurking-place of Eurystheus, when in fear of Hercules. The remains of the ancient walls are also very curious, being evidently of that style of building called Cyclopean. Among other things the gate of the Lions, mentioned by Pausanias, still remains. The modern town of Krabata stands near the ruins of Mycenæ. The name of Mycenæ was probably derived from its situation in a recess (μυχφ) formed by two mountains, and not, as Pausanias imagines, from a mushroom, or the pommel of a sword.] Paus. 2, c. 16.—Strab. 8.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 839.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—The word Mycenæus is used for Agamemnon, as he was one of the kings of Mycenæ.

MYCENIS, (idis), a name applied to Iphigenia as residing at Mycenæ. Ovid. Met. 12, v. 84.

MYCERINUS, a son of Cheops, king of Egypt. After the death of his father he reigned with great justice and moderation. [He built one of the pyramids, which travellers usually call the third one. It is smaller in size than the others, but, according to Strabo, was equally as expensive as the others, being cased, according to Diodorus Siculus, half way up with Ethiopian marble. Mycerinus is said by Herodotus to have died in the seventh year of his reign. He received the prediction of his short reign from the oracle of Latona at Buto, and, on complaining that he, a pious prince, was not allowed a long reign, while his father and grandfather, who had been injurious to mankind and impious to the gods, had enjoyed each a long life, he was told that his short death was the direct consequence of his piety, for the fates had decreed that for the space of 150 years, Egypt should be oppressed; of which determination the two preceding monarchs had been aware.] Herodot. 2, c. 129.

MYCITHUS, a servant of Anaxilaus, tyrant of Rhegium. He was intrusted with the care of the kingdom, and of the children of the deceased prince, and he exercised his power with such fidelity and moderation, that he acquired the esteem of all the citizens, and at last restored the kingdom to his master's children when come to years of maturity, and retired to peace and solitude with a small portion. He is called by some Misalus. Justin. 4, c. 2.

MYCON, a celebrated painter who with others assisted in making and perfecting the Pæcile of Athens. He was the rival of Polygnotus. Plin. 33 and 35.

MYCŌNOS, (or E), one of the Cyclades between Delos and Icaria, which received its name from Myconus, an unknown person. It is about three miles at the east of Delos, and is thirty-six miles in circumference. It remained long uninhabited on account of the frequent earthquakes to which it was subject. Some suppose that the giants whom Hercules killed were buried under that island, whence arose the proverb of every thing is under Mycone, applied to those who treat of different subjects under one and the same title, as if none of the defeated giants had been buried under any other island or mountain about Mycone. Strabo observes, and his testimony is supported by that of modern travellers, that the inhabitants of Mycone became bald very early, even at the age of 20 or 25, from which circumstance they were called, by way of contempt, the bald heads of Mycone. Pliny says that the children of the place were always born without hair. The island was poor, and the inhabitants very avaricious and great parasites; whence Archilochus reproached a certain Pericles, that he came to a feast like a Myconian, that is, without previous invitation. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 76.—Strab. 10.—Plin. 11, c. 37, l. 12, c. 7, l. 14, c. 1.—Athen. 1.—Thucyd. 3, c. 29.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 463.

MYCOPHŌRIS, a town of Egypt, in a small island near Bubastis.

MYENUS, a mountain of Ætolia. Plut. de Flum.

MYGDŌNIA, a small province of Macedonia near Thrace, between the rivers Axius and Strymon. The inhabitants, called Mygdones, migrated into Asia, and settled near Troas, where the country received the name of their ancient habitation. Cybele was called Mygdonia, from the worship she received in Mygdonia in Phrygia. Horat. 2, od. 12, v. 22, l. 3, od. 16, v. 41.—Ovid. Met. 6, v. 45.—A small province of Mesopotamia bears also the name of Mygdonia, and was probably peopled by a Macedonian colony. Flacc. 3, &c.—Plin. 4, c. 10.—Ovid. Heroid. 29.—Horat. 2, od. 12.

MYGDŌNUS, or MYGDON, a brother of Hecuba, Priam's wife, who reigned in part of Thrace. His son Coræbus was called Mygdonides from him. Virg. Æn. 2, c. 341.—Homer. Il. 3.—A small river running through Mesopotamia, [and falling into the Chaboras.]

MYLASSA, (orum), [a city of Caria, founded, according to Stephanus Byzantinus, by Mylasus, son of Chrysari. This place was famous for a very ancient temple of the Carian Jove, and for another, of nearly equal antiquity, sacred to Jupiter Osogus. In after times a very beautiful temple was erected here, dedicated to Augustus and to Rome. Strabo speaks highly of the magnificence of this city. Pococke saw the temple last mentioned, entire, but it has since been destroyed, and the materials have been used for building a mosque. Mylassus is now Melisso, and is at the present day remarkable for producing the best tobacco in Turkey.] Liv. 38, c. 39.

MYLE [or MYLÆ, now Millazzo, was situate on a tongue of land south-west of Pelorum, on the northern coast of Sicily. Between this place and a station called Naulochus, the fleet of Sextus Pompeius was defeated by that of the triumvir Octavius, under the command of Agrippa.] Liv. 24, c. 30 and 31.—Suet. Aug. 16.

MYLES, a son of Lelex.

MYLITTA, a surname of Venus among the Assyrians, in whose temples all the women were obliged to prostitute themselves to strangers. Herodot. 1, c. 131 and 199.—Strab. 16.

MYNDUS, a maritime town of Caria, [north-west of] Halicarnassus. Cic. Fam. 3, ep. 8.—Mela, 1, c. 16.—Plin. 5, c. 29.

MYONIA, [a town of Greece in the territory of the Locri Ozolæ, situate on a lofty mountain. It had a sacred wood and an altar dedicated to the meek or gentle gods, to whom sacrifices were offered in the night.]

MYONNESUS, a town and promontory of Ionia, now Jalangi Liman. [Strabo makes it a peninsula, and Livy a promontory. It was an island of the Teians, according to Thucydides. It appears to have been placed on the coast, north-west of Lebedus, and the land to have projected in the form of a peninsula.] Liv. 37, c. 13 and 27.

[MYOS HORMOS, or the mouse's harbour, a sea-port of Egypt, placed by Ptolemy and Pliny on the coast of the Red Sea. Arrian says that it was one of the most celebrated ports on this sea. It was called also Aphrodites portus, or the port of Venus. It is full of little isles, and its modern name of Sufan-geul-bahri, or the sponge of the sea, has an evident analogy to the etymology of the second of the Greek names given above.]

MYRA, (orum or æ.) a town of Lycia on a high hill, two miles from the sea. Plin. 5, c. 27.—Strab. 14.

MYRIANDROS, a town of Seleucia in Syria, on the bay of Issus, which is sometimes called Sinus Myriandricus. Liv. 2, c. 108.

MYRINA, a maritime town of Æolia, called also Sebastopolis, and now Sanderlic. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 47.—Liv. 33, c. 30.—Strab. 13.—A queen of the Amazons, &c. Dion. 4.—A town of Lemnos, now Patio Castro. Plin. 4, c. 12.—A town of Asia destroyed by an earthquake in Trajan's reign.—The wife of Thoas, king of Lemnos, by whom she had Hypsipyle.

MYRINUS, a surname of Apollo, from Myrina in Æolia, where he was worshipped.—

MYRIE, a town of Arcadia, called also Megalopolis.

MYRLÆÆ, [a city of Bithynia. vid. Apollonia.] Plin. 5, c. 32.

MYRMFCIDES, an artist of Miletus mentioned as making chariots so small that they could be covered by the wing of a fly. He also inscribed an elegiac distich on a grain of Indian sesamum. Cic. 4, Acad.—Ælian. V, H. 1.

MYRMIDONES, a people on the southern borders of Thessaly, who accompanied Achilles to the Trojan war. They received their name from Myrmidon, a son of Jupiter and Eurymedusa, who married one of the daughters of Æolus, son of Helen. His son Actor married Ægina, the daughter of the Asopus. He gave his name to his subjects who dwelt near the river Peneus in Thessaly. According to some, the Myrmidons received their name from their having been originally ants, μυρμικες. (vid. Æacus.) According to Strabo, they received it from their industry, because they imitated the diligence of the ants, and like them were indefatigable, and were continually employed in cultivating the earth. [The change of the Myrmidones from ants to men is founded merely upon the equivocation of their name, which resembles that of the ant (μυρμηξ). These people bore a farther resemblance to these little animals, in that, instead of inhabiting towns or villages, at first they commonly remained in the open fields, having no other retreats but the dens and cavities of trees, until Æacus brought them together, and settled them in more secure and commodious habitations.] Ovid. Met. 7, v. 654.—Strab.—Hygin. fab. 32.

MYRON, a tyrant of Sicily.—A man of Priene, who wrote an history of Messenia. Paus. 4, c. 6.—A celebrated statuary of Greece, peculiarly happy in imitating nature. He made a cow so much resembling life, that even bulls were deceived, and approached her as if alive, as is frequently mentioned by many epigrams in the Anthologia. [vid. Athos and Lemnos.] He flourished about 442 years before Christ. Ovid. Art. Am. 3, v. 319.—Paus.—Juv. 8.—Propert. 2, el. 41.

MYRRHA, a daughter of Cinyras, king of Cyprus. She became enamoured of her father, and introduced herself into his bed unknown. She had a son by him, called Adonis. When Cinyras was apprised of the incest he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, and Myrrha fled into Arabia, where she was changed into a tree called myrrh. Hygin. fab. 58 and 275.—Ovid. Met. 10, v. 298.—Plut. in Par.—Apollod. 3.

MYRSILUS, a son of Myrsus, the last of the Heraclidae who reigned in Lydia. He is also called Candaules. (vid. Candaules.)

MYRSUS, the father of Candaules. Herodot. 1, c. 7.—A Greek historian in the age of Solon.

MYRTEA, a surname of Venus. (vid. Murtia.)

MYRTILUS, son of Mercury and Phaetusa, or Cleobule, or Clymene, was armour-bearer to Enomaus, king of Pisa. He was so experienced in riding, and in the management of horses, that he rendered those of Enomaus the swiftest in all Greece. His infidelity proved at last fatal to him. Enomaus had been informed by an oracle, that his daughter Hippodamia's husband should cause his death, and on that account he resolved to marry her only to him who should overcome him in a chariot-race. This seemed totally impossible, and to render it more terrible, Enomaus declared that death would be the consequence of a defeat in the suitors. The charms of Hippodamia were so great that many sacrificed their life in the fruitless endeavour to obtain her hand. Pelops at last presented himself, undaunted at the fate of those who had gone before him; but before he entered the course he bribed Myrtilus, and assured him that he should share Hippodamia's favours if he returned victorious from the race. Myrtilus, who was enamoured of Hippodamia, gave an old chariot to Enomaus, which broke in the course and caused his death. Pelops gained the victory, and married Hippodamia; and when Myrtilus had the audacity to claim the reward promised to his perfidy, Pelops threw him headlong into the sea, where he perished. The body of Myrtilus, according to some, was carried by the waves to the sea-shore, where he received an honourable burial; and as he was the son of Mercury, he was made a constellation. Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 84 and 224.—Paus. 8, c. 14.—Apollon. 1.

MYRTIS, [a Grecian female of distinguished poetical abilities, who flourished about 500 B. C. She was born at Anthedon in Bœotia. Pindar is said to have received his first instructions in the poetic art from her, and it was during the period of his attendance upon her that he became acquainted with Corinna, who was also a pupil of Myrtis.]

MYRTOUM MARE, a part of the Ægean Sea which lies between Attica and the Cyclades, [or rather, according to Strabo, between Argolis Attica and Crete.] It receives this name from Myrto, a woman, or, from Myrtos, a small island opposite to Carystos in Eubœa; or from Myrtilus, the son of Mercury, who was drowned there, &c. Paus. 8, c. 14.—Hygin. fab. 84.—Plin. 4, c. 11.

MYRTUNTUM, a name given to that part of the sea which lies on the coast of Epirus between the bay of Ambracia and Leucadia.

MYRS, (mysos.) an artist famous in working and polishing silver. He beautifully represented the battle of the centaurs and Lapithæ, on a shield in the hand of Minerva's statue made by Phidias. Paus. 1, c. 28.—Martial. 8, ep. 34 and 51, l. 14, ep. 93.—Propert. 3, el. 9, v. 14.

MYSCELLUS, or MISCELLUS, a native of Rhyppæ in Achaia, who founded Crotona in Italy, according to an oracle, which told him to build a city where he found rain with fine weather. The meaning of the oracle long perplexed him till he found a beautiful woman all in tears in Italy, which circumstance he interpreted in his favour. According to some, Myscellus, who was the son of Hercules, went out of Argos, without the permission of the magistrates, for which he was condemned to death. The judges had put each a black ball as a sign of condemnation, but Hercules changed them all and made them white, and had his son acquitted; upon which Myscellus left Greece, and came to Italy, where he built Crotona. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 19.—Strab. 6 and 8.—Suides.

MYSLA, [a country of Asia Minor, is said to have derived its name from the Lydian word Mysos, signifying a beach tree, with which the country abounded. The name more probably, however, came from Mœsia in Europe, whence the true origin of the Mysians is to be derived. It was divided, according to Strabo, into the Greater and Lesser Mysia. The latter lay on the Propontis, and from thence extended to Mount Olympus, including a part of what was afterwards called Bithynia. Mysia Major was bounded on the west by Troas, on the north by the Propontis, on the east by Mysia Minor and Phrygia, and on the south by Æolia. As to the origin of the Mysians, Herodotus makes them to have been of Lydian descent. Manner, however, considers them to have been of Thracian descent together with the Lydians. They migrated into Asia Minor, and are mentioned in Homer among the Trojan allies; but no place of abode is specially assigned them by the poet, and when he speaks of the Trojan dominions, he makes them lie between the Ægean on the west, and the Phrygians on the east. After the Trojan war the Mysians appear as a distinct people, and spread themselves gradually over the whole of what was called Mysia.] Its chief cities were Cyzicum, Lampsacus, &c. The inhabitants were once very warlike, but they greatly degenerated; and the words Mysorum ultimus were emphatically used to signify a person of no merit. The ancients generally hired them to attend their funerals as mourners, because they were naturally melancholy and inclined to shed tears. They were once governed by monarchs. Strab.—

Herodot. 1, &c.—Cic. in Verr.—Flacc. 27.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—Appian. in Mithrid.—A festival in honour of Ceres, surnamed Mysia from Mysias, an Argive, who raised her a temple near Pallene in Achaia. Some derive the word απο του μυσαι, to cloy or satisfy, because Ceres was the first who satisfied the wants of men by giving them corn. The festival continued during seven days, &c.

[MYSIUS, a river of Mysia, which falls into the Caicus near the source of the latter river.]

MYSON, a native of Sparta, one of the seven wise men of Greece. When Anacharsis consulted the oracle of Apollo, to know which was the wisest man in Greece, he received for answer, he who is now ploughing his fields. This was Myson. Diog. in Vit.

MYSTES, a son of the poet Valgius, whose early death was so lamented by the father that Horace wrote an ode to allay the grief of his friend. Horat. 2, od. 9.

MYTHÆCUS, a sophist of Syracuse. He studied cookery, and, when he thought himself sufficiently skilled in dressing meat, he went to Sparta, where he gained much practice, especially among the younger citizens. He was soon after expelled the city by the magistrates, who observed that the aid of Mythæcus was unnecessary, as hunger was the best seasoning.

MYTILÆNE. [vid. Mitylene.]

MYUS, (Myuntis.) a town of Ionia on the confines of Caria, founded by a Grecian colony. It was one of the 12 capital cities of Ionia. Artaxerxes, king of Persia, gave it to Themistocles to maintain him in meat. Magnesia was to support him in bread, and Lampsaicus in wine. [Myus had an excellent seaport at the mouth of the Mæander; in the course of time, however, the mouth of the river was so stopped up, that the town was about three leagues from the sea. When the entrance of the gulf of Latmus was stopped, the waters formed a lake, which produced such a number of insects, that the inhabitants abandoned the place and retired to Miletus.] C. Nep. in Themis.—Strab. 14.—Herodot. 1, c. 142.—Diod. 11.

NABAZANES, an officer of Darius third at the battle of Issus. He conspired with Bessus to murder his royal master, either to obtain the favour of Alexander, or to seize the kingdom. He was pardoned by Alexander. Curt. 3, &c.—Diod. 17.

NABATHÆA, a country of Arabia, of which the capital was called Petra. [It extended from the Euphrates to the Sinus Arabicus. The Nabathæans are scarcely known in Scripture until the time of the Maccabees.] The word is often applied to any of the eastern countries of the world by the poets, and seems to be derived from Nabath the son of Ismael. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 61, l. 5, v. 163.—Strab. 16.—Lucan. 4, v. 63.—Juv. 11, v. 126.—Senec. in Her. Æl. 160, &c.

NABIS, a celebrated tyrant of Lacedæmon, who in all acts of cruelty and oppression surpassed a Phalaris or a Dionysius. His house was filled with flatterers and with spies, who were continually employed in watching the words and the actions of his subjects. When he had exercised every art in plundering the citizens of Sparta, he made a statue, which in resemblance was like his wife, and was clothed in the most magnificent apparel, and whenever any one refused to deliver up his riches, the tyrant led him to the statue, which immediately, by means of secret springs, seized him in its arms, and tormented him in the most excruciating manner with bearded points and prickles, hid under the clothes. To render his tyranny more popular, Nabis made an alliance with Flaminius, the Roman general, and pursued with the most inveterate enmity the war which he had undertaken against the Achæans. He besieged Gythium, and defeated Philopœmen in a naval battle. His triumph was short, the general of the Achæans soon repaired his losses, and Nabis was defeated in an engagement and treacherously murdered as he attempted to save his life by flight. *B. NABONASSAR, a king of Babylon after the division of the Assyrian monarchy. From him the Nabonassarian epoch received its name, agreeing with the year of the world 3237, or 746 B. C. [The beginning of this prince's reign is of great importance in chronology, because Ptolemy assures us that there were astronomical calculations made by the Chaldeans from Nabonassar to his time; and Ptolemy and the other astronomers count their years from that epocha. Foster, in his Epistle concerning the Chaldeans, as given by Michaëlis in his "Spicilegium Geographiæ Hebræorum," vol. 2, p. 102, seeks to explain the name Nabonassar, on the supposition of an affinity between the ancient Chaldee language and the Slavonic tongue. According to him it is equivalent to Nebu-nash-tzar, which means "Our Lord in heaven."] [NABOPOLASSAR, a king of Babylon who united with Astyages against Assyria, which country they conquered, and having divided it between them, founded two kingdoms, that of the Medes under Astyages, and that of the Chaldeans under Nabopolassar, B. C. 626. Necho, king of Egypt, jealous of the power of the latter, declared war against and defeated him. Nabopolassar died after a reign of 21 years. The name, according to Foster, (vid.

Nabonassar,) is equivalent to Nebu-polestzar, which means "Our Lord dwells in heaven."]]

NÆNIA, the goddess of funerals at Rome, whose temple was without the gates of the city. The songs which were sung at funerals were also called nænia. They were generally filled with the praises of the deceased, but sometimes they were so unmeaning and improper, that the word became proverbial to signify nonsense. Varro de Vitâ P. R.—Plaut. Asin. 41, c. 1, v. 63.

CN. NÆVIUS, [a native of Campania, was the first imitator of the regular dramatic works which had been produced by Livius Andronicus. He served in the first Punic war, and his earliest plays were represented at Rome in the year 519. The names of his tragedies (of which as few fragments remain as those of Livius,) are still preserved. Alcestis, from which there is yet extant a description of old age in rugged and barbarous verse—Danæ, Dulorestes, Hesiona, Hector, Iphigenia, Lycurgus, Phœnissæ, Protesilaus, and Telephus. All these were translated or closely imitated from the works of Euripides. Anaxandrides, and other Greek dramatists. Nævius, however, was accounted a better comic than tragic poet. Cicero has given us some specimens of his jests, with which he appears to have been greatly amused; but they consist rather in unexpected turns of expression, or a play of words, than in genuine humour. Nævius in some of his comedies indulged too much in personal invective and satire, especially against the elder Scipio. Encouraged by the silence of this illustrious individual, he next attacked the patrician family of the Metelli. The poet was thrown into prison for this last offence, where he wrote his comedies, the Hariolus and Leontes. These being in some measure intended as a recantation of his former invectives, he was liberated by the tribunes of the commons. Relapsing soon after, however, into his former courses, and continuing to satirize the nobility, he was driven from Rome by their influence, and retired to Carthage, where he died, according to Cicero, A. U. C. 550. Besides his comedies, he was author of the Cyprian Iliad, a translation from a Greek poem, called the Cyprian Epic. A metrical chronicle, which chiefly related the events of the first Punic war, was his last composition.] Cic. Tusc. 1, c. 1, de Senect.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, c. 53.—A tribune of the people at Rome, who accused Scipio Africanus of extortion.—An augur in the reign of Tarquin. To convince the king and the Romans of his power as an augur, he cut a whetstone with a razor, and turned the ridicule of the populace into admiration: Tarquin rewarded his merit by erecting him a statue in the comitium, which was still in being in the age of Augustus. The razor and whetstone were buried near it under an altar, and it was usual among the Romans to make witnesses in civil causes swear near it. This miraculous event of cutting a whetstone with a razor, though believed by some writers, is treated as fabulous and improbable by Cicero, who himself had been an augur. [In some editions of Livy the name is written Accus Navius, in others Attus Navius.] Dionys. Hist.—Liv. 1, c. 36.—Cic. de divin. 1, c. 17. de N. D. 2, c. 3. 1. 3, c. 6.

NAHARVÁLI, a people of Germany, [ranked by Tacitus under the Lygii, or the inhabitants of what is now part of Silesia, Prussia, and Poland. They had a consecrated grove, where a priest officiated in female attire. The Romans believed that the gods worshipped in this grove were Castor and Pollux, as they were both young and brothers.] Tacit. Germ. 43.

NÁIÁDES, certain inferior deities who presided over rivers, springs, wells, and fountains. The Naiades generally inhabited the country, and resorted to the woods or meadows near the stream over which they presided, whence the name (ναίω, to flow.) They are represented as young and beautiful virgins, often leaning upon an urn, from which flows a stream of water. Ægle was the fairest of the Naiades, according to Virgil. They were held in great veneration among the ancients, and often sacrifices of goats and lambs were offered to them with libations of wine, honey, and oil. Sometimes they received only offerings of milk, fruit, and flowers. [vid. Nymphæ.] Virg. Ecl. 6.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 328.—Homer. Od. 13.

NAIS, one of the Oceanides, mother of Chiron or Glaucus, by Magnes. Apollod. 1, c. 9.—A nymph, mother by Bucolion of Ægeus and Pedasus. Homer. Il. 6.—A nymph in an island of the Red Sea, who by her incantations turned to fishes all those who approached her residence after she had admitted them to her embraces. She was herself changed into a fish by Apollo. Ovid. Met. 4, v. 49, &c.—The word is used for water by Tibull. 3, 7.

NAISSUS or NÆSSUS, now Nissa, a town of Mœsia [Superior, nearly in the centre,] the birth-place of Constantine, ascribed by some to Illyricum or Thrace.

[NAMNĒTES, a people of Gallia Celtica, on the north bank of the Liger or Loire, near its mouth. Their capital was Condivienum, afterwards named Namnetes, now Nantz.]

NANTUÁTES, a people of Gaul, [on the south of the Lacus Lemanus, or Lake of Geneva.] Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 1.

NAPÆÆ, certain divinities among the ancients who presided over the hills and woods of the country. Some suppose that they were tutelary deities of the fountains and the Naiades of the sea. Their name is derived from ναπη, a grove. Virg. G. 4, v. 535.

NAPHÍLUS, a river of Peloponnesus falling into the Alpheus. Paus. 1.

NAR, now Nera, a river of Umbria, whose waters, famous for their sulphureous properties, pass through the lake Velinus, and issuing from thence with great rapidity, fall into the Tiber. [The Nar rises near Nursia, and falls into the Tiber near Narnia and Ocricu- lum.] Ovid. Met. 14, v. 330.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 517.—Cic. ad Attic. 4, ep. 15.—Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 79, l. 3, c. 9.

NARBO MARTIUS, now Narbonne, a town of Gaul founded by the consul Marcius, A. U. C. 636. It became the capital of a large province of Gaul, which obtained the name of Gallia Narbonensis. [When the Romans first entered Gaul this was a flourishing city. About 116 B. C. Julius Cæsar sent hither a colony of the veterans of the 10th legion.] Paterc. 1, c. 15, l. 2, c. 8.—Plin. 3.

NARBONENSIS GALLIA, one of the four great divisions of ancient Gaul, was bounded by the Alps, the Pyrenean mountains, Aquitania, and the Mediterranean, and contained what, previous to the revolution, were the provinces of Languedoc, Provence, Dauphiné, and Savoy. [This province was anciently called also Gallia Braccata, from the Bracca, or breeches, worn by the inhabitants.]

NARCISSUS, a beautiful youth, son of Cephus and the nymph Liriopé, born at Thebes in Bœotia. He saw his image reflected in a fountain, and became enamoured of it, thinking it to be the nymph of the place. His fruitless attempts to approach this beautiful object so provoked him that he grew desperate and killed himself. His blood was changed into a flower, which still bears his name. The nymphs raised a funeral pile to burn his body, according to Ovid, but they found nothing but a beautiful flower. Pausanias says, that Narcissus had a sister as beautiful as himself, of whom he became deeply enamoured. He often hunted in the woods in her company, but his pleasure was soon interrupted by her death, and still to keep afresh her memory, he frequented the groves where he had often attended her, or reposed himself on the brim of a fountain, where the sight of his own reflected image still awakened tender sentiments. Paus. 9, c. 21.—Hygin. fab. 271.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 346, &c.—Philostat. 1.—A freed-man and secretary of Claudius, who abused his trust and the infirmities of his imperial master, and plundered the citizens of Rome to enrich himself. Messalina, the emperor's wife, endeavoured to remove him, but Narcissus sacrificed her to his avarice and resentment. Agrippina, who succeeded in the place of Messalina, was more successful. Narcissus was banished by her intrigues, and compelled to kill himself, A. D. 54. Nero greatly regretted his loss, as he had found him subservient to his most criminal and extravagant pleasures. Tacit.—Sueton.

NARISCI, a nation of Germany, in the Upper Palatinate. Tacit. de Germ. 42.

NARNIA or NARNA, now Narni, a town of Umbria, washed by the river Nar, from which it received its name. In its neighbourhood are still visible the remains of an aqueduct, and of a bridge erected by Augustus. [Under the Roman republic it was called Nequinum, from the word nequam, a rogue, on account of the knavery of its inhabitants. It became a Roman colony, A. U. C. 452.] Liv. 10, c. 9

NARO, now Narenta, a river of Dalmatia, falling into the Adriatic, and having the town of Narona, now called Narenta, on its banks, a little above the mouth. [Narona is now buried in ruins.]

NARSES, a king of Persia, A. D. 294, defeated by Maximianus Galerius, after a reign of seven years.—An eunuch in the court of Justinian, who was deemed worthy to succeed Belisarius, &c.

NARYCIA, or UM, or NARYX, a town of Magna Græcia, built by a colony of Locrians after the fall of Troy. The place in Greece from which they came bore the same name, and was the country of Ajax Oileus. The word Narycian is more universally understood, as applying to the Italian colony, near which pines and other trees grew in abundance. [The Narycia in Greece was situate among the Locri Epicnemidii: that in Italy, among the Epizephyrii.] Virg. G. 2, v. 438, Æn. 3, v. 399.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 705.

NASĀMŌNES, a savage people [of Africa, dwelling near the Syrtis Major, and who lived by the plunder of the vessels shipwrecked on their coast.] Curt. 4, c. 7.—Lucean. 9, v. 439.—Herodot. 2, c. 165.—Sil. It. 2, v. 116, l. 11, v. 180.

NASCIO or NATIO, a goddess at Rome who presided over the birth of children. She had a temple at Ardea. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 13.

NASĪCA, the surname of one of the Scipios. Nasica was the first who invented the measuring of time by water, B. C. 159, about 134 years after the introduction of sun-dials at Rome. vid. Scipio.—An avaricious fellow who married his daughter to Coranus, a man as mean as himself, that he might not only not repay the money he had borrowed, but moreover become his creditor's heir. Coranus, understanding his meaning, purposely alienated his property from him and his daughter, and exposed him to ridicule. Horat. 2, Sat. 5, v. 64, &c.

NASIDIĒNUS, a Roman knight, whose meanness and ostentation exhibited at an entertainment he gave to Mæcenas were ridiculed by Horace, 2, Sat. 8.

L. NASIDIUS, a man sent by Pompey to assist the people of Mæsilia. After the battle of Pharsalia he followed the interest of Pompey's children, and afterwards revolted to Antony. Appian.

[NASO, vid. Ovidius.]

NASSUS, or NASUS, a town of Acarnania, near the mouth of the Achelous. Liv. 26, c. 24.—Also, a part of the town of Syracuse.

NATISO, now Natisonè, a river rising in the Alps, and falling into the Adriatic east of Aquileia. Plin. 3, c. 13.

NAVA, now Nape, a river of Germany, falling into the Rhine at Bingen below Mentz. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 70.

NAUCRĀTES, a Greek poet, who was employed by Artemisia to write a panegyric upon Mausolus.—Another poet. Athen. 9.—An orator who endeavoured to alienate the cities of Lycia from the interest of Brutus.

NAUCRATIS, a city of Egypt on the left side of the Canopic mouth of the Nile. It was celebrated for its commerce, and no ship was permitted to land at any other place, but was obliged to sail directly to the city, there to deposit its cargo. It gave birth to Athenæus. The inhabitants were called Naucraticæ or Naucratiotæ. [Herodotus states that whoever came to any other than the Canopic mouth of the Nile, was compelled to swear that it was entirely accidental, and was obliged to go thither in the same vessel. If contrary winds prevented a passage direct to Naucratis, the merchant was obliged to move his goods on board the common boats of the river and carry them to the latter place. Somewhat similar to this is the custom of the modern Chinese. The similarity becomes still more striking, if we reflect that the Greeks were allowed to have a commercial establishment at Naucratis, and were permitted places for the construction of temples for their religious rites.] Herodot. 2, c. 97 and 179.—Plin. 5, c. 9.

NAVIUS ACTIVS, a famous augur. vid. Navius.

NAULŒCHUS, a maritime town of Sicily near Pelorum.—A town of Thrace on the Euxine Sea. Plin. 4, c. 11.—A promontory of the island Imbros.—A town of the Locri. Plin. 4, c. 3.

NAUACTUS, or NAUACTŪM, [a city of the Locri Ozolæ in Greece, on the Sinus Corinthiacus, a short distance north-east of Antirrhium.] The word is derived from ναυς & πρωρυπι, because it was there that the Heraclidæ built the first ship which carried them to Peloponnesus. It first belonged to the Locri Ozolæ, and afterwards fell into the hands of the Athenians, who gave it to the Messenians, who had been driven from Peloponnesus by the Lacedæmonians. It became the property of the Lacedæmonians, after the battle of Ægospotamos, and it was restored to the Locri. Philip of Macedonia afterwards took it and gave it to the Ætolians, from which circumstance it has generally been called one of the chief cities of their country. [It is now Enebet or Lepanto.] Strab. 4.—Paus. 4, c. 25.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Fast. 2, v. 43.

NAUPLIA, a maritime city of Peloponnesus, the naval station of the Argives, at the head of the Sinus Argolicus. [It retains its ancient name, according to Mr. Gell, and is only corrupted into Anapli and Napoli di Romania, by the Turks and Italians. The same writer describes it as a large, and, in point of building, one of the most respectable cities in the Morea.] The famous fountain Canathos was in its neighbourhood. Paus. 2, c. 33.—Strab. 8.

NAUPLIĀDES, a patronymic of Palamedes, son of Nauplius. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 39.

NAUPLIUS, a son of Neptune and Amy-mone, king of Eubœa. He was father to the celebrated Palamedes, who was so unjustly sacrificed to the artifice and resentment of Ulysses by the Greeks during the Trojan war. The death of Palamedes highly irritated Nauplius, and, to revenge the injustice of the Grecian princes, he attempted to debauch their wives and ruin their character. When the Greeks returned from the Trojan war, Nauplius saw them with pleasure distressed in a storm on the coasts of Eubœa, and, to make their disaster still more universal, he lighted fires on such places as were surrounded with the most dangerous rocks, that the fleet might be shipwrecked upon the coast. This succeeded, but Nauplius was so disappointed when he saw Ulysses and Diomedes escape from the general calamity, that he threw himself into the sea. According to some mythologists there were two persons of this name, a native of Argos, who went to Colchis with Jason. He was son of Neptune and Amy-mone. The other was king of Eubœa, and lived during the Trojan war. He was, according to some, son of Clytonas, one of the descendants of Nauplius the Argonaut. The Argonaut was remarkable for his knowledge of sea affairs, and of astronomy. He built the town of Nauplia, and sold Ague, daughter of Aleus, to king Teuthras, to withdraw her from her father's resentment. Orph. Argon.—Apollod. 2, c. 7.—Apollon. 1, &c.—Flacc. 1 and 5.—Strab. 8.—Paus. 4, c. 35.—Hygin. fab. 116.

NAUPORTUS, a town of Pannonia on a river of the same name, now called Ober, or Upper Laybach. Vell. Pat. 2, c. 10.—Plin. 3, c. 18.—Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 20.

NAURA, a country of Scythia in Asia. Curt. 8.—Of India within the Ganges. Arrian.

NAUSICĀA, a daughter of Alcinous king of the Phæaceans. She met Ulysses shipwrecked on her father's coasts, and it was to her humanity that he owed the kind reception he experienced from the king. She married, according to Aristotle and Dictys, Telemachus the son of Ulysses, by whom she had a son called Persepolis or Ptoliporthus. Homer. Od. 6.—Paus. 5, c. 19.—Hygin. fab. 126.

NAUSITHOUS, a king of the Phæaceans, father to Alcinous. He was son of Neptune and Peribœa. Hesiod makes him son of Ulysses and Calypso. Hesiod. Th. 1, c. 16.—The pilot of the vessel which carried Theseus into Crete.

NAUSTATHMUS, [a port of Africa, in Cyrenaica, now Bondaria.—A port of Troas.]

NAUTES, a Trojan soothsayer, who comforted Æneas when his fleet had been burnt in Sicily. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 704. He was the progenitor of the Nautii at Rome, a family to whom the palladium of Troy was, in consequence of the service of their ancestors, intrusted. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 794.

NAXOS, now Naxia, a celebrated island in the Ægean Sea, the largest and most fertile of all the Cyclades, about 48 miles in circumference, and 30 broad. It was formerly called Strongyle, Dia, Dionysias, and Callipolis, and received the name of Naxos from Naxus, who was at the head of a Carian colony which settled in the island. Naxos abounds with all sorts of fruits, and its wines are still in the same repute as formerly. The Naxians were anciently governed by kings, but they afterwards exchanged this form of government for a republic, and enjoyed their liberty, till the age of Pisistratus, who appointed a tyrant over them. They were reduced by the Persians; but in the expedition of Darius and Xerxes against Greece, they revolted and fought on the side of the Greeks. During the Peloponnesian war, they supported the interest of Athens. Bacchus was the chief deity of the island. The capital was also called Naxos; and near it, on the 20th Sept. B. C. 377, the Lacedæmonians were defeated by Chabrias. [Dr. Clarke observes of Naxos, that its inhabitants are still great votaries of Bacchus. Olivier speaks in inferior terms of the present Naxian wine, adding that the inhabitants know neither how to make or preserve it. Dr. Clarke, on the contrary, observes that the wine of Naxos maintains its pristine celebrity, and that he thought it excellent. Naxos is said to have no ports for the reception of large-sized vessels, and has therefore been less subject to the visits of the Turks. Dr. Clarke states, that when he visited the island, he was told that there was not a single Mahometan in it, and that many of the inhabitants of the interior had never seen a Turk.] *Thucyd. 1, &c.—Herodot.—Diod. 5, &c.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 636.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 125.—Paus. 6, c. 16.—Pindar.—An ancient town on the eastern side of Sicily, founded 759 years before the Christian era. There was also another town at the distance of five miles from Naxos, which bore the same name, and was often called by contradistinction Taurominium. *Plin. 3.—Diod. 13.—A town of Crete, noted for hones. Plin. 36, c. 7.—A Carian who gave his name to the greatest of the Cyclades.

NAZIANZUS, a town of Cappadocia where St. Gregory was born, and hence he is called Nazianzenus.

NEA, or Nova insula, a small island between Lemnos and the Hellespont, which rose out of the sea during an earthquake. Plin. 2, c. 87.

NEERA, a woman mentioned in Virgil's Ecl. 3.—A mistress of the poet Tibullus.—A daughter of Pereus, who married Aleus, by whom she had Cepheus, Lycurgus, and Auge, who was ravished by Hercules. Apollod. 3, c. 9.—Paus. 8, c. 4.

NEETHUS, now Neto, a river of Magna Græcia near Crotona. Ovid. Met. 15, v. 51.

NEALICES, a painter, amongst whose capital pieces are mentioned a painting of Venus, a sea-fight between the Persians and Egyptians, and an ass drinking on the shore, with a crocodile preparing to attack it.

NEANDROS, (cf IA.) a town of Troas. Plin. 5, c. 30.

NEANTHES, an orator and historian of Cyzicum, who flourished 257 years B. C.

NEAPŌLIS, a city of Campania, anciently called Parthenope, [from one of the Syrens who was said to have lived there,] and now known by the name of Naples, rising like an amphitheatre at the back of a beautiful bay

[12 miles in diameter.] As the capital of that part of Italy, it is now inhabited by upwards of 350,000 souls, who exhibit the opposite marks of extravagant magnificence and extreme poverty. [This city is said to have derived its name of Neapolis, or the new city, from a colony of Cumæans, who settled here, and probably rebuilt or enlarged the ancient city; whence it was called Νεαπολις Κυμαίων, "the new city of the Cumæans." Neapolis was the favourite residence of Virgil, who was buried near the promontory of Misenum. Strabo says, that in his time many Romans resorted hither to pass a voluptuous life after the manner of the Greeks, whose language they adopted. Alaric, after having sacked Rome, passed before Neapolis without injuring it, and the same conduct was pursued by Genseric.] Suet. in Aug. 98.—A town in Africa.—A city of Thrace.—A town of Egypt.—Of Palestine.—Of Ionia.—Also a part of Syracuse. Liv. 25, c. 24.—Cic. in Verr. 5.

NEARCHUS, an officer of Alexander in his Indian expedition. [He was ordered to conduct Alexander's fleet along the Indian ocean to the Persian gulf, and, with Onescritus, to examine it.] He wrote an account of this voyage. After the king's death he was appointed over Lycia and Pamphylia. [The voyage is related by Arrian of Nicomedia, the Greek historian of Alexander, who lived under Trajan. It is comprised in his India, or general account of India, and is professedly taken from the journal of Nearchus himself. The authenticity of the narrative has been questioned by some of the learned, but is completely defended in the celebrated commentary of Dr. Vincent, late Dean of Westminster, published in 1797.] Curt. 9, c. 10.—Polyæn. 9.—Justin. 13, c. 4.—Strab. 2, &c.

NEBO, [a mountain situate east of the river Jordan, and forming part of the chain of Aharim, north of the Dead Sea. The Israelites encamped at the foot of this mountain in the 46th year of their Exodus, and Moses, having executed the commission with which he was entrusted, and having pronounced his blessing on the 12 tribes assembled to receive his last charge, ascended this mountain, from the summit of which, called Pisgah, he had a view of the promised land into which he was not permitted to enter: on this mountain he soon afterwards died.]

NEBRISSA, a town of Spain, now Lebriza.

NECESSITAS, a divinity who presided over the doctrines of mankind, and who was regarded as the mother of the Parcæ. Paus. 2, c. 4.

NECHOS, a king of Egypt, who attempted to make a communication between the Mediterranean and Red Seas, B. C. 610. No less than 120,000 men perished in the attempt. It was discovered in his reign that Africa was circumnavigable. [Herodotus states, that Necho dispatched some vessels under the conduct of Phœnician mariners, down the Red Sea, with directions to pass by the columns of Hercules and return to Egypt; in other words, to circumnavigate Africa. The Phœnicians, passing down the Red Sea, entered the southern ocean: on the approach of autumn, they landed on the coast, and planted corn; when this was ripe they cut it down and again departed. Having thus consumed two years, they in the third doubled the columns of Hercules, and returned to Egypt. This voyage has been generally deemed fabulous, but the facts mentioned by Herodotus, though few, are, according to Dr. Vincent, very consistent. Herodotus states also that the Phœnicians affirmed that they had the sun on their right hand in a part of their course, a circumstance which he deems incredible, but which affords a strong argument in favour of the voyage, since this must necessarily have been the case after the Phœnicians had passed the line.] Herodot. 2, c. 158, 1. 4, c. 42.

NECROPOLIS, one of the suburbs of Alexandria.

NECTANĒBUS and NECTANĀBIS, a king of Egypt, who defended his country against the Persians, and was succeeded by Tachos, B. C. 363. His grandson, of the same name, made an alliance with Agesilaus king of Sparta, and with his assistance he quelled a rebellion of his subjects. Some time after he was joined by the Sidonians, Phœnicians, and inhabitants of Cyprus, who had revolted from the king of Persia. This powerful confederacy was soon attacked by Darius, the king of Persia, who marched at the head of his troops. Nectanebus, to defend his frontiers against so dangerous an enemy, levied 20,000 mercenary soldiers in Greece, the same number in Libya, and 60,000 were furnished in Egypt. This numerous body was not equal to the Persian forces: and Nectanebus, defeated in a battle, gave up all hopes of resistance and fled into Æthiopia, B. C. 350, where he found a safe asylum. His kingdom of Egypt became from that time tributary to the king of Persia, Plut. Ages.—Diod. 16, &c.—Polyæn. 2.—C. Nep. in Ages.

NECYSA, a solemnity observed by the Greeks in memory of the dead.

NELEUS, a son of Neptune and Tyro. He was brother to Pelias, with whom he was exposed by his mother, who wished to conceal her shame from her father. They were preserved and brought to Tyro, who had then married Cretheus king of Iolchos. After the death of Cretheus, Pelias and Neleus seized the kingdom of Iolchos, which belonged to Æson, the lawful son of Tyro by the deceased monarch. After they had reigned for some time conjointly, Pelias expelled Neleus from Iolchos. Neleus came to Aphares king of Messenia, who treated him with kindness, and permitted him to build a city, which he called Pylos. Neleus married Chloris the daughter of Amphion, by whom he had a daughter and twelve sons, who were all, except Nestor, killed by Hercules, together with their father. Neleus promised his daughter in marriage only to him who brought him the bulls of Iphiclus. Bias was the successful lover. vid. Melampus. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 413.—Paus. 4, c. 36.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 2, c. 6.—A river of Eubœa.

NEMÆA, a town of Argolis between Cleonæ and Philius, with a wood, where Hercules, in the 16th year of his age, killed the celebrated Nemæan lion. This animal, born of the hundred-headed Typhon, infested the neighbourhood of Nemæa, and kept the inhabitants under continual alarms. It was the first labour of Hercules to destroy it; and the hero, when he found that his arrows and his club were useless against an animal whose skin was hard and impenetrable, seized him in his arms and squeezed him to death. The conqueror clothed himself in the skin, and games were instituted to commemorate so great an event. The Nemæan games were originally instituted by the Argives in honour of Archemorus, who died by the bite of a serpent, [vid. Archemorus,] and Hercules some time after renewed them. They were one of the four great and solemn games which were observed in Greece. The Argives, Corinthians, and the inhabitants of Cleonæ, generally presided by turns at the celebration, in which were exhibited foot and horse races, chariot races, boxing, wrestling, and contests of every kind, both gymnical and equestrian. The conqueror was rewarded with a crown of green parsley, in memory of the adventure of Archemorus, whom his nurse laid down on a sprig of that plant. They were celebrated every third, or, according to others, every fifth year, or more properly on the 1st and 3d year of every Olympiad, on the 12th day of the Corinthian month Panemos, which corresponds to our August. They served as an era to the Argives, and to the inhabitants of the neighbouring country. It was always usual for an orator to pronounce a funeral oration in memory of the death of Archemorus, and those who distributed the prizes were always dressed in mourning. *Liv. 27, c. 30 and 31, l. 34, c. 41.—Ovid. NEMESIA, festivals in honour of Nemesis. [vid. Nemesis.]

M. AUREL. OLYMP. NEMESIĀNUS, a Latin poet, born at Carthage, of no very brilliant talents, in the third century, whose poems on hunting and bird-catching were published by Burman, inter scriptores rei venaticæ, 4to. L. Bat. 1728. [They are edited also by Wernsdorff in the Poetæ Latini Minores, Altenb. 1790-8. Nemesianus flourished under the emperors Carus, Carinus, and Numerianus. The last of these princes had a particular esteem for him. The poem on hunting, called Cyngeticon, was so highly esteemed in the eighth century, that it was read among the classics in the public schools in the time of Charlemagne. It cannot rank high as a poetical composition, but deserves praise for its polish and elegance. Both this and the poem De Aucupio, or bird-catching, have reached us in a very mutilated state. Some, without any necessity, ascribe the latter poem to another poet of the same name.]

NEMESIS, one of the infernal deities, daughter of Nox. She was the goddess of vengeance, always prepared to punish impiety, and at the same time liberally to reward the good and virtuous. [The original meaning of the term Nemesis in Greek is, the just indignation one feels at observing the prosperity of the undeserving. The Goddess Nemesis was called Αἰσούσια, i. e. she from whom no bad man can escape.] She is made one of the Paræ by some mythologists, and is represented with a helm and a wheel. The people of Smyrna were the first who made her statues with wings, to show, with what celerity she is prepared to punish the crimes of the wicked both by sea and land, as the helm and the wheel in her hands intimate. Her power did not only exist in this life, but she was also employed after death to find out the most effectual and rigorous means of correction. Nemesis was particularly worshipped at Rhamnus in Attica, where she had a celebrated statue 10 cubits long, made of Parian marble by Phidias, or, according to others, by one of his pupils. The Romans were also particularly attentive to the adoration of a deity whom they solemnly invoked, and to whom they offered sacrifices before they declared war against their enemies, to show the world that their wars were undertaken upon the most just grounds. Her statue at Rome was in the capitol. Some suppose that Nemesis was the person whom Jupiter deceived in the form of a swan, and that Leda was intrusted with the care of the children which sprang from the two eggs. Others observe that Leda obtained the name of Nemesis after death. According to Pausanias, there were more than one Nemesis. The goddess Nemesis was surnamed Rhamnusia, because worshipped at Rhamnus. [The temple at this place is said to have been built of the marble which the Persians brought with them into the plain of Marathon, in anticipation of their expected victory.] The Greeks celebrated a festival, called Nemesia, in memory of deceased persons, as the goddess Nemesis was supposed to defend the relics and the memory of the dead from all insult. *Hygin. NEMESIUS, [a native of Emesa, in Syria, and bishop of that city, about A. D. 400. He has left a work "On the nature of man," in forty-four books, which is sometimes ascribed to Gregory of Nyssa, but from no other reason, it would seem, than because the latter wrote a work under the same title.

The treatise of Nemesius is one of the best productions of Christian antiquity. He displays in it a remarkable knowledge of physics, considering the period in which he lived, and an intimate acquaintance with the writings and doctrines of the ancient philosophers. His style, formed on good models, is much purer than that of most of his contemporaries. The best edition is that of Matthiæ, Halle. 1802, in 8vo.]

NEOPTŌLEMUS, a king of Epirus, son of Achilles and Deidamia, called Pyrrhus, from the yellow colour of his hair. He was carefully educated under the eye of his mother, and gave early proofs of his valour. After the death of Achilles, Calchas declared in the assembly of the Greeks, that Troy could not be taken without the assistance of the son of the deceased hero. Immediately upon this Ulysses and Phoenix were commissioned to bring Pyrrhus to the war. He returned with them with pleasure, and received the name of Neoptolemus, (new soldier), because he had come late to the field. On his arrival before Troy he paid a visit to the tomb of his father, and wept over his ashes. He afterwards, according to some authors, accompanied Ulysses to Lemnos, to engage Philoctetes, to come to the Trojan war. He greatly signalized himself during the remaining time of the siege, and he was the first who entered the wooden horse. He was inferior to none of the Grecian warriors in valour, and Ulysses and Nestor alone could claim a superiority over him in eloquence, wisdom, and address. His cruelty, however, was as great as that of his father. Not satisfied with breaking down the gates of Priam's palace, he exercised the greatest barbarity upon the remains of his family, and without any regard to the sanctity of the place where Priam had taken refuge, he slaughtered him without mercy; or, according to others, dragged him by the hair to the tomb of his father, where he sacrificed him, and where he cut off his head, and carried it in exultation through the streets of Troy, fixed on the point of a spear. He also sacrificed Astyanax to his fury, and immolated Polyxena on the tomb of Achilles, according to those who deny that the sacrifice was voluntary. When Troy was taken, the captives were divided among the conquerors, and Pyrrhus had for his share Andromache the widow of Hector, and Helenus the son of Priam. With these he departed for Greece, and he probably escaped from destruction by giving credit to the words of Helenus, who foretold him that if he sailed with the rest of the Greeks, his voyage would be attended with fatal consequences, and perhaps with death. This obliged him to take a different course from the rest of the Greeks, and he travelled over the greatest part of Thrace, where he had a severe encounter with queen Harpalyce. [vid. Harpalyce.] The place of his retirement after the Trojan war is not known. Some maintain that he went to Thessaly, where his grandfather still reigned; but this is confuted by others, who observe perhaps with more reason, that he went to Epirus where he laid the foundations of a new kingdom, because his grandfather Peleus had been deprived of his sceptre by Acastus the son of Pelias. Neoptolemus lived with Andromache after his arrival in Greece, but it is unknown whether he treated her as a lawful wife or a concubine. He had a son by this unfortunate princess, called Molossus, and two others, if we rely on the authority of Pausanias. Besides Andromache he married Hermione the daughter of Menelaus, as also Lanassa the daughter of Cleodæus, one of the descendants of Hercules. The cause of his death is variously related. Menelaus, before the Trojan war, had promised his daughter Hermione to Orestes, but the services he experienced from the valour and the courage of Neoptolemus during the siege of Troy, induced him to reward his merit by making him his son-in-law. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated, but Hermione became jealous of Andromache, and because she had no children, she resolved to destroy her Trojan rival who seemed to steal away the affections of their common husband. In the absence of Neoptolemus at Delphi, Hermione attempted to murder Andromache, but she was prevented by the interference of Peleus, or, according to others, of the populace. When she saw her schemes defeated, she determined to lay violent hands upon herself to avoid the resentment of Neoptolemus. The sudden arrival of Orestes changed her resolutions, and she consented to elope with her lover to Sparta. Orestes, at the same time to revenge and to punish his rival, caused him to be assassinated in the temple of Delphi, and he was murdered at the foot of the altar by Machareus the priest, or by the hand of Orestes himself, according to Virgil, Paterculus, and Hyginus. Some say that he was murdered by the Delphians, who had been bribed by the presents of Orestes. It is unknown why Neoptolemus went to Delphi. Some support that he wished to consult the oracle to know how he might have children by the barren Hermione; others say that he went thither to offer the spoils which he had obtained during the Trojan war, to appease the resentment of Apollo whom he had provoked by calling him the cause of the death of Achilles. The plunder of the rich temple of Delphi, if we believe others, was the object of the journey of Neoptolemus; and it cannot but be observed, that he suffered the same death and the same barbarities which he had inflicted in the temple of Minerva upon the aged Priam and his wretched family. From this circumstance the ancients have made use of the proverb of Neoptolemic revenge when a person had suffered the same savage treatment which others had received from his hand. The Delphians celebrated a festival with great pomp and solemnity in memory of Neoptolemus, who had been slain in his attempt to plunder their temple, because, as they said, Apollo, the patron of the place, had been in some manner accessory to the death of Achilles. Paterc. 1, c. 1.—*Virg. NEPHELE, the first wife of Athamas king of Thebes, and mother of Phryxus and Helle. She was repudiated on pretence of being subject to fits of insanity, and Athamas married Ino the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had several children. Ino became jealous of Nephele, because her children would succeed to their father's throne before her's by right of seniority, and she resolved to destroy them. Nephele was apprized of her wicked intentions, and she removed her children from the reach of Ino, by giving them a celebrated ram sprung from the union of Neptune and Theophane, on whose back they escaped to Colchis. [vid. Phryxus.] Nephele was afterwards changed into a cloud, whence her name is given by the Greeks to the clouds. Some call her Nebula, which word is the Latin translation of Nephele. CORN. NEPOS, a celebrated historian in the reign of Augustus. He was born at Hostilia, and, like the rest of his learned contemporaries, he shared the favours and enjoyed the patronage of the emperor. [Hostilia was a small place in the vicinity of Verona, and, as this last was included in Cisalpine Gaul, we may hence account for Nepos being called by Ausonius a Gaul.] He was the intimate friend of Cicero and of Atticus, and recommended himself to the notice of the great and opulent by delicacy of sentiment and a lively disposition. According to some writers he composed three books of chronicles, as also a biographical account of all the most celebrated kings, generals, and authors of antiquity. [Aulus Gellius cites this work under the title of Chronicles; Jornandes under that of Annals. The former, as also the grammarian Charisius, cites his 'Books of Examples,' making mention of the fifth of them. Charisius speaks also of the 16th book of a work by Nepos, entitled "Illustrious Men." He had written also a life of Cicero. In Dion. c. 3, he speaks of a work written by himself, styled "The Greek Historians." Finally, some have imagined, from a passage of Nepos, that he had composed also a work called "The lives of the Kings;" but this is mere hypothesis.] Of all his valuable compositions nothing remains but his lives of the illustrious Greek and Roman generals, which have often been attributed to Æmilius Probus, who published them in his own name in the age of Theodosius, to conciliate the favour and the friendship of that emperor. The language of Cornelius had always been admired; and as a writer of the Augustan age, he is entitled to many commendations for the delicacy of his expressions, the elegance of his style, and the clearness and precision of his narrations. Some support that he translated Dares Phrygius from the Greek original; but the inelegance of the diction, and its many incorrect expressions plainly prove that it is the production, not of a writer of the Augustan age, but the spurious composition of a more modern pen. [It has been said above that the "Lives" of Nepos were published in his own name by Æmilius Probus. In the dedication of this latter writer, which is in bad Latin verse, no mention whatever is made of Nepos, and Probus claims the work as the joint production of himself, his father, and grandfather. One is astonished at the want of intelligence on the part of his readers, in their not perceiving the discrepancy between the thoughts and sentiments which prevailed in the age of Nepos and those which characterized the reign of Theodosius; nor in being struck with the difference between the barbarous style of the writers who flourished in the latter period, and the elegance of the golden age which marks the diction of the historian. It must be confessed, however, that the style of the "Life of Atticus," which the manuscripts unanimously ascribe to Nepos, while they all agree in naming Æmilius Probus as the author of the "Lives of illustrious commanders," differs essentially from that of the last mentioned work, in which may be observed various unusual expressions, singular constructions, and some solecisms which may well excite surprise if regarded as coming from a contemporary of Cicero. It seems most reasonable to adopt the conjecture of Barth, that Probus treated the work of Nepos, as Justin did that of Trogius Pompeius, in making changes, additions, and retrenchments throughout. This hypothesis acquires additional weight from what Nepos himself observes, towards the conclusion of his preface, respecting the large size of the volume which he was giving to the world. Nepos has been charged with various errors by modern critics, which, as his book is so generally placed in the hands of the young, it may not be amiss here to enumerate. 1st. in the life of Phocion he has mistaken the Greek words εμφυλοσ τις, "a certain person of the same tribe," for a proper name, Emphyletus. It is believed, however, by Tzschucke, a recent editor, that Phocion may have had a friend of this name, since the same appellation occurs in Andocides. Without some excuse of this kind, Nepos's knowledge of Greek becomes very doubtful. 2. He confounds Miltiades, the son of Cimon, with Miltiades, the son of Cypselus. Herodotus (6, c. 34, seqq.) informs us that the latter conducted a colony of Athenians into the Chersonese, and established a sovereignty there. 3d. In the life of Pausanias, chapter 1, he confounds together Darius and Xerxes. Mardonius was the son-in-law of the first, and the brother-in-law of the last. 4th. He confounds the victory of Mycale, gained by Xantippus and Leotychides, with the naval battle gained by Cimon, nine years after, near the river Eurymedon. (vid. Mycale.) 5th. In comparing the end of the second chapter and the commencement of the third of the life of Pausanias, with the clear and circumstantial narrative of Thucydides (1, c. 130—134,) we will perceive that Nepos has violated the order of time, and confounded the events. 6th. There is no less disorder in the third chapter of the life of Lysander, Nepos confounds two expeditions this general into Asia, between which there elapsed an interval of seven years. Compare Xen. Hellen. 3, c. 4, 7—10. —Diod. Sic. 14, c. 13. 7th. In the second chapter of the life of Dion, Nepos confounds the order of events. Plato made three voyages to Sicily; the first in the time of Dionysius the elder, who had him sold as a slave; Dion was then only 14 years old. At the time of his second voyage, Dionysius the elder was no longer alive. It was during his third visit to the island that the philosopher reconciled Dion and Dionysius the younger. Finally, it was not Dionysius the elder, but the son, who invited Plato magna ambitione. 8th. In the second chapter of the life of Chabrias utter confusion prevails. At the period when Nepos makes Agesilaus to have gone on his expedition into Egypt, this monarch was busily occupied in Bœotia, and Nepos himself, in his life of Agesilaus, makes no mention of this expedition. The king of Egypt, who was assisted by Chabrias, and afterwards by Agesilaus, was Tachus, and not Nectanebus. 9th. Annibal did not immediately march to Rome after the victory at Cannæ, as Nepos in his life of Annibal, chap. 5, states, but after having permitted the spirit of his army to become corrupted in Campania. 10th. In the life of Conon, chap. 1, he says that this general had no share in the battle of Egos Potamos; the contrary is proved by Xenophon, Hellen. 2, c. 1, 29. 11th. In the life of Agesilaus, chap. 5, he attributes to this king the victory at Corinth, which was due to Aristodemus, as Xenophon informs us, Hellen. 4, c. 2, 9—23.] Among the many good editions of Cornelius Nepos, two may be selected as the best, that of [Van Staveren,] 8vo. L. Bat. 1773, and that of Glasgow, 12mo. 1761. [By far the best now, is the edition of Fischer, Lips. 1806, 8vo.]—Julius, an emperor of the west, &c.

NEPTUNUS, [in Greek Ποσειδων, vid. the end of this article,] son of Saturn and Ops, and brother to Jupiter, Pluto, and Juno. He was devoured by his father the day of his birth, and again restored to life by means of Metis, who gave Saturn a certain potion. Pausanias says that his mother concealed him in a sheep-fold in Arcadia, and she imposed upon her husband, telling him that she had brought a colt into the world, which was instantly devoured by Saturn. Neptune shared with his brothers the empire of Saturn, and received as his portion the kingdom of the sea. This, however, did not seem equivalent to the empire of heaven and earth, which Jupiter had claimed, therefore he conspired to dethrone him with the rest of the gods. The conspiracy was discovered, and Jupiter condemned Neptune to build the walls of Troy. [vid. Laomedon.] A reconciliation was soon after made, and Neptune was reinstated to all his rights and privileges. Neptune disputed with Minerva the right of giving a name to the capital of Cœropia, but he was defeated, and the olive which the goddess suddenly raised from the earth was deemed more serviceable for the good of mankind than the horse which Neptune had produced by striking the ground with his trident, as that animal is the emblem of war and slaughter. This decision did not please Neptune, he renewed the combat by disputing for Træzene, but Jupiter settled their disputes by permitting them to be conjointly worshipped there, and by giving the name of Polias, or the protectress of the city, to Minerva, and that of king of Træzene to the god of the sea. He also disputed his right for the isthmus of Corinth with Apollo; and Briareus the Cyclops, who was mutually chosen umpire, gave the isthmus to Neptune and the promontory to Apollo. Neptune, as being god of the sea, was entitled to more power than any of the other gods, except Jupiter. Not only the ocean, rivers, and fountains, were subjected to him, but he also could cause earthquakes at his pleasure, and raise islands from the bottom of the sea with a blow of his trident. The worship of Neptune was established in almost every part of the earth, and the Libyans in particular venerated him above all other nations, and looked upon him as the first and greatest of the gods. The Greeks and the Romans were also attached to his worship, and they celebrated their Isthmian games and Consualia with the greatest solemnity. He was generally represented sitting in a chariot made of a shell, and drawn by sea horses or dolphins. Sometimes he is drawn by winged horses, and holds his trident in his hand, and stands up as his chariot flies over the surface of the sea. Homer represents him as issuing from the sea, and in three steps crossing the whole horizon. The mountains and the forests, says the poet, trembled as he walked; the whales, and all the fishes of the sea, appear round him; and even the sea herself seems to feel the presence of her god. The ancients generally sacrificed a bull and a horse on his altars, and the Roman soothsayers always offered to him the gall of the victims, which in taste resembles the bitterness of the sea water. The amours of Neptune are numerous. He obtained, by means of a dolphin, the favours of Amphitrite, who had made a vow of perpetual celibacy, and he placed among the constellations the fish which had persuaded the goddess to become his wife. He also married Venilia and Salacia, which are only the names of Amphitrite, according to some authors, who observe that the former word is derived from venire, alluding to the continual motion of the sea. Salacia is derived from salum, which signifies the sea, and is applicable to Amphitrite. Neptune became a horse to enjoy the company of Ceres. (vid. Arion.) To deceive Theophane, he changed himself into a ram. (vid. Theophane.) He assumed the form of the river Enipeus to gain the confidence of Tyro, the daughter of Salmones, by whom he had Pelias and Neleus. He was also father of Phoreus and Polyphemus by Thoosa; of Lycus, Nycteus, and Euphemus, by Celeo; of Chryses by Chrysoenia; of Ancæus by Astypalæ; of Bœotus and Hellen by Antiope; of Leucæon by Themisto; of Agenor and Bellerophon by Eurynome the daughter of Nysus; of Antas by Alcyone the daughter of Atlas; of Abas by Arethusa; of Actor and Dycis by Agemede the daughter of Augias; of Megareus by (Enope daughter of Epopeus; of Cyclus by Harpalyce; of Taras, Otus, Ephialtes, Dorus, Alesus, &c. The word Neptunus is often used metaphorically by the poets, to signify sea water. In the Consualia of the Romans, horses were led through the streets finely equipped and crowned with garlands, as the god in whose honour the festivals were instituted had produced, the horse, an animal so beneficial for the use of mankind. [Neptune was originally a Libyan god, and the Greeks derived his worship from that country. The Phœnicians very probably landed at an early period in Africa, and brought the horse with them, which they taught the savage inhabitants to manage. The latter, seeing them master both the most terrible of elements, the sea, and the most spirited of animals, regarded them as divinities. Hence the horse became sacred to Neptune. The Consus of the Romans appears to have been the sea deified by the Aborigines, and whose worship became subsequently identified with that of Neptune; which last was introduced by the early Greek colonies. Plato (in Cratylus) derives the name Ποσειδών from πους and δω, because Neptune binds our feet in his dominions; and Varro derives Neptunus from nubo, "quod mare terras obnubat:" both appellations, however, are evident corruption of Oriental terms.] Paus. 1, 2, &c.—Homer. Il. 7, &c.—*Varro de L. NÉRÉIDES, nymphs of the sea, daughters of Nereus and Doris. [vid. the end of this article.] They were fifty, according to the greater number of the mythologists, whose names are as follows: Sao, Amphitrite, Proto, Galatea, Thoe, Eucrate, Eudora, Galena, Glauce, Thetis, Spio, Cymothoe, Melita, Thalia, Agave, Eulimene, Erato, Pasithea, Doto, Eunice, Nesea, Dynamene, Pherusa, Protomelia, Actea, Penope, Doris, Cymatolege, Hippothoe, Cymo, Eione, Hipponoe, Cymodoce, Neso, Eupompe, Pronoe, Themisto, Glaucanome, Halimede, Pontoporia, Evagora, Liagora, Polynome, Laomadia, Lysianassa, Autonoe, Menippe, Evarne, Pamathe, Nemertes. In those which Homer mentions, to the number of 30, we find the following names different from those spoken of by Hesiod; Halia, Limmoria, Iera, Amphitroe, Dexamene, Amphinome, Callianira, Apseudes, Callanassa, Clymene, Janira, Nassa, Mera, Orithya, Amatheia. Apollodorus, who mentions 45, mentions the following names different from the others; Glaucothoe, Protomedusa, Pione, Pleasura, Calypso, Cranto, Neomeris, Dejanira, Polynoe, Melia, Dione, Isea, Dero, Eumolpe, Ione, Ceto. Hyginus and others differ from the preceding authors in the following names: Drymo, Xantho, Ligæa, Phyllodoce, Cydippe, Lycorias, Cleio, Beroe, Ephira, Opis, Asia, Deocea, Arethusa, Crenis, Eurydice, and Leucothoe. The Nereides were implored as the rest of the deities; they had altars, chiefly on the coasts of the sea, where the piety of mankind made offerings of milk, oil, and honey, and often of the flesh of goats. When they were on the sea-shore they generally resided in grottos and caves which were adorned with shells, and shaded by the branches of vines. Their duty was to attend upon the more powerful deities of the sea, and to be subservient to the will of Neptune. They were particularly fond of halcyons, and as they had the power of ruffling or calming the waters, they were always addressed by sailors, who implored their protection that they might grant them a favourable voyage and a prosperous return. They are represented as young and handsome virgins, sitting on dolphins, and holding Neptune's trident in their hand, or sometimes garlands of flowers. [It has been a subject of inquiry with regard to the Nereids, whether they are to be considered as metaphorical personages, or as real beings. Those whom Homer and Hesiod name are mostly poetical persons; but some of them had a real existence, as Cassiope, the mother of Andromeda, Psamathe, the mother of Phoece, from whom the country into which she removed was called Phocis, Thetis the mother of Achilles, and some others. It must be observed, however, that the name of Nereides was given at first to princesses who inhabited some islands on the sea-coast, and became famous for the establishment of commerce and navigation. It was transferred afterwards to some poetical personages, who owe their existence only to etymologies conformable to the qualities implied in their names, and even to certain fishes that have the upper part of their bodies much like that of women. Pliny states, that in the time of Tiberius there was seen upon the sea-shore a Nereid, such as the poets represent them, "humana effigie," and that an ambassador from Gaul had told Augustus that upon the sea-coasts several dead Nereides had been seen. This wears, however, the appearance of fable.] *Orpheus, Hymn. 23.—Catul. de Rapt. Pel.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 361, &c.—Stat. 2, Sylv. 2, l. 3, Sylv. 1.—Paus. 2, c. 1.—Apollod. 1, c. 2 and 3.—Hesiod. NEREUS, a deity of the sea, son of Oceanus and Terra. He married Doris, by whom he had 50 daughters, called the Nereides. [vid. Nereides.], Nereus was generally represented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and hair of an azure colour. The chief place of his residence was in the Ægean Sea, where he was surrounded by his daughters, who often danced in choruses round him. He had the gift of prophecy, and informed those that consulted him of the different fates that attended them. He acquainted Paris with the consequences of his elopement with Helen; and it was by his directions that Hercules obtained the golden apples of the Hesperides, but the sea god often evaded the importunities of inquirers by assuming different shapes, and totally escaping from their grasp. The word Nereus is often taken for the sea itself. Nereus is sometimes called the most ancient of all the gods. Hesiod. Theog.—Hygin.—Homer. Il. 18.—Apollod.—Orpheus. Argon.—Horat. 1, od. 13.—Eurip. in Iphig.

NERITOS, a mountain in the island of Ithaca, as also a small island in the Ionian Sea, according to Mela. The word Neritos is often applied to the whole island of Ithaca, and Ulysses, the king of it, is called Neritius dux, and his ship Neritia navis. The people of Saguntum, as descended from a Neritian colony, are called Neritia proles. Sil. It. 2, v. 317.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 271.—Plin. 4.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 712. Rem. A. 263.

NERO, Claudius Domitius Cæsar, a celebrated Roman emperor, son of Caius Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. He was adopted by the emperor Claudius, A. D. 50, and four years after he succeeded to him on the throne. The beginning of his reign was marked by acts of the greatest kindness and condescension, by affability, complaisance, and popularity. The object of his administration seemed to be the good of his people: and when he was desired to sign his name to a list of malefactors that were to be executed, he exclaimed, I wish to heaven I could not write. He was an enemy to flattery, and when the senate had liberally commended the wisdom of his government, Nero desired them to keep their praises till he deserved them. These promising virtues were soon discovered to be artificial, and Nero displayed the propensities of his nature. He delivered himself from the sway of his mother, and at last ordered her to be assassinated. This unnatural act of barbarity might astonish some of the Romans, but Nero had his devoted adherents; and when he declared that he had taken away his mother's life to save himself from ruin, the senate applauded his measures, and the people signified their approbation. Many of his courtiers shared the unhappy fate of Agrippina, and Nero sacrificed to his fury or caprice all such as obstructed his pleasure, or diverted his inclination. In the night he generally sallied out from his palace to visit the meanest taverns, and all the scenes of debauchery which Rome contained. In this nocturnal riot he was fond of insulting the people in the streets, and his attempts to offer violence to the wife of a Roman senator nearly cost him his life. He also turned actor, and publicly appeared on the Roman stage in the meanest characters. In his attempts to excel in music, and to conquer the disadvantages of a hoarse rough voice, he moderated his meals, and often passed the day without eating. The celebrity of the Olympian games attracted his notice. He passed into Greece, and presented himself as a candidate for the public honour. He was defeated in wrestling, but the flattery of the spectators adjudged him the victory, and Nero returned to Rome with all the pomp and splendour of an eastern conqueror, drawn in the chariot of Augustus, and attended by a band of musicians, actors, and stage-dancers from every part of the empire. These private and public amusements of the emperor were indeed innocent, his character was injured, but not the lives of the people. But his conduct soon became more abominable: he disguised himself in the habit of a woman, and was publicly married to one of his eunuchs. This violence to nature and decency was soon exchanged for another; Nero resumed his sex, and celebrated his nuptials with one of his meanest catamites; and it was on this occasion that one of the Romans observed, that the world would have been happy if Nero's father had had such a wife. But now his cruelty was displayed in a more superlative degree, and he sacrificed to his wantonness his wife Octavia Poppæa, and the celebrated writers, Seneca, Lucan, Petronius, &c. The Christians also did not escape his barbarity. He had heard of the burning of Troy, and as he wished to renew that dismal scene, he caused Rome to be set on fire in different places. The conflagration became soon universal, and during nine successive days the fire was unextinguished. All was desolation, nothing was heard but the lamentations of mothers whose children had perished in the flames, the groans of the dying, and the continual fall of palaces and buildings. Nero was the only one who enjoyed the general consternation. He placed himself on the top of a high tower, and he sang on his lyre the destruction of Troy; a dreadful scene, which his barbarity had realized before his eyes. He attempted to avert the public odium from his head, by a feigned commiseration of the miseries of his subjects. He began to repair the streets and the public buildings at his own expense. [Suetonius and Dio Cassius positively charge this conflagration on Nero; but Tacitus expresses a doubt concerning its origin, and the probability is that the fire was accidental. Nero was at Antium when it commenced, but he returned in time to see the palace in flames. He now opened his gardens, and caused sheds to be erected for the multitudes who were deprived of their homes, and at the same time took measures to prevent a scarcity, and supply the most pressing wants of the people. The emperor might have gained credit, on the whole, by this disaster, had not the suspicion of his being the author still maintained its ground in the minds of the people. The method he took to divert it, was by a horrible persecution of the Christians, which has justly braided him with the title of the first persecutor of the church.] He built himself a celebrated palace, which he called his golden house. It was profusely adorned with gold, with precious stones, and with whatever was rare and exquisite. It contained spacious fields, artificial lakes, woods, gardens, orchards, and whatever could exhibit beauty and grandeur. The entrance of this edifice could admit a large colossus of the emperor 120 feet high, the galleries were each a mile long, and the whole was covered with gold. The roofs of the dining halls represented the firmament, in motion as well as in figure, and continually turned round night and day, showering down all sorts of perfumes and sweet waters. [Not content with covering the whole of the Palatine hill with his "Golden House," Nero extended its gardens and pleasure-grounds over the whole plain south of the Forum, and even upon the Esquiline and Cœlian hills. The Colosseum occupies the site of the largest of those lakes which Nero made in his gardens, and which Tacitus describes in such glowing colours. It is said that Vespasian, at the same time that he drained the lake, pulled down all that Nero had erected beyond the Palatine, reducing the imperial palace to the hill that once contained Rome; and that he built the stupendous amphitheatre, the temple of Peace, and the Baths of Titus out of the materials of this portion of the "Golden House."] When this grand edifice, which, according to Pliny, extended all round the city, was finished, Nero said, that now he could lodge like a man. His profusion was not less remarkable in all his other actions. When he went a fishing his nets were made with gold and silk. He never appeared twice in the same garment, and when he undertook a voyage, there were thousands of servants to take care of his wardrobe. This continuation of debauchery and extravagance at last roused the resentment of the people. Many conspiracies were formed against the emperor, but they were generally discovered, and such as were necessary suffered the greatest punishments. The most dangerous conspiracy against Nero's life was that of Piso, from which he was delivered by the confession of a slave. The conspiracy of Galba proved more successful; and the conspirator, when he was informed that his plot was known to Nero, declared himself emperor. The unpopularity of Nero favoured his cause, he was acknowledged by all the Roman empire, and the senate condemned the tyrant that sat on the throne to be dragged naked through the streets of Rome, and whipped to death, and afterwards to be thrown down from the Tarpeian rock like the meanest malefactor. This, however, was not done; and Nero, by a voluntary death, prevented the execution of the sentence. He killed himself, A. D. 68, in the 32d year of his age, after a reign of 13 years and eight months. Rome was filled with acclamation at the intelligence, and the citizens, more strongly to indicate their joy, wore caps, such as were generally used by slaves who had received their freedom. Their vengeance was not only exercised against the statues of the deceased tyrant, but his friends were the objects of the public resentment, and many were crushed to pieces in such a violent manner, that one of the senators, amid the universal joy, said that he was afraid they should soon have cause to wish for Nero. The tyrant, as he expired, begged that his head might not be cut off from his body, and exposed to the insolence of an enraged populace, but that the whole might be burned on the funeral pile. His request was granted by one of Galba's freedmen, and his obsequies were performed with the usual ceremonies. Though his death seemed to be the source of universal gladness, yet many of his favourites lamented his fall, and were grieved to see that their pleasures and amusements were stopped by the death of the patron of debauchery and extravagance. Even the king of Parthia sent ambassadors to Rome to condole with the Romans, and to beg that they would honour and revere the memory of Nero. His statues were also crowned with garlands of flowers, and many believed that he was not dead, but that he would soon make his appearance and take due vengeance upon his enemies. It will be sufficient to observe, in finishing the character of this tyrannical emperor, that the name of Nero is even now used emphatically to express a barbarous and unfeeling oppressor. Pliny calls him the common enemy and the fury of mankind; and in this he has been followed by all writers, who exhibit Nero as a pattern of the most execrable barbarity and unpardonable wantonness. *Plut. in Galb.—Suet. in Vitâ.—Tacit. An engagement was fought near the river Metaurus, in which 56,000 of the Carthaginians were left in the field of battle, and great numbers taken prisoners, 207 B. C. Asdrubal, the Carthaginian general, was also killed, and his head cut off and thrown into his brother's camp by the conquerors. NERONIÆ THERMÆ, baths at Rome made by the emperor Nero.

NERVA COCCÆUS, a Roman emperor after the death of Domitian, A. D. 96. [He was descended from a Cretan family which had become Roman in the reign of Augustus. He was prætor when Nero conferred upon him triumphal honours, and was consul for the first time in the year 71, with Vespasian, and afterwards with Domitian, in the year 90. The conspirators who had formed their plans for freeing the empire from the tyranny of Domitian, applied to Nerva to succeed him, and he accordingly became emperor, A. D. 96.] He rendered himself popular by his mildness, his generosity, and the active part he took in the management of affairs. He suffered no statues to be raised to his honour, and he applied to the use of the government all the gold and silver statues which flattery had erected to his predecessor. In his civil character he was the pattern of good manners, of sobriety, and temperance. He forbade the mutilation of male children, and gave no countenance to the law which permitted the marriage of an uncle with his niece. He made a solemn declaration that no senator should suffer death during his reign; and this he observed with such sanctity that, when two members of the senate had conspired against his life, he was satisfied to tell them that he was informed of their wicked machinations. He also conducted them to the public spectacles, and seated himself between them, and, when a sword was offered to him, according to the usual custom, he desired the conspirators to try it upon his body. Such goodness of heart, such confidence in the self-conviction of the human mind, and such reliance upon the consequence of his lenity and indulgence, conciliated the affection of all his subjects. Yet, as envy and danger are the constant companions of greatness, the prætorian guards at last mutinied, and Nerva nearly yielded to their fury. He uncovered his aged neck in the presence of the incensed soldiery, and bade them wreak their vengeance upon him, provided they spared the life of those to whom he was indebted for the empire, and whom his honour commanded him to defend. His seeming submission was unavailing, and he was at last obliged to surrender to the fury of his soldiers some of his friends and supporters. The infirmities of his age, and his natural timidity, at last obliged him to provide himself against any future mutiny or tumult, by choosing a worthy successor. He had many friends and relations, but he did not consider the aggrandizement of his family, and he chose for his son and successor, Trajan, a man of whose virtues and greatness of mind he was fully convinced. This voluntary choice was approved by the acclamations of the people, and the wisdom and prudence which marked the reign of Trajan, showed how discerning was the judgment, and how affectionate were the intentions of Nerva for the good of Rome. He died on the 27th of July, A. D. 98, in his 72d year, and his successor showed his respect for his merit and his character by raising him altars and temples in Rome, and in the provinces, and by ranking him in the number of the gods. Nerva was the first Roman emperor who was of foreign extraction, his father being a native of Crete. Plin. paneg.—Diod. 69.—M. Cocceius, a consul in the reign of Tiberius. He starved himself because he would not be concerned in the extravagance of the emperor.—A celebrated lawyer, consul with the emperor Vespasian. He was father to the emperor of that name.

NERVII, a warlike people of Belgic Gaul, [whose country lay on both sides of the Scaldis, or Scheldt, near the sources of that river; afterwards Hainault, and Nord. Their original capital was Bagacum, now Bavia; but afterwards Camaracum, or Cambrai, and Turnacum, or Tournay, became its chief cities towards the end of the fourth century.] They continually upbraided the neighbouring nations for submitting to the power of the Romans. They attacked J. Cæsar, and were totally defeated. Lucan. 1, v. 428.—Cæs. Bell. G. 2, c. 15.

NESSUS, a celebrated centaur, son of Ixion and the Cloud. He offered violence to Dejanira, whom Hercules had intrusted to his care, with orders to carry her across the river Evenus. (vid. Dejanira.) Hercules saw the distress of his wife from the opposite shore of the river, and immediately he let fly one of his poisoned arrows, which struck the centaur to the heart. Nessus, as he expired, gave the tunic he then wore to Dejanira, assuring her, that, from the poisoned blood which had flowed from his wounds, it had received the power of calling a husband away from unlawful loves. Dejanira received it with pleasure, and this mournful present caused the death of Hercules. *vid. NESTOLES, a famous statuary of Greece, rival to Phidias. Plin. 34, c. 8.

NESTOR, a son of Neleus and Chloris, nephew to Pelias, and grandson to Neptune. [vid. Pylos.] He had eleven brothers, who were all killed, with his father, by Hercules.

His tender age detained him at home, and was the cause of his preservation. The conqueror spared his life, and placed him on the throne of Pylos. He married Eurydice, the daughter of Clymenes, or, according to others, Anaxibia, the daughter of Atræus. He early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and was present at the nuptials of Pirithous, when a bloody battle was fought between the Lapithæ and *Centaur*s. As king of Pylos and Messenia he led his subjects to the Trojan war, where he distinguished himself among the rest of the Grecian chiefs, by eloquence, address, wisdom, justice, and an uncommon prudence of mind. Homer displays his character as the most perfect of all his heroes; and Agamemnon exclaims, that if he had ten generals like Nestor, he should soon see the walls of Troy reduced to ashes. After the Trojan war, Nestor retired to Greece, where he enjoyed, in the bosom of his family, the peace and tranquillity which were due to his wisdom and to his old age. The manner and the time of his death are unknown; the ancients are all agreed that he lived three generations of men, which length of time some suppose to be 300 years, though, more probably, only 90, allowing 30 years for each generation. From that circumstance, therefore, it was usual among the Greeks and the Latins, when they wished a long and happy life to their friends, to wish them to see the years of Nestor. He had two daughters, Pisidice and Polycaste; and seven sons, Perseus, Straticus, Aretus, Echepron, Pisistratus, Antiochus, and Trasimedes. Nestor was one of the Argonauts, according to Valerius Flaccus 1, v. 380, &c.—Dictys. Met. 12, v. 169, &c.—Horat. 1, od. 15.—A poet of Lycaonia in the age of the emperor Severus. Nestor was father to Pisander, who, under the emperor Alexander, wrote some fabulous stories.

NESTORIUS, a bishop of Constantinople, who flourished A. D. 431. He was condemned and degraded from his episcopal dignity for heretical opinions. [Nestor, according to Mosheim, was a man remarkable for his learning and eloquence; which were, however, accompanied with much levity and with intolerable arrogance, and it may be added with violent enmity to all sectaries. The peculiarity in his doctrine was this: that the Virgin Mary should not be called Mother of God, but Mother of Christ, since the Deity can neither be born nor die, and of consequence the son of man alone could derive his birth from an earthly parent. His doctrine was well received by many, but encountered at the same time violent opposition from others, who believed that he was reviving the error of Paulus Samosatæus, and Photinus, that Jesus Christ was a mere man. The principal opponent of Nestorius was Cyril. They mutually anathematized each other, and when there was no prospect of an amicable termination of the dispute, a council was called at Ephesus, A. D. 431, by Theodosius the younger. Nestorius was condemned unheard, and being deprived of his episcopal dignity was banished to Petra in Arabia, and afterwards to one of the Oases in Africa, where he died. From him have come the Nestorian Christians. The chief points which distinguish them from other Christians are, a belief that Mary was not the mother of our Lord as God, but only as man; a persuasion that Nestorius was unjustly condemned by the council of Ephesus; and their firm attachment to the doctrine that there were not only two distinct natures, but also two distinct persons, in the Son of God.]

NĒSTUS, or NĒSSUS, now Nesto, a small river of Thrace, rising in Mount Rhodope, and falling into the Ægean Sea above the island of Thasos. It was for some time the boundary of Macedonia on the east, in the more extensive power of that kingdom.

NETUM, a town of Sicily, now called Noto, on the eastern coast. Sil. 14, v. 269.—Cic. in Verr. 4, c. 26, l. 5, c. 51.

NICÆA, a city of India, built by Alexander on the [banks of the Hydaspes, in honour of his victory over Porus.]—A town of Achaia near Thermopylæ, on the bay of Malia.—A town of Illyricum.—Another in Corsica.—Another in Thrace.—In Bœotia.—A town of Bithynia, (now Nice or Isnik.) built by Antigonus, the son of Philip, king of Macedonia. It was originally called Antigonia, and afterwards Nicæa, by Lysimachus, who gave it the name of his wife, who was daughter of Antipater. [It was situate at the eastern extremity of the lake Ascanius. According to Stephanus Byzantinus, this city was originally termed Ancora, and inhabited by the Bottiaei. Nicæa was built in the form of a square, and was remarkable for the great regularity with which it was erected; and Strabo states, that from a stone in the centre of the Gymnasium, the four gates of the city could be seen. At this city was held the famous council in the year 325 A. D. At this council the Nicene creed, as far as the words "Holy Ghost," was drawn up and agreed to, the rest of this creed was added at the council of Constantinople, A. D. 531, except the words "and the son," which follow the words "who proceedeth from the father," and these were inserted, A. D. 417. The council of Nice was summoned by Constantine to settle the differences and controversies in the church. The bishops who met in council were, according to Eusebius, more than 250, besides presbyters and deacons, acolythists and others, whose number could not easily be counted. Theodoret makes the number of bishops 318, and this number is more generally allowed than the other. How long this council sat is not absolutely certain. Some have given it a permanence of two or three years, but most learned moderns are of opinion that it sat somewhat above two months, beginning the 19th of June and ending the 25th of August. The three points debated were, the Arian controversy, the time of keeping Easter, and the affair of Meletius in Egypt.]—A town of Liguria, built by the people of Massilia, in commemoration of a victory. [It was situate about a league from the mouth of the Varus or Var. From Strabo we learn that long before his time, this city had a number of vessels and an arsenal, together with many warlike machines, of all which the Romans availed themselves in reducing Gallia Provincia or Narbonensis.]

NICACŒRAS, a sophist of Athens in the reign of the emperor Philip. He wrote the lives of illustrious men, and was reckoned one of the greatest and most learned men of his age.

NICANDER, a king of Sparta, son of Charillus of the family of the Proclidæ. He reigned 39 years, and died B. C. 770.—A writer of Chæcedon.—A Greek grammarian, poet, and physician, of Colophon, 137 B. C. [There is a considerable variety of opinion respecting his birth-place and the era in which he flourished. Suidas informs us that he was a native of Colophon, although he admits that other writers consider him as a native of Ætolia; we have, however, the testimony of Nicander himself, that his birth-place was Claros, a little town in Ionia, near Colophon. He is commonly supposed to have flourished about 140 B. C. in the reign of Attalus I. king of Pergamus, whilst others are of opinion that he was in the zenith of his reputation in the reign of the last king of that name.] His writings were held in estimation, but his judgment cannot be highly commended, since, without any knowledge of agriculture, he ventured to compose a book on that intricate subject. Two of his poems, entitled Theriaca, on hunting, and Alexipharmaca, on antidotes against poison, are still extant. [Among the works which are lost, were a piece entitled Ophiaca, which related to serpents, and Hyacinthia, which was a collection of remedies. He is said also to have written five books of Metamorphoses, which were the prototypes of those of Ovid, and were closely copied by Antonius Liberalis. He wrote also several historical pieces. A great number of editions of the Theriaca, and Alexipharmaca, have been published at different times and places.] The best are those of Gorræus, with a translation in Latin verse by Grevinus, a physician at Paris, 4to. Paris, 1557, and Salvinus, 8vo. Florent. 1764. [The best edition now is that of Schneider, Halle. 1792, in 8vo.] Cic. 1, de Orat. c. 16.

NICATOR, a surname of Seleucus, king of Syria, from his having been unconquered.

NICEPHORIUM, a town of Mesopotamia, where Venus had a temple. [It was situate at the confluence of the Billicha and the Euphrates, south of Charræ. Alexander is said to have selected the site, which was a very advantageous one. Seleucus Callinicus, having fortified the place, or some spot adjacent, gave it the name of Callinicum, which in the fifth century the emperor Leo caused to be changed to Leontopolis. It is in the oriental geography the position of a considerable place named Racca, and was distinguished into three several quarters, in the principal of which the Caliph Haroun Al-Rashid erected a castle which became his favourite residence.] Liv. 32, c. 33.—Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 41.

NICEPHORIUS, [a river of Armenia Major, supposed to be the same with the Centritis. vid. Centritis.] Tacit. Ann. 15, c. 4.

NICEPHORUS [Basilica, a teacher of rhetoric in Constantinople, in the second half of the eleventh century. He has left some Fables, Narratives, and Ethopees, which are contained in the collection of Leo Allatius.—Blemmida, a monk of the 13th century. He has left three works; a Geographical Abridgement, which is nothing but an analysis, in prose, of the Periegesis of Dionysius; a work entitled, "The second History of the Earth;" and a third, "On the heavens earth, Sun, &c." The two first were published by Spohn, at Leipzig, 1818, in 4to.: the third is unedited. It is mentioned by Bredow in his Epistolæ Parisienses.—Another, a monk of the same century, who wrote on various points of controversy between the Greek and Latin Churches.—Chumnon, an officer at the court of Andronicus 2d. He wrote a number of works which are still unedited.]—Cæsar, a Byzantine historian, whose works were edited, fol. Paris, 1661.—Gregorius, another, edited, fol. Paris, 1702.—A Greek ecclesiastical historian, whose works were edited by Ducæus, 2 vols. Paris, 1630.

NICER, now the Necker, a river of Germany, falling into the Rhine at the modern town of Manheim. Auson. Mos. 423.

NICETAS, one of the Byzantine historians, whose works were edited fol. Paris, 1647. [He wrote the Byzantine History from the death of Comnenus, where Zonaras ceases, to the year 1203, being 85 years. His work is divided into 21 books. This history is valuable on account of the truth of the facts. Nicetas has been surnamed Choniates, because born at Chone in Phrygia. He filled at one period of his life a dignified station at the court of Constantinople.]

NICETERIA, a festival at Athens, in memory of the victory which Minerva obtained over Neptune, in their dispute about giving a name to the capital of the country.

NICIA, a city. [vid. Nicæa.]—A river falling into the Po at Brixellum. It is now called Lenza, and separates the duchy of Modena from Parma.

NICIAS, an Athenian general, celebrated for his valour and for his misfortunes. He early conciliated the good-will of the people by his liberality, and he established his military character by taking the island of Cythera from the power of Lacedæmon. When Athens determined to make war against Sicily, Nicias was appointed, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to conduct the expedition, which he reprobated as impolitic, and as the future cause of calamities to the Athenian power. In Sicily he behaved with great firmness, but he often blamed the quick and inconsiderate measures of his colleagues. The success of the Athenians remained long doubtful. Alcibiades was recalled by his enemies to take his trial, and Nicias was left at the head of affairs. Syracuse was surrounded by a wall, and, though the operations were carried on slowly, yet the city would have surrendered, had not the sudden appearance of Gylippus, the Corinthian ally of the Sicilians, cheered up the courage of the besieged at the critical moment. Gylippus proposed terms of accommodation to the Athenians which were refused; some battles were fought, in which the Sicilians obtained the advantage, and Nicias at last, tired of his ill success, and grown desponding, demanded of the Athenians a reinforcement or a successor. Demosthenes, upon this, was sent with a powerful fleet, but the advice of Nicias was despised, and the admiral, by his eagerness to come to a decisive engagement, ruined his fleet and the interest of Athens. The fear of his enemies at home prevented Nicias from leaving Sicily; and when, at last, a continued series of ill success obliged him to comply, he found himself surrounded on every side by the enemy, without hope of escaping. He gave himself up to the conquerors with all his army, but the assurances of safety which he had received soon proved vain and false, and he was no sooner in the hands of the enemy than he was shamefully put to death with Demosthenes. His troops were sent to quarries, where the plague and hard labour diminished their numbers and aggravated their misfortunes. Some suppose that the death of Nicias was not violent. He perished about 413 years before Christ, and the Athenians lamented in him a great and valiant but unfortunate general. Plut. in vitâ.—C. Nep. in Alcib.—Thucyd. 4, &c.—Diod. 15.—A grammarian of Rome, intimate with Cicero. Cic. in epist.—A man of Nicæa, who wrote an history of philosophers.—A physician of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who made an offer to the Romans of poisoning his master for a sum of money. The Roman general disdained his offers, and acquainted Pyrrhus with his treachery. He is oftener called Cineas.—A painter of Athens, in the age of Alexander. He was chiefly happy in his pictures of women. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 31.

NICIPPUS, a tyrant of Cos, one of whose sheep brought forth a lion, which was considered as portending his future greatness, and his elevation to the sovereignty. Ælian. V. H. 1, c. 29.

NICO, a celebrated architect and geometrician. He was father to the celebrated Galen, the prince of physicians.—The name of an ass which Augustus met before the battle of Actium, a circumstance which he considered as a favourable omen.—The name of an elephant remarkable for his fidelity to king Pyrrhus.

NICOGHARES, a Greek comic poet in the age of Aristophanes.

NICOLES, a king of Salamis, celebrated for his contest with a king of Phœnicia, to prove which of the two was most effeminate.—A king of Paphos who reigned under the protection of Ptolemy, king of Egypt. He revolted from his friend to the king of Persia, upon which Ptolemy ordered one of his servants to put him to death, to strike terror into the other dependent princes. The servant, unwilling to murder the monarch, advised him to kill himself. Nicoles obeyed, and all his family followed his example, 310 years before the Christian era.—An ancient Greek poet, who called physicians a happy race of men because light published their good deeds to the world, and the earth hid all their faults and imperfections.—A king of Cyprus, who succeeded his father Evagoras on the throne, 374 years before Christ. It was with him that the philosopher Isocrates corresponded.—A tyrant of Sicily, deposed by means of Aratus the Achæan. Plut. in Arat.

NICOCRATES, a king of Salamis in Cyprus, who made himself known by the valuable collection of books which he had, Athen. 1.

NICOCREON, a tyrant of Salamis in the age of Alexander the Great. He ordered the philosopher Anaxarchus to be pounded to pieces in a mortar.

NICODĒMUS, an Athenian appointed by Conon over the fleet which was going to the assistance of Artaxerxes. Diod. 14.

NICODORUS, a wrestler of Mantinea, who studied philosophy in his old age. Ælian. V. H. 2, c. 22.—Suidas.

NICOLĀUS, a celebrated Syracusan, who endeavoured, in a pathetic speech, to dissuade his countrymen from offering violence to the Athenian prisoners who had been taken with Nicias their general. His eloquence was unavailing.—A peripatetic philosopher and historian in the Augustan age. [He was born at Damascus, and hence was surnamed Damascenus. Augustus held him in great esteem. He belonged to the Peripatetic sect, and was distinguished for learning. Many of his writings are referred to by Suidas and others, of which only some fragments have reached our times. A history of Assyria, composed by him, is quoted, which is said to have been part of the Universal History, in many books, referred to by Josephus, Suidas, and Athenæus. Strabo quotes from him certain matters relating to India. Henry de Valois published at Paris, in 1634, in Greek and Latin, the collection from different works of this author made by Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and brought from Cyprus by Peiresc.]

NICOMĀCHUS, the father of Aristotle, whose son also bore the same name. The philosopher composed sixteen books of morals for the use and improvement of his son, and thence they are called Nicomachea. Suidas.—A Pythagorean philosopher.—A Lacedæmonian general, conquered by Timotheus.

NICOMĒDES 1st, a king of Bithynia, about 273 years before the Christian era. It was by his exertions that this part of Asia became a monarchy. He behaved with great cruelty to his brothers, and built a town which he called by his own name, Nicomedia. Justin.—Paus. &c.—The 2d, was ironically surnamed Philopater, because he drove his father Prusias from the kingdom of Bithynia, and caused him to be assassinated, B. C. 149. He reigned 59 years. Mithridates laid claim to his kingdom, but all their disputes were decided by the Romans, who deprived Nicomedes of the province of Paphlagonia, and his ambitious rival of Cappadocia. He gained the affections of his subjects by a courteous behaviour, and by a mild and peaceful government. Justin.—The 3d, son and successor of the preceding, was dethroned by his brother Socrates, and afterwards by the ambitious Mithridates. The Romans re-established him on his throne, and encouraged him to make reprisals upon the king of Pontus. He followed their advice, and he was at last expelled another time from his dominions, till Sylla came into Asia, who restored him to his former power and affluence. Strab.—Appian.—The fourth of that name was son and successor of Nicomedes 3d. He passed his life in an easy and tranquil manner, and enjoyed the peace which his alliance with the Romans had procured him. He died B. C. 75, without issue, and left his kingdom, with all his possessions, to the Roman people. Strab. 12.—Appian. Mithrid.—Justin. 33, c. 2, &c.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—A celebrated geometrician in the age of the philosopher Eratosthenes. [He is famous for being the inventor of the curve called the conchoid, which has been made to serve equally for the resolution of the two problems relating to the duplication of the cube, and the trisection of an angle. It was much used by the ancients in the construction of solid problems. It is not certain at what period Nicomedes flourished, but it was probably at no great distance from the time of Eratosthenes.]

NICOMEDIA, (now Is-nikmid.) a town of Bithynia, [on the Sinus Astacenus.] founded by Nicomedes 1st. It was the capital of the country, and it has been compared, for its beauty and greatness, to Rome, Antioch, or Alexandria. It became celebrated for being, for some time, the residence of the emperor Constantine, and most of his imperial successors. Some suppose that it was originally called Astacus, and Olbia, though it was generally believed that they were all different cities. [The modern city is said to be a place of considerable commerce.] Ammian. 17.—Paus. 5, c. 12.—Plin. 5, &c.—Strab. 12, &c.

NICON, an athlete of Thasos, 14 times victorious at the Olympic games.—A native of Tarentum. [vid. Nico.]

NICOPHĀNES, a famous painter of Greece, whose pieces are mentioned with commendation. Plin. 35, c. 10.

NICOPHRON, a comic poet of Athens some time after the age of Aristophanes.

NICOPOLIS, a town of Armenia Minor, built by Pompey the Great in memory of a victory which he had there obtained over the forces of Mithridates. [It is now Divraki. Another name for the ancient city was Tephrike.] Strab. 12.—Another, in Thrace, built on the banks of the Nestus by Trajan, in memory of a victory which he obtained there over the barbarians.—A town of Epirus, built by Augustus after the battle of Actium. [It was situate on the northern coast of the Sinus Ambracius, on the site of Augustus's camp, and is now Prevesa-Veccchia.]—Another, near Jerusalem, founded by the emperor Vespasian.—Another, in Mæsia.—Another, in Dacia, built by Trajan, to perpetuate the memory of a celebrated battle.—Another, near the bay of Issus, built by Alexander.

NICOSTRATUS, a man of Argos of great strength. He was fond of imitating Hercules by clothing himself in a lion's skin. Diod. 16.

NIGER, a friend of M. Antony, sent to him by Octavia.—A surname of Clitus, whom Alexander killed in a fit of drunkenness.—C. Pescennius Justus, a celebrated governor in Syria, well known by his valour in the Roman armies while yet a private man. At the death of Pertinax he was declared emperor of Rome, and his claims to that elevated situation were supported by a sound understanding, prudence of mind, moderation, courage, and virtue. He proposed to imitate the actions of the venerable Antoninus, of Trajan, of Titus, and M. Aurelius. He was remarkable for his fondness for ancient discipline, and never suffered his soldiers to drink wine, but obliged them to quench their thirst with water and vinegar. He forbade the use of silver or gold utensils in his camp, all the bakers and cooks were driven away, and the soldiers ordered to live, during the expedition they undertook, merely upon biscuits. In his punishments, Niger was inexorable; he condemned ten of his soldiers to be beheaded in the presence of the army, because they had stolen and eaten a fowl. The sentence was heard with groans; the army interferred: and, when Niger consented to diminish the punishment for fear of rekindling rebellion, he yet ordered the criminals to make each a restoration of ten fowls to the person whose property they had stolen; they were, besides, ordered not to light a fire the rest of the campaign, but to live upon cold aliments, and to drink nothing but water. Such great qualifications in a general seemed to promise the restoration of ancient discipline in the Roman armies, but the death of Niger frustrated every hope of reform. Severus, who had also been invested with the imperial purple, marched against him; some battles were fought, and Niger was at last defeated, A. D. 194. His head was cut off, and fixed to a long spear, and carried in triumph through the streets of Rome. He reigned about one year. Herodian. 3.—Eutrop.

NIGER, or NIGRIS, (itis), a river of Africa, which rises in Æthiopia, and falls by three mouths into the Atlantic, little known to the ancients, and not yet satisfactorily explored by the moderns. [The Niger, called also the

Joliba, and by the Moors the Nile el Abeede, or Nile of the negroes, rises in the mountains of Kong, and flowing in a north-easterly direction, passes through lake Dibble, beyond which the river has never been traced by a European. The various and contradictory rumours relative to its course and termination have excited an extraordinary degree of interest in Europe, and many expeditions have been recently fitted out for the sole purpose of determining this question. After the discoveries of Park, who traced the river through the early parts of its course, the opinion which became generally established, was that of Major Rennell, coinciding in some measure with the previous one of D'Anville, by which the Niger, after issuing from lake Dibble, was supposed to flow eastwards through the country of Houssa, and finally to lose itself in the lakes and marshes of Wangara. A very different hypothesis has been started by travellers into Northern Africa. Jackson and Hornemann both state the universal conviction there to be, that the Niger flows eastward and joins the Nile, being in fact the Nile itself. The Moors express their astonishment when they hear Europeans doubting the identity of the two streams. "As it seems proved," observes Malte-Brun, "that travellers have passed by water from Tombuctoo to Cairo, the Niger must fall into the Nile, and be really the Nile itself; or there must be intermediate rivers, forming between the Nile and Niger a communication resembling that which was found by Humboldt between the Orinoco and the Amazons." A recent hypothesis, the fame of which has nearly absorbed every other, is that by which the Niger is supposed, after a long course to the south, to discharge itself into the Atlantic through the Congo or Zaire, which empties in lat. 6° S. This opinion is founded on the vast quantity of water which that river pours into the ocean, and on the fact that a great rise takes place at a period when no rains have fallen on the south side of the line. These arguments had so much weight with the British government, that they determined, in 1816, to fit out an expedition on a great scale, to settle this grand question in modern geography. It was divided into two parts, one of which, of a military character, was commanded by major Peddie, and was destined to penetrate across the country to the Niger, and to descend its stream; the other, of a naval description, under captain Tuckey, was to ascend the Congo in boats. The hopes which were raised of the success of this expedition have been sadly disappointed. The party of captain Tuckey, overcome by fatigue and the heat of the climate, were seized with a pestilential disorder, which proved fatal to most of them. All the leaders of that of major Peddie fell also a sacrifice to the climate before they had even approached the Niger. It seems unnecessary in a work like the present to detail the more recent discoveries of Laing, Clapperton, and Denham. The student will find them all carefully noted on the map of the world published by Finley, Philadelphia, 1827.] Plin. 5, c. 1 and 8.—Mela, 1, c. 4, 1. 3, c. 10.—Ptol. 4, c. 6.

P. NIGIDIUS FIGULUS, a celebrated philosopher and astrologer at Rome, one of the most learned men of his age. He was intimate with Cicero, and gave his most unbiassed opinions concerning the conspirators who had leagued to destroy Rome with Catiline. He was made prætor, and honoured with a seat in the senate. In the civil wars he followed the interest of Pompey, for which he was banished by the conqueror. He died in the place of his banishment, 47 years before Christ. Cic. ad Fam. 4, ep. 13.—Lucan. 1, v. 639.

NIGRITE, a people of Africa, who dwell on the banks of the Niger, [in what is now Negroland.] Mela, 1, c. 4.—Plin. 5, c. 1.

NILEUS, a son of Codrus, who conducted a colony of Ionians to Asia, where he built Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedos, Clazomenæ, &c. Paus. 7, c. 2, &c.—A philosopher who had in his possession all the writings of Aristotle. Athen. 1.

NILUS, [a famous river of Egypt, rising, as is generally supposed, in a chain of mountains called Gebel-el-Kumr, or "the mountains of the moon," under the name of Bahr-el-Abiad, or "the white river," and which, after running for some distance in an easterly direction along the foot of the mountains, turns to the north, and in N. lat. 16° receives two principal tributaries, the Astapus or Abawi, mistaken by Bruce for the Nile itself, and the As-taboras or Tacazze. [vid. Niger, towards the end of the article.] After this it pursues a circuitous course through Nubia, and on the frontiers of Egypt forms two cataracts, the lowest of which is near Syene. Below Syene, it continues its course in a northerly direction for 500 miles till, a little below Cairo, the river divides into two branches; the one of which flowing to Rosetta, and the other to Damietta, contain between them the present Delta. But this triangular piece of insulated land was, in former times, larger, being bounded on the east by the Pelusiæ branch, which is now choked up with sands or converted into marshy pools. On the west it was bounded by the Canopic branch, which is now partly confounded with the canal of Alexandria, and partly lost in lake Etka. The ancients were acquainted with, and mention, seven mouths of the Nile, with respect to the changes in which, the following are the most established results. 1. The Canopic mouth, already mentioned. 2. The Bolbitine mouth at Rosetta. 3. The Sebenitic mouth, probably the opening into the present lake Burlos. 4. The Phatnitic or Bucolic at Damietta. 5. The Mendesian, which is lost in the lake Menzaleh, the mouth of which is represented by that of Dibeh. 6. The Tanitic, or Saitic, which seems to leave some traces of its termination to the east of lake Menzaleh, under the modern name of Omm-Faredje. The branch of the Nile which conveyed its waters to the sea corresponds to the canal of Moez, which now loses itself in the lake. 7. The Pelusiæ mouth seems to be represented by what is now the most easterly mouth of lake Menzaleh, where the ruins of of Pelusium are still visible. The periodical rains, which begin to fall in Abysinia about the end of June, occasion the overflowing of this celebrated river, and it continues to rise until the autumnal equinox, when it attains its greatest height. It then continues stationary for a few days, and after this diminishes at a less rapid rate than it rose. At the winter solstice it is very low, but some water still remains in the large canals. At this period the lands are put under culture. The soil is covered with a fresh layer of slime of greater or less thickness. Its waters, during the inundation, are of a dirty red colour, and, even in April and May, when they are least turbid, they are never quite clear, but have always a cloudy hue. The term inundation, strictly speaking, is correct only when applied to the Delta, as the river is confined in Upper Egypt between high banks, so as to prevent an overflow. The adjacent country is watered entirely by canals cut in various directions, and opened at certain periods for the purposes of irrigation. At the head of the Delta the water rises 25 feet, in some years probably more, and gradually decreases to Rosetta and Damietta, at which its height does not exceed four feet, some think less. The mud or slime left by this river is regarded as a sufficiently enriching substance for the land without any other kind of manure. The Etesian winds prevail with great violence, and for a considerable length of time annually, at the period of the Nile's inundation. A vessel leaving Rosetta is driven by this monsoon with extraordinary velocity, against the whole force of the torrent to Cairo, or any part of Upper Egypt. For the purpose of her return, with even greater rapidity, it is only necessary to take down mast and sails, and leave her to be carried against the wind by the powerful current of the river. It is thus possible to perform the whole voyage from Rosetta to Bulac, the quay of Cairo, and back again, with certainty, in about 70 hours, a distance equal to 400 miles. There are said to be eight cataracts in the course of the Nile, from its source to the last fall, which is not far above Syene or Essonan, where the river is about half a mile broad. This last cataract is not in height above four feet, and Pococke maintains that it does not exceed three feet. Crocodiles, of which the largest are about twenty-five feet long, are seen a little below Diospolis Parva, and are supposed not to go further down the river than Girgeh, but abound between that place and Syene. The common Egyptian mode of clarifying the water of the Nile, is by means of pounded almonds. It holds a number of substances in a state of imperfect solution, which are in this way precipitated. Its water is then one of the purest known, remarkable for its being easily digested by the stomach, for its salutary qualities, and for all the purposes to which it is applied. It bears the same rank among waters that Champagne does among wines, and the Egyptians say that if Mahomet had tasted it, he would have supplicated heaven for a terrestrial immortality, to be enabled to enjoy it to eternity. The Nile is said by Herodotus to have flowed, previous to the time of Menes, on the side of Lybia. This prince, by constructing a mound at the distance of 100 stadia from Memphis towards the south, diverted its course. The ancient course is not unknown at present, and may be traced across the desert, passing west of the lakes of Natroun. With regard to the name of this celebrated river, Poccocke makes it to be a contraction of Nahal, that is, "The River," by way of eminence. Abdollatif derives it from Nal, to give, or to be liberal. [*Cic. Leg. 2, c. 1, ad Q. fr. 3, ep. 9, ad Att. 11, ep. 12.—Strab. 17.—Ovid. NINUS, a son of Belus, who built a city to which he gave his own name, and founded the Assyrian monarchy of which he was the first sovereign, B. C. 2059. He was very warlike, and extended his conquests from Egypt to the extremities of India and Bactriana. He became enamoured of Semiramis the wife of one of his officers, and he married her after her husband had destroyed himself through fear of his powerful rival. Ninus reigned 62 years, and at his death he left his kingdom to the care of his wife Semiramis, by whom he had a son. The history of Ninus is very obscure and even fabulous, according to the opinion of some. Ctesias is the principal historian from whom it is derived, but little reliance is to be placed upon him, when Aristotle deems him unworthy to be believed. Ninus after death received divine honours, and became the Jupiter of the Assyrians and the Hercules of the Chaldeans. Ctesias.—Diod. 2.—Justin. 1, c. 1.—Herodot. 2.—A celebrated city, the capital of Assyria, built on the banks of the Tigris by Ninus, and called Ninveh in Scripture. [The village of Nunia, on the banks of the Tigris, opposite to Mosul, is ascertained to be the site of the ancient Ninveh. Here are found a rampart and fosse, 4 miles in circumference; but Mr. Kinnear believes these to have belonged to a city founded subsequently to the time of Adrian, so that Ninveh has left no trace now in existence.] It was, according to the relation of Diodorus Siculus, fifteen miles long, nine broad, and forty-eight in circumference. It was surrounded by large walls 400 feet high, on the top of which three chariots could pass together abreast, and was defended by 1500 towers, each 200 feet high. Ninus was taken by the united armies of Cyaxares and Nabopolassar king of Babylon, B. C. 606. Strab. 1, NINŪAS, a son of Ninus and Semiramis, king of Assyria, who succeeded his mother who had voluntarily abdicated the crown. Some suppose that Semiramis was put to death by her own son, because she had encouraged him to commit incest. The reign of Niuyas is remarkable for its luxury and extravagance. The prince left the care of the government to his favourites and ministers, and gave himself up to pleasure, riot, and debauchery, and never appeared in public. His successors imitated the example of his voluptuousness, and therefore their name or history are little known till the age of Sardanapalus. Justin. 1, c. 2.—Diod. 1, &c.

NIÖBE, a daughter of Tantalus, king of Lydia, by Euryanassa or Dione. She married Amphion the son of Jasus, by whom she had ten sons and ten daughters according to Hesiod, or two sons and three daughters according to Herodotus. Homer and Propertius say, that she had six daughters; and as many sons; and Ovid, Apollodorus, &c. according to the more received opinion, support that she had seven sons and seven daughters. The sons were Sipylus, Minytus, Tantalus, Agenor, Phædimus, Damasichthon, and Imenus; and those of the daughters, Cleodoxa, Ethodæa or Thera, Astyoche, Phthia, Pelopia or Chloris, Asticratea, and Ogygia. The number of her children increased her pride, and she had the imprudence not only to prefer herself to Latona, who had only two children, but she even insulted her, and ridiculed the worship which was paid to her, observing, that she had a better claim to altars and sacrifices than the mother of Apollo and Diana. This insolence provoked Latona. She entreated her children to punish the arrogant Niobe. Her prayers were heard, and immediately all the sons of Niobe expired by the darts of Apollo, and all the daughters, except Chloris, who had married Neleus, king of Pylos, were equally destroyed by Diana; and Niobe, struck at the suddenness of her misfortunes, was changed into a stone. The carcasses of Niobe's children, according to Homer, were left unburied in the plains for nine successive days, because Jupiter changed into stones all such as attempted to inter them. On the tenth day they were honoured with a funeral by the gods. *Homer. Il. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 12, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Ovid. She was beloved by Jupiter, by whom she had a son called Argus, who gave his name to Argia or Argolis, a country of Peloponnesus. Paus. 2, c. 22.—Apollod. 2, c. 1, l. 3, c. 8.

NIPHÂTES, [now Ararat,] a mountain of Asia which divides Armenia from Assyria, and from which the Tigris takes its rise. Virg. G. 3, v. 30.—Strab. 11.—Mela, 1, c. 15.—A river of Armenia falling into the Tigris. Horat. 2, od. 9, v. 20.—Lucan. 3, v. 245.

NIREUS, a king of Naxos, son of Charops and Aglaia, celebrated for his beauty. He was one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war. Homer. Il. 2.—Horat. 2, od. 20.

NISA, a town of Greece. Homer. Il. 2.—A celebrated plain of Media near the Caspian Sea, famous for its horses. Herodot. 3, c. 106.

NISÆA, a naval station on the coasts of Megaris. Strab. 8.

NISIBIS, [a large and populous city of Mesopotamia, about two days' journey from the Tigris, in the midst of a pleasant and fertile plain at the foot of Mons Masius, and on the river Mygdonia. In the year of Rome 684 it was subject to Tigranes, king of Armenia, from whom it was taken by Lucullus. It was afterwards again taken by Trajan, and after a revolt, re-taken by his troops. Since the time of Lucullus, it had been deservedly esteemed the bulwark of the east. It sustained three memorable sieges against Sapor king of Persia, and the disappointed monarch was thrice repulsed with loss and ignominy. But in the year 363 of the Christian era, after the death of Julian, and under the irrelative Jovian, it was ceded to Sapor by treaty. It is now called Nisibi, and is reduced to 150 houses.] Joseph. 20, c. 2.—Strab. 11.—Ammian. 25, &c.—Plin. 6, c. 13.

NISUS, a son of Hyrtacus, born on Mount Ida near Troy. He came to Italy with Æneas, and signalized himself by his valour against the Rutulians. He was united in the closest friendship with Euryalus a young Trojan, and with him he entered, in the dead of night, the enemy's camp. As they were returning victorious, after much bloodshed, they were perceived by the Rutulians, who attacked Euryalus. Nisus, in endeavouring to rescue his friend from the enemy's darts, perished himself with him, and their heads were cut off and fixed on a spear, and carried in triumph to the camp. Their death was greatly lamented by all the Trojans, and their great friendship, like that of a Pylades and an Orestes, or of a Theseus and Pirithous, is become proverbial. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 176, &c.—A king of Dulichium, remarkable for his probity and virtue. Homer. od. 18.—A king of Megara, son of Mars, or more probably of Pandion. He inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers, and received as his portion the country of Megaris. The peace of the brothers was interrupted by the hostilities of Minos, who wished to avenge the death of his son Androgeus, who had been murdered by the Athenians. Megara was besieged, and Attica laid waste. The fate of Nisus depended totally upon a yellow lock, which, as long as it continued upon his head, according to the words of an oracle, promised him life and success to his affairs. His daughter Scylla (often called Nisèia Virgo) saw from the walls of Megara the royal besieger, and she became desperately enamoured of him. To obtain a more immediate interview with this object of her passions, she stole away the fatal hair from her father's head as he was asleep; the town was immediately taken, but Minos disregarded the services of Scylla, and she threw herself into the sea. The gods changed her into a lark, and Nisus assumed the nature of the hawk at the very moment that he gave himself death not to fall into the enemy's hands. These two birds have continually been at variance with each other, and Scylla, by her apprehensions at the sight of her father, seems to suffer the punishment which her perfidy deserved. Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 19.—Strab. 9.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 6, &c.—Virg. G. 1, v. 404, &c.

NISYROS, an island in the Ægean Sea, at the west of Rhodes, with a town of the same name. It was originally joined to the island of Cos, according to Pliny, and it bore the name of Porphyris. Neptune, who was supposed to have separated them with a blow of his trident, and to have then overwhelmed the giant Polybotes, was worshipped there, and called Nisyreus. [It is now Nisiro, and presents the appearance of a high rocky island. From it are procured a large number of good mill-stones. The distance between it and Cos is 80 stadia.] Apollod. 1, c. 6.—Mela. 2, c. 7.—Strab. 10.

NITETIS, a daughter of Apries, king of Egypt, married by his successor Amasis to Cambyses. [Herodotus states, that Cambyses was instigated to ask in marriage the daughter of Amasis, by a certain physician, whom Amasis had compelled to go to Persia, when Cyrus, the father of Cambyses, was suffering from weak eyes and requested Amasis to send him a skilful physician. The physician did this, either that Amasis might experience affliction at the loss of his daughter, or provoke Cambyses by a refusal. Amasis, however, did not send his own daughter, but Nitetis, who discovered the deception to Cambyses, which so exasperated that monarch, that he determined to make war on Amasis. Prideaux denies the truth of this account, on the ground that Apries having been dead above 40 years, no daughter of his could have been young enough to be acceptable to Cambyses. Larcher, however, endeavours to reconcile the apparent improbability, by saying that there is great reason to suppose that Apries lived a prisoner many years after Amasis had dethroned him, and that, therefore, Nitetis might have been no more than 20 or 22 years of age when she was sent to Cambyses.] Polyan. 3.

NITIOBRIGES, a people of Gaul, supposed to be Agenois in Guienne. Cæs. B. G. 7, c. 7.

NITOCRIS, [a celebrated queen of Babylon, who, to defend that city the more, and render the approach to it by the Euphrates as difficult and tedious as possible, sunk a number of canals, which rendered the river so complicated by numerous windings, that, according to Herodotus, it arrived three times at Ardericca, an Assyrian village. She also raised to a very great height the banks of the river, to restrain its inundations, and dug an immense lake, some distance above Babylon.

which might also serve as a defence.] She ordered herself to be buried over one of the gates of the city, and placed an inscription on her tomb, which signified that her successors would find great treasures within, if ever they were in need of money, but that their labours would be but ill repaid if ever they ventured to open it without necessity. Cyrus opened it through curiosity, and was struck to find within these words: If thy avarice had not been insatiable thou never wouldst have violated the monuments of the dead. Herodot. 1, c. 185.—A queen of Egypt, who built a third pyramid.

NITRIA, [a city of Egypt, to the west of the Canopic branch of the Nile, in the desert near the lakes which afforded nitre. Ptolemy calls the country Scithiaca.]

NIVARIA, an island at the west of Africa, supposed to be Teneriffe, one of the Canaries. [The name Nivaria is derived from the snows which cover the summit of Teneriffe.] Plin. 6, c. 32.

NOCTILŪCA, a surname of Diana. She had a temple at Rome, on Mount Palatine, where torches were generally lighted in the night. Varro de L. L. 4.—Horat. 4, od. 6, v. 36.

NOLA, an ancient town of Campania, which became a Roman colony before the first Punic war. It was founded by a Tuscan, or, according to others, by an Eubœan colony. It is said that Virgil had introduced the name of Nola in his Georgics, but that, when he was refused a glass of water by the inhabitants as he passed through the city, he totally blotted it out of his poem, and substituted the word ora, in the 225th line of the 2d book of his Georgics. Nola was besieged by Annibal, and bravely defended by Marcellus. Augustus died there on his return from Neapolis to Rome. Bells were first invented there in the beginning of the 5th century, from which reason they have been called Nolæ or Campana, in Latin. The inventor was St. Paulinus, the bishop of the place, who died A. D. 431, though many imagine that bells were known long before, and only introduced into churches by that prelate. Before this time congregations were called to the church by the noise of wooden rattles (sacra ligna.) Paterc. 1, c. 7.—Suet. in Aug.—Sil. 8, v. 517, l. 12, v. 161.—A. Gellius, 7, c. 20.—Liv. 23, c. 14 and 39, l. 24, c. 13.

NOMĀDES, a name given [by the Greeks] to all those uncivilized people who had no fixed habitation, and who continually changed the place of their residence to go in quest of fresh pasture for the numerous cattle which they tended. [The name is derived from νομήν, pasture.] There were Nomades in Scythia, India, Arabia, and Africa. Those of Africa were afterwards called Numidians, by a small change of the letters which composed their name. Ital. 1, v. 215.—Plin. 5, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, c. 15, l. 4, c. 187.—Strab. 7.—Mela, 2, c. 1, l. 3, c. 4.—Virg. G. 3, v. 343.—Paus. 8, c. 43.

NOMENTĀNUS, an epithet applied to L. Cassius as a native of Nomentum. He is mentioned by Horace as a mixture of luxury and dissipation. Horat. 1, Sat. 1, v. 102 and alibi.

NOMENTUM, a town of the Sabines in Italy, famous for wine, and now called Lamentana. The dictator Q. Servilius Priscus gave the Veientes and Fidenates battle there, A. U. C. 312, and totally defeated them. Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 905.—Liv. 1, c. 38, l. 4, c. 22.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 773.

NOMIS, a surname given to Apollo, because he fed (νομίς, pasco) the flocks of king Admetus in Thessaly. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 32.

NONĀCRIS, a town of Arcadia, which received its name from a wife of Lycaon. There was a mountain of the same name in the neighbourhood. Evander is sometimes called Nonacrius heros, as being an Arcadian by birth, and Atalanta Nonacria, as being a native of the place. Curt. 10, c. 10.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 97. Met. 8, fab. 10.—Paus. 8, c. 17, &c.

NONNIUS MARCELLUS, a grammarian, whose treatise de varia significatione verborum was edited by Mercer, 8vo. Paris, 1614.

NONNUS, [a Greek poet, and a native of Panopolis in Egypt, who flourished in the 5th century. He is the author of two works on very different subjects, but generally admitted to be from the same pen. The first, entitled, Dionysiaca, a poem of 48 books, containing a history of Bacchus, and comprehending a vast miscellany of heathen mythology and erudition. The second is a metrical paraphrase of the Gospel of St. John. This is valuable as affording some important various readings. The best edition of the Dionysiaca is that printed at Antwerp, 1569, in 4to. His paraphrase was edited by Heinsius, L. Bat. 1627, in 8vo.]

NONUS, a Greek physician, whose book de omnium morborum curatione was edited in 12mo. Argent. 1568.

NORBA Casarea, a town of Spain on the Tagus, [now Alcantara.]

C. NORBĀNUS, a young and ambitious Roman who opposed Sylla, and joined his interest to that of young Marius. In his consulship he marched against Sylla, by whom he was defeated, &c. Plut.—A friend and general of Augustus employed in Macedonia against the republicans. He was defeated by Brutus, &c.

NORICUM, a country of ancient Illyricum. [It extended along the southern shore of the Danube, from the mouth of the Ænus or Inn to Mons Cetius, and comprehended the modern duchies of Carinthia and Stiria.] Its savage inhabitants, who were once governed by kings, made many incursions upon the Romans, and were at last conquered under Tiberius, and the country became a dependent province. In the reign of Dioclesian, Noricum was divided into two parts, Ripense, [adjacent to the Danube,] and Mediterraneum, [in the bosom of the Alps.] The iron that was drawn from Noricum was esteemed excellent, and thence Noricus ensis was used to express the goodness of a sword. 5.—Horat. 1, od. 16, v. 9.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 712.

NORTIA, a name given to the goddess of Fortune among the Etrurians. Liv. 7, c. 3.

NOTHUS, a son of Deucalion.—A surname of Darius king of Persia, from his illegitimacy.

NOTIUM, a town of Æolia near the Cayster. It was peopled by the inhabitants of Colophon, who left their ancient habitations because Notium was more conveniently situated in being on the sea-shore. Liv. 37, c. 26, 38, 39.

NOVÆ (tabernæ), the newshops built in the forum at Rome, and adorned with the shields of the Cimbri. Cic. Orat. 2, c. 66.—The Veteres tabernæ were adorned with those of the Samnites. Liv. 9, c. 40.

NOVARIA, a town of Cisalpine Gaul, now Novara in Milan. Tacit. Hist. 1, c. 70.

NOVESIUM, a town of the Ubii, on the west of the Rhine, now called Nuys, near Cologne. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 26, &c.

NOVIODUNUM, a town of the Ædui in Gaul, taken by J. Cæsar. It is pleasantly situated on the Ligeris, and now called Nayon, or, as others suppose, Nevoes. Cæs. Bell. G. 2, c. 12.

NOVIOMAGUS, or NEOMAGUS, a town of Gaul, now Niseux, in Normandy.—Another, called also Nemetes, now Spire.—Another in Batavia, now Nimeguen, on the south side of the Waal.

NOVIUM, a town of Spain, now Noya.

NOVUM COMUM, a town of Insubria on the lake Laius, of which the inhabitants were called Novocomenses. [It is the same as Comum. vid. Comum.] Cic. ad Div. 13, c. 35.

Nox, one of the most ancient deities among the heathens, daughter of Chaos. From her union with her brother Erebus, she gave birth to the Day and the Light. She was also the mother of the Parcæ, Hesperides, Dreams, of Discord, Death, Momus, Fraud, &c. She is called by some of the poets the mother of all things, of gods as well as of men, and therefore she was worshipped with great solemnity by the ancients. She had a famous statue in Diana's temple at Ephesus, it was usual to offer her a black sheep, as she was the mother of the furies. The cock was also offered to her, as that bird proclaims the approach of day during the darkness of the night. She is represented as mounted on a chariot, and covered with a veil bespangled with stars. The constellations generally went before her as her constant messengers. Sometimes she is seen holding two children under her arms, one of which is black, representing death or rather night, and the other white, representing sleep or day. Some of the moderns have described her as a woman veiled in mourning and crowned with poppies, and carried on a chariot drawn by owls and bats. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 950.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 455.—Paus. 10, c. 38.—Hesiod. Theog. 125 and 212.

NUCERIA, a town of Campania, [south-east of Neapolis,] taken by Annibal. It became a Roman colony under Augustus, and was called Nuceria Constantia, or Alfaterna. It now bears the name of Nocera, and contains about 30,000 inhabitants. Lucan. 2, v. 472.—Liv. 9, c. 41, l. 27, c. 3.—Ital. 8, v. 531.—Tacit. Ann. 13 and 14.—A town of Umbria at the foot of the Appenines, [now Nocera.] Strab.—Plin.

NUITHONES, a people of Germany possessing the country now called Mecklenburg and Pomerania. Tacit. G. 40.

NUMA MARCIUS, a man made governor of Rome by Tullus Hostilius. He was son-in-law of Numa Pompilius, and father to Ancus Martius. Tacit. A. 6, c. 11.—Liv. 1, c. 20.

NUMA POMPILIUS, a celebrated philosopher, born at Cures, a village of the Sabines, on the day that Romulus laid the foundation of Rome. He married Tatia the daughter of Tatus the king of the Sabines, and at her death he retired into the country to devote himself more freely to literary pursuits. At the death of Romulus, the Romans fixed upon him to be their new king, and two senators were sent to acquaint him with the decisions of the senate and of the people. Numa refused their offers, and it was not but at the repeated solicitations and prayers of his friends that he was prevailed upon to accept the royalty. The beginning of his reign was popular, and he dismissed the 300 body guards which his predecessor had kept around his person, observing that he did not distrust a people who had compelled him to reign over them. He was not, like Romulus, fond of war and military expeditions, but he applied himself to tame the ferocity of his subjects, to inculcate in their minds a reverence for the deity, and to quell their dissensions by dividing all the citizens into different classes. He established different orders of priests, and taught the Romans not to worship the deity by images; and from his example no graven or painted statues appeared in the temples or sanctuaries of Rome for upwards of 160 years. He encouraged the report which was spread of his paying regular visits to the nymph Egeria, and made use of her name to give sanction to the laws and institutions which he had introduced. He established the college of the vestals, and told the Romans that the safety of the empire depended upon the preservation of the sacred ancyle or shield, which, as was generally believed, had dropped down from heaven. He dedicated a temple to Janus, which, during his whole reign remained shut, as a mark of peace and tranquillity at Rome. Numa died after a reign of 43 years, in which he had given every possible encouragement to the useful arts, and in which he had cultivated peace, B. C. 672. Not only the Romans, but also the neighbouring nations, were eager to pay their last offices to a monarch whom they revered for his abilities, moderation, and humanity. He forbade his body to be burnt according to the custom of the Romans, but he ordered it to be buried near Mount Janiculum, with many of the books which he had written. These books were accidentally found by one of the Romans about 400 years after his death; and as they contained nothing new or interesting, but merely the reasons why he had made innovations in the form of worship and in the religion of the Romans, they were burnt by order of the senate. He left behind one daughter, called Pompilia, who married Numa Marcius and became the mother of Ancus Martius the fourth king of Rome. Some say that he had also four sons, but this opinion is ill founded. *Plut. in vitâ.—Varro.—Liv. 1, c. 18.—Plin. 13 and 14, &c.—Flor. 1, c. 2.—Verg. Æn. 6, v. 309, l. 9, v. 562.—Cic. de Nat. • NUMĀNA, a town of Picenum in Italy, of which the people were called Numanates. Mela, 2, c. 4.

NUMANTIA, a town of Spain near the sources of the river Durius, celebrated for the war of 14 years, which, though unprotected by walls or towers, it bravely maintained against the Romans. [Numantia was not indeed defended by very regular fortifications, and yet at the same time was very strong both by nature and art. It was built upon a mountain, between two of the branches of the Durius, and surrounded by very thick woods, on three sides. One path alone led down into the plain, and this was defended by ditches and palisades. The great length of time it withstood the Romans may be easily accounted for by its difficult situation and the circumstance of its circuit being so large that within it there were even pastures for cattle.] The inhabitants obtained some advantages over the Roman forces till Scipio Africanus was empowered to finish the war, and to see the destruction of Numantia. He began the siege with an army of 60,000 men, and was bravely opposed by the besieged, who were no more than 4000 men able to bear arms. Both armies behaved with uncommon valour, and the courage of the Numantines was soon changed into despair and fury. Their provisions began to fail, and they fed upon the flesh of their horses, and afterwards of that of their dead companions, and at last were necessitated to draw lots to kill and devour one another. The melancholy situation of their affairs obliged some to surrender to the Roman general. Scipio demanded them to deliver themselves up on the morrow; they refused, and when a longer time had been granted to their petitions, they retired and set fire to their houses, and all destroyed themselves, B. C. 133, so that not even one remained to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. Some historians, however, deny that, and support that a number of Numantines delivered themselves into Scipio's hands, and that 50 of them were drawn in triumph at Rome, and the rest sold as slaves. The fall of Numantia was more glorious than that of Carthage or Corinth, though inferior to them. The conqueror obtained the surname of Numantinus. Flor. 2, c. 18.—Appian. Iber.—Patere. 2, c. 3.—Cic. 1, off.—Strab. 3.—Mela, 2, c. 6.—Plut. Horat. 2, od. 12, v. i.

NUMENIA, or NEOMENIA, a festival observed by the Greeks at the beginning of every lunar month, in honour of all the gods, but especially of Apollo, or the Sun, who is justly deemed the author of light and of whatever distinction is made in the months, seasons, days, and nights. It was observed with games and public entertainments, which were provided at the expense of rich citizens, and which were always frequented by the poor. Solemn prayers were offered at Athens during the solemnity for the prosperity of the republic. The demi-gods as well as the heroes of the ancients were honoured and invoked in the festivals.

NUMENIUS, [a Greek philosopher of the Platonic school, who is supposed to have flourished under the reign of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. He was born at Apamea in Syria, and was regarded as an oracle of wisdom. Both Origen and Plotinus mention him with respect. Of the works which he wrote none are now extant excepting some fragments preserved by Eusebius. He is said to have maintained that Plato borrowed from Moses what he advanced concerning God and the creation of the world.]

NUMENTĀNA VIA, a road at Rome [which passed over Mons Sacer to Nomentum and Cures among the Sabines.] Liv. 3, c. 52.

NUMERIA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over numbers. Aug. de Civ. D. 4, c. 11.

NUMERĪANUS, M. Aurelius, a son of the emperor Carus. He accompanied his father into the east with the title of Cæsar, and at his death he succeeded him with his brother Carinus, A. D. 282. His reign was short. Eight months after his father's death he was murdered in his litter by his father-in-law, Arrius Aper, who accompanied him in an expedition. [Numerian was fitted rather for private than public life. His talents were rather of the contemplative than the active kind. When his father's elevation reluctantly forced him from the shade of retirement, neither his temper nor his pursuits had qualified him for the command of armies. His constitution was destroyed by the hardships of the Persian war, and he had contracted from the heat of the climate such a weakness of the eyes, as obliged him in the course of a long retreat to confine himself to the darkness of a tent or litter. The administration of all affairs, civil as well as military, devolved on Arrius Aper, the prætorian prefect, his father-in-law. The army was eight months on its march from the banks of the Tigris to the Thracian Bosphorus, and during all that time the imperial authority was exercised in the name of the emperor, who never appeared to his soldiers. Suspicions at length spread among them that their emperor was no longer living, and they could not be prevented from breaking into the imperial tent, where they found only his corpse. Aper was accused of the murder, and put to death by Diocletian, commander of the body guards, who was proclaimed emperor.] Numerianus has been admired for his learning as well as his moderation. He was naturally an eloquent speaker, and in poetry he was inferior to no writer of his age.—A friend of the emperor Severus.

NUMICIA VIA, one of the great Roman roads which led from the capital to the town of Brundisium.

NUMICUS, a small river of Latium, near Lavinium, where the dead body of Æneas was found, and where Anna, Dido's sister, drowned herself. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 150, &c.—Sil. 1, v. 359.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 358, &c. Fast. 3, v. 643.—A friend of Horace, to whom he addressed 1 ep. 6.

NUMIDA, a surname given by Horace, 1 od. 36, to one of the generals of Augustus, from his conquests in Numidia. Some suppose that it is Pomponius, others Plotius.

NUMIDIA, an inland country of Africa, which now forms the kingdom of Algiers. It was bounded on the north by the Mediterranean Sea, south by Gætulia, west by Mauritania, and east by a part of Libya which was called Africa Propria. The inhabitants were called Nomades, and afterwards Numadæ. It was the kingdom of Masinissa, who was the occasion of the third Punic war, on account of the offence he had received from the Carthaginians. Jugurtha reigned there, as also Juba the father and son. It was conquered, and became a Roman province, of which Sallust was the first governor. The Numidians were excellent warriors, and in their expeditions they always endeavoured to engage with the enemy in the night time. They rode without saddles or bridles, whence they have been called infrani. They had their wives in common as the rest of the barbarian nations of antiquity. [Numidia was occupied by two principal nations, the Massyli towards Africa Propria, in the eastern part, and the Massæyli towards Mauritania in the western. In the time of the emperor Claudius the western part was added to Mauritania under the title of Mauritania Cæsariensis, now Morocco. The aborigines of Numidia were the descendants of Put or Phut; these, however, were not the only ancient inhabitants, because the Phœnicians, in almost the earliest ages, sent colonies thither. Notwithstanding the barbarity of the Numidians, some of them used letters not very unlike those of the Punic alphabet, as appears from the legends of several ancient Numidian coins.] Sallust. in Jug.—Flor. 2, c. 15.—Strab. 2 and 17.—Mela. 1, c. 4, &c.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 754.

NUMITOR, a son of Procas, king of Alba, who inherited his father's kingdom with his brother Amulius, and began to reign conjointly with him. Amulius was too avaricious to bear a colleague on the throne; he expelled his brother, and, that he might more easily secure himself, he put to death his son Lausus, and consecrated his daughter Ilia to the service of the goddess Vesta, which demanded perpetual celibacy. These great precautions were rendered abortive. Ilia became pregnant, and though the two children whom she brought forth were exposed in the river by order of the tyrant, their life was preserved, and Numitor was restored to his throne by his grandsons, and the tyrannical usurper was put to death. Dionys. Hal.—Liv. 1, c. 3.—Plut. in Romul.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 55, &c.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 768.

NUMITORIUS, a Roman who defended Virginia, to whom Appius wished to offer violence. He was made military tribune.

NUNCORÆUS, a son of Sesostris, king of Egypt, who made an obelisk, some ages after brought to Rome and placed in the Vatican. Plin. 36, c. 11. He is called Pheron by Herodotus.

NUNDINA, a goddess whom the Romans invoked when they named their children. This happened the ninth day after their birth, whence the name of the goddess, Nona dies. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 16.

NUNDINÆ. vid. Feriæ.

NURSGIA, a goddess who patronized the Etrurians. Juv. 10, v. 74.

NURSIA, now Norza, a town of Picenum, whose inhabitants are called Nursini. Its situation was exposed, and the air considered as unwholesome. Sil. It. 8, v. 416.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 716.—Martial. 13, ep. 20.—Liv. 28, c. 45.

NYCTEIS, a daughter of Nycteus who was mother of Labdacus.—A patronymic of Antiope the daughter of Nycteus, mother of Amphion and Zethus by Jupiter, who had assumed the shape of a satyr to enjoy her company. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 110.

NYCTELIUS, a surname of Bacchus, because his orgies were celebrated in the night. (νύξ, nox, τελειά, perficio.) The words latex Nyctelius thence signify wine. Seneca in Œdip.—Paus. 1, c. 40.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 15.

NYCTEUS, a son of Neptune by Celene, daughter of Atlas, king of Lesbos, or of Thebes according to the more received opinion. He married a nymph of Crete called Polyxo, or Amalthæa, by whom he had two daughters, Nyctimene and Antiope. The first of these disgraced herself by her criminal amours with her father, into whose bed she introduced herself by means of her nurse. When the father knew the incest he had committed, he attempted to stab his daughter, who was immediately changed by Minerva into an owl. Nycteus made war against Epopeus, who had carried away Antiope, and died of a wound which he had received in an engagement, leaving his kingdom to his brother Lycus, whom he entreated to continue the war, and punish Antiope for her immodest conduct. (vid. Antiope.) Paus. 2, c. 6.—Hygin. fab. 157 and 204.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 490, &c. 1. 6, v. 110, &c.

NYCTIMÈNE, a daughter of Nycteus. vid. Nycteus.

NYMPHÆ, certain female deities among the ancients. [They are said to have derived their name from the circumstance of their always having a youthful appearance, ἀπο τοῦ αἰνῆος φαισθῆαι.] They were generally divided into two classes, nymphs of the land and nymphs of the sea. Of the nymphs of the earth, some presided over woods, and were called Dryades, [from δρυς, arbor.] and Hamadryades, [from ἄμα, simul, and δρυς, arbor.] These were supposed to come into existence when the tree was first planted, and when it perished to die also; others presided over mountains, and were called Oreades, [from ὄρος, mons.] some presided over hills and dales, and were called Naiades, [from ναῖα, vallis.] &c. Of the sea nymphs, some were called Oceanides, Nereides, Naiades, Potamides, Limnades, &c. These presided not only over the sea, but also over rivers, fountains, streams, and lakes. The nymphs fixed their residence not only in the sea, but also on mountains, rocks, in woods or caverns, and their grottos were beautified by evergreens and delightful and romantic scenes. The nymphs were immortal according to the opinion of some mythologists; others supposed that, like men, they were subject to mortality, though their life was of long duration. They lived for several thousand years, according to Hesiod, or as Plutarch seems obscurely to intimate, they lived above 9720 years. The number of the nymphs is not precisely known. There were above 3000, according to Hesiod, whose power was extended over the different places of the earth, and the various functions and occupations of mankind. They were worshipped by the ancients, though not with so much solemnity as the superior deities. They had no temples raised to their honour, and the only offerings they received were milk, honey, oil, and sometimes the sacrifice of a goat. They were generally represented as young and beautiful virgins, veiled up to the middle, and sometimes they held a vase, from which they seemed to pour water. Sometimes they had grass, leaves, and shells instead of vases. It was deemed unfortunate to see them naked, and such sight was generally attended by a delirium, to which Propertius seems to allude in this verse, wherein he speaks of the innocence and simplicity of the primitive ages of the world,

Nec fuerat, nudas pœna videre Deas.

The nymphs were generally distinguished by an epithet which denoted the place of their residence; thus the nymphs of Sicily were called Sicelides; those of Corycus, Corycides. &c. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 320, l. 5, v. 412, l. 9, 651, &c. Fast. 3, v. 769.—Paus. 10, c. 3.—Plut. de Orac. dej.—Orpheus. Arg.—Hesiod. Theog.—Propert. 3, el. 12.—Homer. Od. 14.

NYMPHÆUM, a place near the walls of Apollonia, sacred to the nymphs, where Apollo had also an oracle. The place was also celebrated for the continual flames of fire which seemed to rise at a distance from the plains. It was there that a sleeping satyr was once caught and brought to Sylla as he returned from the Mithridatic war. This monster had the same features as the poets ascribe to the satyr. He was interrogated by Sylla, and by his interpreters, but his articulations were unintelligible, and the Roman spurned from him a creature which seemed to partake of the nature of a beast more than that of a man. Plut. in Syllâ.—Div. 41.—Plin. 5, c. 29, Strab. 7.—Liv. 42, c. 36 and 49.—A city of Taurica Chersonesus. [It lay on the route from Theodosia to Panticapæum, and had a good port on the Euxine.]—The building at Rome where the nymphs were worshipped, bore also this name, being adorned with their statues, and with fountains and waterfalls, which offered an agreeable and refreshing coolness.

NYMPHÆUS, a river of Armenia Major, which, according to Procopius, formed a separation between the Roman and Persian empires. It ran from north to south, entered the town of Martyropolis, and discharged itself into the Tigris south-east of Amida.]

NYMPHIDIUS, a favourite of Nero, who said that he was descended from Caligula. He was raised to the consular dignity, and soon after disputed the empire with Galba. He was slain by the soldiers, &c. Tacit. Ann. 15.

NYMPHIS, a native of Heraclea who wrote an history of Alexander's life and actions, divided into 24 books. Ælian. 7, de Anim.

NYMPHOLEPTES, or Nymphomanes, possessed by the nymphs. This name was given to the inhabitants of Mount Cithæron, who believed that they were inspired by the nymphs. [vid. Hobhouse's Journey, vol. 1, p. 332.] Plut. in Arist.

NYSSA or NYSSA, a town of Æthiopia, at the south of Egypt, or, according to others, of Arabia. This city, with another of the same name in India, was sacred to the god Bacchus, who was educated there by the nymphs of the place, and who received the name of Dionysius, which seems to be compounded of Διος & Νύσσα, the name of his father, and that of the place of his education. [vid. remarks under the article Bacchus.] The god made this place the seat of his empire and the capital of the conquered nations of the east. Diodorus, in his third and fourth books, has given a prolix account of the birth of the god at Nyssa, and of his education and heroic actions. [Curtius locates the Indian Nyssa between the Choaspes and the Cophenes. It has been supposed to correspond with the modern Nagar, but not very correctly.] Mela, 3, c. 7.—Ovid. Met. 4, v. 13, &c.—Ital. 7, v. 198.—Curt. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 6, v. 805.—According to some geographers there were no less than ten places of the name of Nyssa. One of these was on the coast of Eubœa, famous for its vines, which grew in such an uncommon manner that if a twig was planted in the ground in the morning, it immediately produced grapes, which were full ripe in the evening.—A city of Thrace.—Another, seated on Mount Parnassus, and sacred to Bacchus. Juv. 7, v. 63.

NYSSÆUS, a surname of Bacchus, because he was worshipped at Nysa. Propert. 3, el. 17, v. 22.

NYSIÄDES, a name given to the nymphs of Nysa, to whose care Jupiter intrusted the education of his son Bacchus. Ovid. Met. 3, v. 314, &c.

NYSIUS, a surname of Bacchus as the protecting god of Nysa. Cic. Flac. 25.

OARSES, the original name of Artaxerxes Mnemon.

OÄSIS, [a term derived from the Coptic word Ouahé, signifying "a habitable place," a "fertile island" in the midst of the sandy desert of Africa. Of these Oases, which are called islands because they appear like such in the midst of an ocean of sand, there are several that lie at the distance of 100 miles or more from the Nile, at the west of it. The Arabian geographers were acquainted with these fertile spots, and called them "Elouah," or "Elwah." Of these Oases, the largest, which is called Oasis Magna, or El-wah, is placed by Ptolemy under the parallel of 28°; the second opposite what is now Behnese, the third under the parallel of lake Mæris. This last is the one in which Hornemann discovered the Fons Solis of antiquity. vid. Ammon. It lies five degrees nearly west of Cairo. Under the sovereigns of the lower empire, the Oasis Magna became a place of exile, and among others Nestorius and Athanasius were sent to it.] Strab. 17.—Zosim. 6, c. 97.—Herodot. 2, c. 26.

OAXES, a river of Crete which received its name from Oaxus the son of Apollo. Virg. Ecl. 1, v. 66.

OAXUS, a town of Crete, [on the northern side of the island. It was the capital of a kingdom which had its appropriate sovereign, and was said to have been founded by the Oaxus mentioned in the preceding article.]

ORRINGA, now Ahr, a river of Germany falling into the Rhine above Rimmagen.

OCEIA, a woman who presided over the sacred rites of Vesta for 57 years with the greatest sanctity. She died in the reign of Tiberius, and the daughter of Domitius succeeded her. Tacit. Ann. 2, c. 86.

OCEÄNIDES and OCEANITIDES, sea-nymphs, daughters of Oceanus, from whom they received their name, and of the goddess Tethys. They were 3000 according to Apollodorus, who mentions the names of seven of them; Asia, Styx, Electra, Doris, Eurynome, Amphitrite, and Metis. Hesiod speaks of the eldest of them, and reckons 41, Pitho, Admete, Prynno, Ianthe, Rhodia, Hippo, Callirhoe, Urania, Clymene, Idyia, Pasithoe, Clythia, Zeuxo, Galuxaure, Plexaure, Perseis, Pluto, Thoe, Polydora, Melobois, Dione, Cerceis, Xantha, Acasta, Ianira, Telestho, Europa, Menestho, Petrea, Eudora, Calypso, Tyche, Ocyroe, Crisia, Amphiro, with those mentioned by Apollodorus, except Amphitrite. Hyginus mentions sixteen, whose names are almost all different from those of Apollodorus and Hesiod, which difference proceeds from the mutilation of the original text. The Oceanides, as the rest of the inferior deities, were honoured with libations and sacrifices. Prayers were offered to them, and they were entreated to protect sailors from storms and dangerous tempests. The Argonauts, before they proceeded to their expedition, made an offering of flour, honey, and oil, on the sea-shore, to all the deities of the sea, and sacrificed bulls to them, and entreated their protection. When the sacrifice was made on the shore the blood of the victim was received in a vessel, but when it was in open sea, the blood was permitted to run down into the waters. When the sea was calm the sailors generally offered a lamb or young pig, but if it was agitated by the winds, and rough, a black bull was deemed the most acceptable victim. Homer. Od. 3.—Horat.—Apollon. Arg.—Virg. G. 4, v. 341.—Hesiod. Theog. 349.—Apollod. 1.

OCEÄNUS, a powerful deity of the sea, son of Cælus and Terra. He married Tethys, by whom he had the most principal rivers, such as the Alpheus, Peneus, Strymon, &c. with a number of daughters, who are called from him Oceanides. (vid. Oceanides.) According to Homer, Oceanus was the father of all the gods, and on that account he received frequent visits from the rest of the deities. He is generally represented as an old man with a long flowing beard, and sitting upon the waves of the sea. He often holds a pike in his hand, while ships under sail appear at a distance, or a sea monster stands near him. Oceanus presided over every part of the sea, and even the rivers were subjected to his power. The ancients were superstitious in their worship to Oceanus, and revered with great solemnity a deity to whose care they intrusted themselves when going on any voyage. [Besides being the name of a deity, the term Oceanus (Ωκεανος) occurs in Homer in another sense also. It is made to signify an immense stream which, according to the rude ideas of that early age, flowed around the earth and its seas, and which ebbed and flowed thrice in the course of a single day. Into this the heavenly bodies were supposed to descend at their setting, and to emerge from it at their rising.] Hesiod. Theog.—Ovid. Fast. 5, v. 31, &c.—Apollod. 1.—Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 20.—Homer. Il.

OCELLUS, an ancient philosopher of Lucania. vid. Lucanus.

OCELUM, a town of Gaul. [now Usseau.] Cæs. Bell. G. 1, c. 10.

OCHA, a mountain of Eubœa, and the name of Eubœa itself.—A sister of Ochus buried alive by his orders.

OCHUS, a surname given to Artaxerxes the 3d king of Persia. [vid. Artaxerxes.]—A king of Persia. He exchanged this name for that of Darius. vid. Darius Nothus.

Ocnus, a son of the Tiber and of Manto, who assisted Æneas against Turnus. He built a town which he called Mantua after his mother's name. Some suppose that he is the same as Bianor. Virg. Ecl. 9, Æn. 10, v. 198.—A man remarkable for his industry. He had a wife as remarkable for her profusion; she always consumed and lavished away whatever the labours of her husband had earned. He is represented as twisting a cord, which an ass standing by eats up as soon as he makes it; whence the proverb of the cord of Ocnus often applied to labour which meets no return, and which is totally lost. Propert. 4, el. 3, v. 21.—Plin. 35, c. 11.—Paus. 10, c. 29.

OCRICULUM, now Otricoli, a town of Umbria near Rome. Cic. pro Mil.—Liv. 19, c. 41

OCTAVIA, a Roman lady, sister to the emperor Augustus, and celebrated for her beauty and virtues. She married Claudius Marcellus, and after his death M. Antony. Her marriage with Antony was a political step to reconcile her brother and her husband. Antony proved for some time attentive to her, but he soon after deserted her for Cleopatra, and when she attempted to withdraw him from this unlawful amour by going to meet him at Athens, she was secretly rebuked and totally banished from his presence. This affront was highly resented by Augustus, and though Octavia endeavoured to pacify him by palliating her husband's behaviour, he resolved to revenge her cause by arms. After the battle of Actium and the death of Antony, Octavia, forgetful of the injuries she had received, took into her house all the children of her husband, and treated them with maternal tenderness. Marcellus her son by her first husband was married to a niece of Augustus, and publicly intended as a successor to his uncle. His sudden death plunged all his family into the greatest grief. Virgil, whom Augustus patronized, undertook upon himself to pay a melancholy tribute to the memory of a young man whom Rome regarded as its future father and patron. He was desired to repeat his composition in the presence of Augustus and of his sister. Octavia burst into tears as soon as the poet began; but when he mentioned, Tu Marcellus eris, she swooned away. This tender and pathetic encomium upon the merit and the virtue of young Marcellus was liberally rewarded by Octavia, and Virgil received 10,000 sesterces for every one of the verses. Octavia had two daughters by Antony, Antonia Major and Antonia Minor. The elder married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom she had Cn. Domitius the father of the emperor Nero by Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus. Antonia Minor, who was as virtuous and as beautiful as her mother, married Drusus the son of Tiberius, by whom she had Germanicus, and Claudius who reigned before Nero. The death of Marcellus continually preyed upon the mind of Octavia, who died of melancholy about ten years before the Christian era. Her brother paid great regard to her memory, by pronouncing himself her funeral oration. The Roman people also showed their respect for her virtues by their wish to pay her divine honours. Suet. in Aug.—Plut. in Anton. &c.—A daughter of the emperor Claudius by Messalina. She was betrothed to Silanus, but by the intrigues of Agrippina, she was married to the emperor Nero in the 16th year of her age. She was soon after divorced on pretence of barrenness, and the emperor married Poppæa, who exercised her enmity upon Octavia by causing her to be banished into Campania. She was afterwards recalled at the instance of the people, and Poppæa, who was resolved on her ruin, caused her again to be banished to an island, where she was ordered to kill herself by opening her veins. Her head was cut off and carried to Poppæa. Suet. in Claud. 27, in Ner. 7 and 35.—Tacit. Ann. 12.

OCTAVIANUS, or OCTAVIUS CÆSAR, the nephew of Cæsar the dictator. After the battle of Actium and the final destruction of the Roman republic, the servile senate bestowed upon him the title and surname of Augustus as expressive of his greatness and dignity. vid. Augustus.

OCTAVIUS, a Roman officer who brought Perseus, king of Macedonia, a prisoner to the consul. He was sent by his countrymen to be guardian to Ptolemy Eupator, the young king of Egypt, where he behaved with the greatest arrogance. He was assassinated by Lysias, who was before regent of Egypt. The murderer was sent to Rome.—A man who opposed Metellus in the reduction of Crete by means of Pompey. He was obliged to retire from the island.—A man who banished Cinna from Rome and became remarkable for his probity and fondness of discipline. He was seized and put to death by order of his successful rivals Marius and Cinna.—A Roman who boasted of being in the number of Cæsar's murderers. His assertions were false, yet he was punished as if he had been accessory to the conspiracy.—A lieutenant of Crassus in Parthia. He accompanied his general to the tent of the Parthian conqueror, and was killed by the enemy as he attempted to hinder them from carrying away Crassus.—A poet in the Augustan age intimate with Horace. He also distinguished himself as an historian. Horat. 1. Sat. 10, v. 82.

OCTODŪRUS, [a town or village on the Drance, near its junction with the Rhone, at a considerable distance above the influx of the latter into the Lacus Lamanus or Lake of Geneva. It is now Martigny.] Cæs. B. G. 3, c. 1.

OCTOGESA, a town of Spain, a little above the mouth of the Iberus, [on the north bank of that river, where it is joined by the Sico-ris or Sagre.] It is now called Mequinensa. Cæs. B. G. 1, c. 61.

OCYPETE, one of the Harpies who infected whatever she touched. The name signifies swift flying. Hesiod. Theog. 265.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.

OCYRÖE, a daughter of Chiron by Chariclo, who had the gift of prophecy. She was changed into a mare. (vid. Melanippe.) Ovid. Met. 2, v. 638, &c.

ODENATUS, a celebrated prince of Palmyra, [originally a native, and a leading inhabitant of that city; though some make him a prince of a tribe of Saracens who dwell in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates.] He early inured himself to bear fatigues, and by hunting leopards and wild beasts, he accustomed himself to the labours of a military life. He was faithful to the Romans; and when Aurelian had been taken prisoner by Sapor king of Persia, Odenatus warmly interested himself in his cause, and solicited his release by writing a letter to the conqueror and sending him presents. The king of Persia was offended at the liberty of Odenatus; he tore the letter, and ordered the presents which were offered to be thrown into a river. To punish Odenatus, who had the impudence, as he observed, to write to so great a monarch as himself, he ordered him to appear before him [with his hands tied behind his back, and to solicit his forgiveness,] on pain of being devoted to instant destruction, with all his family, if he dared to refuse. Odenatus disdaind the summons of Sapor, and opposed force to force. [To him is ascribed the success of an expedition in which Sapor's treasures, and several of his wives and children were captured; and so closely did he press upon the Persian, that he forced him to retreat, and cut off his rear in passing the Euphrates. After these exploits, Odenatus assumed the title of king of Palmyra, and elevated his wife, the celebrated Zenobia, to the rank of queen. Gallienus, the son and colleague of Valerian, entrusted Odenatus with the chief command of the Roman army in the east. In this quality he entered Mesopotamia, defeated Sapor in his own country, and laid siege to Ctesiphon. During the distracted state of the empire under Gallienus, Odenatus remained faithful to him, and kept the eastern section in tranquillity. On this account he was created Augustus and partner in the empire by Gallienus in the year 264. Zenobia was dignified at the same time with the title of Augusta, and their children with that of Cæsar.] Odenatus, invested with new power, resolved to signalize himself more conspicuously by conquering the northern barbarians; [he ravaged the territories of Sapor and took Ctesiphon. He marched also against the Goths or Scythians who had invaded Asia, and compelled them to make a hasty retreat; but his exultation was short, and he perished by the dagger of one of his relations whom he had slightly offended in a domestic entertainment. He died at Emessa, about the 267th year of the Christian era. Zenobia succeeded to all his titles and honours.

ODESSUS, a sea-port town at the west of the Euxine Sea in Lower Mœsia, below the mouths of the Danube. Ovid. 1, Trist. 9, v. 37.

ODËUM, a musical theatre at Athens. [It was built by Pericles, but being demolished in the Mithridatic war, was rebuilt with so much splendour by Herodes Atticus, that, according to Pausanias, it surpassed all the famous buildings in Greece.] Vatruv. 5, c. 9.

ODINUS, a celebrated hero of antiquity, [vid. the end of this article,] who flourished about 70 years before the Christian era, in the northern parts of ancient Germany, or the modern kingdom of Denmark. He was at once a priest, a soldier, a poet, a monarch, and a conqueror. He imposed upon the credulity of his superstitious countrymen, and made them believe that he could raise the dead to life, and that he was acquainted with futurity. When he had extended his power, and increased his fame by conquest and by persuasion, he resolved to die in a different manner from other men. He assembled his friends, and with the sharp point of a lance he made on his body nine different wounds in the form of a circle, and as he expired he declared he was going into Scythia, where he should become one of the immortal gods. He further added, that he would prepare bliss and felicity for such of his countrymen as lived a virtuous life, who fought with intrepidity, and who died like heroes in the field of battle. These injunctions had the desired effect; his countrymen superstitiously believed him, and always recommended themselves to his protection whenever they engaged in a battle, and they entreated him to receive the souls of such as had fallen in war. [The Budha of India, the Goito-Syr of the Scythians (Herod. 4, c. 59,) the Bod-Her of the Vanals, the Bogh of the Slavi, the Odin of the Saxons and Scandinavians, the Wodan of the Germans, the Khoda of the Persians, the God of the Britons, denote one and the same deity, and are only so many different appellations for the Supreme Being.]

ODOACER, a king of the Heruli, who destroyed the western empire of Rome, and called himself king of Italy, A. D. 476.

ODRÛSÆ, an ancient people of Thrace, between Abdera and the river Ister. The epithet of Odrysius is often applied to a Thracian. Ovid. Met. 6, v. 490, l. 13, v. 554.—Stat. Ach. 1, v. 184.—Liv. 39, c. 53.

ODYSSEA, one of Homer's epic poems, in which he describes in 24 books the adventure of Ulysses on his return from the Trojan war, with other material circumstances. The whole of the action comprehends no more than 55 days. It is not so esteemed as the Iliad of that poet. vid. Homerus. [Dr. Blair observes, that Longinus's criticism on the Odyssey is not unfounded: viz. that Homer may in this poem be compared to the setting sun, whose grandeur still remains without the heat of his meridian beams. It wants the vigour and sublimity of the Iliad, and yet possesses so many beauties as justly to entitle it to great praise. It is a very amusing poem, and has much greater variety than the Iliad: its numerous stories are interesting, and its descriptions beautiful. Although it descends from the dignity of gods and heroes and warlike achievements, it nevertheless affords more pleasing pictures of ancient manners. The Odyssey, however, has acknowledged defects. Many of its scenes fall below the majesty expected in an epic poem. The last twelve books, after Ulysses is landed in Ithaca, are in several parts tedious and languid; and, though the discovery which Ulysses makes of himself to his nurse Euryclea, and his interview with Penelope before she knew him, are tender and affecting, yet the poet does not seem happy in the discovery of Ulysses to Penelope: she is too cautious and distrustful, and we are disappointed of the surprise of joy which we expected on that high occasion. The authenticity of the latter part of the Odyssey has been attacked by modern critics: the student is referred to the remarks under the article Homerus. Knight, in his Prolegomena to Homer, thinks he has observed in the Odyssey many words and forms of expression which betray an origin more recent than the Iliad. He ranks in this number, the use of χηρηματα instead of κτηματα, that of λεσχη, and also of θηττω. In the same class is to be placed the expression βυβλιος ὄπλος, this plant (the Byblus) being unknown to the author of the Iliad. He regards also as more modern forms ναυμιος in place of ναυμνος (contracted from ναυμιμνος), θεσπις instead of θεσπισιος, αργουης in place of αργουσιος, &c.]

CEA, a city of Africa, now Tripoli. [vid. Tripolis.] Plin. 5, c. 4.—Sil. Ital. 3, v. 257.—Also a place in Ægina. Herodot. 5, c. 83.

ÆAGRUS or ÆAGER, the father of Orpheus by Calliope. He was king of Thrace, and from him Mount Hæmus, and also the Hebrus, one of the rivers of the country, has received the appellation of Æagrius, though Servius, in his commentaries, disputes the explanation of Diodorus, by asserting that the Æagrius is a river of Thrace, whose waters supply the streams of the Hebrus. Ovid. in Ib. 414.—Apollon. 1, arg.—Virg. G. 4, v. 524.—Ital. 5, v. 463.—Diod.—Apollod. 1, c. 3.

CEAX, a son of Nauplius and Clymene. He was brother to Palamedes, whom he accompanied to the Trojan war, and whose death he highly resented on his return to Greece, by raising disturbances in the family of some of the Grecian princes. Dictys. Cret.—Apollod. 2.—Hygin. fab. 117.

CEBĀLIA, the ancient name of Laconia, which it received from king CEBalus, and thence Cebalides puer is applied to Hyacinthus as a native of the country, and Cebalius sanguis is used to denominate his blood. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—The same name is given to Tarentum, because built by a Lacedæmonian colony, whose ancestors were governed by CEBalus. Virg. G. 4, v. 125.—Sil. 12, v. 451.

CEBĀLUS, a son of Argalus or Cynortas, who was king of Laconia. He married Gorgophone, the daughter of Perseus, by whom he had Hippocoon, Tyndarus, &c. Paus. 3, c. 1.—Apollod. 3, c. 10.—A son of Telon and the nymph Sebethis, who reigned in the neighbourhood of Neapolis in Italy. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 734.

CEBĀRES, a groom of Darius son of Hystaspes. He was the cause of his master's obtaining the kingdom of Persia by his artifice in making his horse neigh first. (vid. Darius 1st.) Herodot. 3, c. 85.—Justin. 1, c. 10.

CEHĀLIA, a country of Peloponnesus in Laconia, with a small town of the same name. This town was destroyed by Hercules, while Eurytus was king over it, from which circumstance it is often called Eurytropolis.—A small town of Eubœa, where, according to some, Eurytas reigned, and not in Peloponnesus. Strab. 8, 9, and 10.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 291.—Ovid. Heroid. 9. Met. 9, v. 136.—Sophoc. in Trach. 74 & Schol.

CECUMENIUS, [an ancient Greek commentator on the Scriptures, who is supposed to have flourished in the 10th century. He was bishop of Tricca, and the author of commentaries upon the Acts of the Apostles, the fourteen epistles of St. Paul, and the seven Catholic epistles, which contain a concise and perspicuous illustration of these parts of the New Testament. Besides his own remarks and notes, they consist of a compilation of the notes and observations of Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Gregory Nazianzen, and others. He is thought to have written a commentary on the four Gospels, compiled from the writings of the ancient fathers, which is not now extant. The works of CECumenius were first published in Greek at Verona, in 1532, and in Greek and Latin at Paris, in 1631, in 2 vols. fol. To the second volume of the Paris edition is added the commentary of Arethas on the book of Revelations.]

CEÐĪPUS, a son of Laius king of Thebes and Jocasta. As being descended from Venus by his father's side, CÆdipus was born to be exposed to all the dangers and the calamities which Juno could inflict upon the posterity of the goddess of beauty. Laius, the father of CÆdipus, was informed by the oracle, as soon as he married Jocasta, that he must perish by the hands of his son. Such dreadful intelligence awakened his fears, and to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle, he resolved never to approach Jocasta; but his solemn resolutions were violated in a fit of intoxication. The queen became pregnant, and Laius, still intent to stop this evil, ordered his wife to destroy the child as soon as it came into the world. The mother had not the courage to obey, yet she gave the child as soon as born to one of her domestics, with orders to expose him on the mountains. The servant was moved with pity, but to obey the command of Jocasta, he bored the feet of the child and suspended him with a twig by the heels to a tree on Mount Cithæron, where he was soon found by one of the shepherds of Polybus king of Corinth. The shepherd carried him home; and Peribœa, the wife of Polybus, who had no children, educated him as her own child with maternal tenderness. The accomplishments of the infant, who was named Œdipus, on account of the swelling of his feet (οἰδέα, τῦμοε, ποδῆε, πέδεε), soon became the admiration of the age. His companions envied his strength and his address; and one of them, to mortify his rising ambition, told him he was an illegitimate child. This raised his doubts; he asked Peribœa, who, out of tenderness, told him that his suspicions were ill founded. Not satisfied with this, he went to consult the oracle of Delphi, and was there told not to return home, for if he did, he must necessarily be the murderer of his father, and the husband of his mother. This answer of the oracle terrified him; he knew no home but the house of Polybus, therefore he resolved not to return to Corinth where such calamities apparently attended him. He travelled towards Phocis, and in his journey met in a narrow road Laius on a chariot with his arm-bearer. Laius haughtily ordered Œdipus to make way for him. Œdipus refused, and a contest ensued, in which Laius and his arm-bearer were both killed. As Œdipus was ignorant of the quality and of the rank of the men whom he had just killed, he continued his journey, and was attracted to Thebes by the fame of the Sphinx. This terrible monster, whom Juno had sent to lay waste the country, (vid. Sphinx.) resorted in the neighbourhood of Thebes, and devoured all those who attempted to explain, without success, the enigmas which he proposed. The calamity was now become an object of public concern, and as the successful explanation of an enigma would end in the death of the Sphinx, Creon, who at the death of Laius had ascended the throne of Thebes, promised his crown and Jocasta to him who succeeded in the attempt. The enigma proposed was this: What animal in the morning walks upon four feet, at noon upon two, and in the evening upon three? This was left for Œdipus to explain; he came to the monster and said, that man, in the morning of life, walks upon his hands and his feet; when he has attained the years of manhood, he walks upon his two legs; and in the evening, he supports his old age with the assistance of a staff. The monster, mortified at the true explanation, dashed her head against a rock and perished. Œdipus ascended the throne of Thebes, and married Jocasta, by whom he had two sons, Polynices and Eteocles, and two daughters, Ismene and Antigone. Some years after the Theban territories were visited with a plague; and the oracle declared that it should cease only when the murderer of king Laius was banished from Bœotia. As the death of Laius had never been examined, and the circumstances that attended it never known, this answer of the oracle was of the greatest concern to the Thebans; but Œdipus, the friend of his people, resolved to overcome every difficulty by the most exact inquiries. His researches were successful, and he was soon proved to be the murderer of his father. The melancholy discovery was rendered the more alarming, when Œdipus considered that he had not only murdered his father, but that he had committed incest with his mother. In the excess of his grief he put out his eyes, as unworthy to see the light, and banished himself from Thebes, or, as some say, was banished by his two sons. He retired towards Attica, led by his daughter Antigone, and came near Colonos, where there was a grove sacred to the Furies. He remembered that he was doomed by the oracle to die in such a place, and to become the source of prosperity to the country in which his bones were buried. A messenger upon this was sent to Theseus, king of the country, to inform him of the resolution of Œdipus. When Theseus arrived, Œdipus acquainted him, with a prophetic voice, that the gods had called him to die in the place where he stood; and to show the truth of this he walked, himself, without the assistance of a guide, to the spot where he must expire. Immediately the earth opened and Œdipus disappeared. Some suppose that Œdipus had not children by Jocasta, and that the mother murdered herself as soon as she knew the incest which had been committed. His tomb was near the Areopagus in the age of Pausanias. Some of the ancient poets represent him in hell, as suffering the punishment which crimes like his seemed to deserve. According to some, the four children which he had were by Euriganea, the daughter of Periphass, whom he married after the death of Jocasta. *Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 66, &c.—Eurip. in Phœniss. &c.—Sophocl. ŒNE, a small town of Argolis. The people are called Œneade.

ŒNEUS, a king of Calydon in Ætolia, son of Parthaon or Portheus, and Euryte. He married Althæa the daughter of Thestius, by whom he had Clymenus, Meleager, Gorge, and Dejanira. After Althæa's death, he married Peribœa the daughter of Hipponous, by whom he had Tydeus. In a general sacrifice which Œneus made to all the gods upon reaping the rich produce of his fields, he forgot Diana, and the goddess, to revenge this unpardonable neglect, incited his neighbours to take up arms against him, and besides she sent a wild boar to lay waste the country of Calydonia. The animal was at last killed by Meleager and the neighbouring princes of Greece, in a celebrated chase known by the name of the chase of the Calydonian boar. Some time after Meleager died, and Œneus was driven from his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrius. Diomedes, however, his grandson soon restored him to his throne: but the continual misfortunes to which he was exposed rendered him melancholy. He exiled himself from Calydon, and left his crown to his son-in-law

Andremon. He died as he was going to Argolis. His body was buried by the care of Diomedes, in a town of Argolis, which from him received the name of Enoe. It is reported that Ceneus received a visit from Bacchus, and that he suffered the god to enjoy the favours of Althæa, and to become the father of Dejanira, for which Bacchus permitted that the wine of which he was the patron should be called among the Greeks by the name of Ceneus (οἶνος) Hygin. fab. 129.—Apollod. 1, c. 8.—*Homer. CENŌMÆUS, a son of Mars by Sterope the daughter of Atlas. He was king of Pisa in Elis, and father of Hippodamia by Euarete, daughter of Acrisius, or Eurythoa, the daughter of Danaus. He was informed by the oracle that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law; therefore as he could skilfully drive a chariot, he determined to marry his daughter only to him who could outrun him, on condition that all who entered the list should agree to lay down their life if conquered. Many had already perished when Pelops, son of Tantalus, proposed himself. He previously bribed Myrtilus the charioteer of Cenomæus, by promising him the enjoyment of the favours of Hippodamia if he proved victorious. Myrtilus gave his master an old chariot, whose axle-tree broke on the course, which was from Pisa to the Corinthian isthmus, and Cenomæus was killed. Pelops married Hippodamia, and became king of Pisa. As he expired, Cenomæus entreated Pelops to revenge the perfidy of Myrtilus, which was executed. Those that had been defeated when Pelops entered the lists were Marmax, Alcatous, Euryalus, Eurymachus, Capētus, Lasius, Acrias, Chalcodon, Lycurgus, Tricolonus, Prias, Aristomachus, Æolius, Eurythrus, and Chronius. Apollod. 2, c. 4.—Diod. 4.—Paus. 5, c. 17, l. 6, e. 11, &c.—*Apollon. CENON, a part of Locris on the bay of Corinth.

CENŌNA, an ancient name of the island Ægina. It is also called Enopia. Herodot. 8, c. 46.—A town of Troas, the birth-place of the nymph Enone. Strab. 13.

CENŌNE, a nymph of Mount Ida, daughter of the river Cebrenas in Phrygia. As she had received the gift of prophecy, she foretold to Paris, whom she married before he was discovered to be the son of Priam, that his voyage to Greece would be attended with the most serious consequences, and the total ruin of his country, and that he should have recourse to her medicinal knowledge at the hour of death. All these predictions were fulfilled; and Paris, when he had received the fatal wound, ordered his body to be carried to Enone in hopes of being cured by her assistance. He expired as he came into her presence; and Enone was so struck at the sight of his dead body, that she bathed it with her tears, and stabbed herself to the heart. She was mother of Corythus, by Paris, and this son perished by the hand of his father when he attempted, at the instigation of Enone, to persuade him to withdraw his affection from Helen. *Dictys. CENŌPIA, one of the ancient names of the island Ægina. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 473.

CENŌPION, a son of Ariadne by Theseus, or, according to others, by Bacchus. He married Helice, by whom he had a daughter called Hero, or Merope, of whom the giant Orion became enamoured. The father, unwilling to give his daughter to such a lover, and afraid of provoking him by an open refusal, evaded his applications, and at last put out his eyes when he was intoxicated. Some suppose that this violence was offered to Orion after he had dishonoured Merope. Cenopion received the island of Chios from Rhadamantus, who had conquered most of the islands of the Ægean Sea, and his tomb was still seen there in the age of Pausanias. Some suppose, and with more probability, that he reigned not at Chios, but at Ægina, which from him was called Enopia. Plut. in Thes.—Apollod. 1, c. 4.—Apollon. Rhod. 3.

CENŌTRIA, the inhabitants of Enotri.

CENŌTRIA, a part of Italy which was afterwards called Lucania, [more properly a portion of the south-eastern coast.] It received this name from Cenotrus the son of Lycaon, who settled there with a colony of Arcadians. [This is incorrect; its name is to be derived from oivos, "wine," the early Greeks having called it Enotria, or "the wine-land," from the numerous vines which they found growing there.] The Enotrians afterwards spread themselves into Umbria and as far as Latium, and the country of the Sabines, according to some writers. The name of Enotria is sometimes applied to Italy. That part of Italy where Cenotrus settled was before inhabited by the Ausones. Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 11.—Paus. 1, c. 3.—*Virg. CENOTRIDES, two small islands on the coast of Lucania, where some of the Romans were banished by the emperors. They were called Pontia, Pandataria, and Enaria. [Pontia is now Ponza; Pandataria, Vento-tiene; and Enaria, Ischia.]

CENŌTRUS, a son of Lycaon and Arcadia. He passed into Magna Græcia with a colony, and gave the name of Enotria to that part of the country where he settled. [But see remarks under the article Enotria.] Dionys. Hal. 1, c. 11.—Paus. 1. c. 3.

ŒNŪS, a son of Licymnius, killed at Sparta, where he accompanied Hercules; and as the hero had promised Licymnius to bring back his son, he burnt his body, and presented the ashes to his afflicted father. From this circumstance arose a custom of burning the dead among the Greeks. [Eustathius assigns two reasons why the custom of burning corpses came to be of such general use in Greece; the first is because bodies were thought to be unclean after the soul's departure, and therefore were purified by fire; the second reason is, that the soul being separated from the gross and inactive matter, might be at liberty to take its flight to the heavenly mansions.] *Schol. ŒTA, now Bamina, a celebrated mountain between Thessaly and Phocis, upon which Hercules burnt himself. Its height has given occasion to the poets to feign that the sun, moon and stars rose behind it. Mount Œta, properly speaking, is a long chain of mountains which rose from the straits of Thermopylæ and the gulf of Malia, in a western direction, to Mount Pindus, and from thence to the bay of Ambracia. OGŸGES, a celebrated monarch, the most ancient of those that reigned in Greece. [vid. the end of this article.] He was son of Terra, or, as some suppose, of Neptune, and married Thebe the daughter of Jupiter. He reigned in Bœotia, which, from him, is sometimes called Ogygia, and his power was also extended over Attica. It is supposed that he was of Egyptian or Phœnician extraction; but his origin, as well as the age in which he lived, and the duration of his reign, are so obscure and unknown, that the epithet of Ogygian is often applied to every thing of dark antiquity. In the reign of Ogyges there was a deluge which so inundated the territories of Attica, that they remained waste for near 200 years. This, though it is very uncertain, is supposed to have happened about 1764 years before the Christian era, previous to the deluge of Deucalion. According to some writers, it was owing to the overflowing of one of the rivers of the country. The reign of Ogyges was also marked by an uncommon appearance in the heavens, and, as it is reported, the planet Venus changed her colour, diameter, figure, and her course. [The Parian marbles say nothing of the deluge of Ogyges, and that famous chronicle begins only with the arrival of Cecrops in Greece. According to Augustine, the deluge happened under Phoroneus the second king of Argos, and he alleges that this was the opinion of Eusebius and Jerome. Sir Isaac Newton, who has very much contracted the antiquities of Greece, places the date of this deluge in the year 1045, before the vulgar era. Banier places this event towards the year 1796 B. C. agreeably to the opinions of Petavius and Marsham. In Blair's tables, the reign of Ogyges in Attica is fixed in the year 1796 B. C. and his death in 1764 B. C. when the deluge happened. This deluge is said to have laid waste the country of Attica for 200 years, till the coming of Cecrops.] Varro de R. R. 3, c. 1.—Paus. 9, c. 5.—Aug. de Civ. D. 18, &c.

It was afterwards called Borysthenes and Miletopolis, because peopled by a Milesian colony, and is now supposed to be Oczakow. Olen afterwards retired to Delos, whither he transplanted the worship of Apollo and Diana, and the birth of which deities, in the country of the Hyperboreans, he celebrated in his hymns. He made the Greeks acquainted with Ilythia, a goddess of the north, who assisted Latona in her delivery. The recital of the odes of this ancient poet was accompanied with solemn shows and dances. [It was the only Municipium of Roman citizens in the province, and very probably owed its origin to that nation; for its having been founded by Ulysses is a mere fable, originating from an accidental coincidence of name. Strabo makes no mention of this place. His fancied Ulyssæa lay in a different quarter, in Bætica, on the mountains east of Malaca.] Mela, 3, c. 1.—Solinus, 23.

OLYMPIA, (orum), celebrated games which received their name either from Olympia where they were observed, or from Jupiter Olympius to whom they were dedicated. They were, according to some, instituted by Jupiter after his victory over the Titans, and first observed by the Idæi Dactyli, B. C. 1453. Some attribute the institution to Pelops, after he had obtained a victory over CEnomaus and married Hippodamia; but the more probable, and indeed the more received opinion is, that they were first established by Hercules in honour of Jupiter Olympius, after a victory obtained over Augeas, B. C. 1222. Strabo objects to this opinion, by observing, that if they had been established in the age of Homer the poet would have undoubtedly spoken of them, as he is in every particular careful to mention the amusements and diversions of the ancient Greeks. But they were neglected after their first institution by Hercules, and no notice was taken of them according to many writers, till Iphitus, in the age of the lawgiver of Sparta, renewed them, and instituted the celebration with greater solemnity. This reinstitution, which happened B. C. 884, forms a celebrated epoch in Grecian history, and is the beginning of the Olympiads. (vid. Olympias.) They, however, were neglected for sometime after the age of Iphitus, till Coræbus, who obtained a victory B. C. 776, reestablished them to be regularly and constantly celebrated. The care and superintendance of the games were intrusted to the people of Elis, till they were excluded by the Pisæans B. C. 364, after the destruction of Pisa. These obtained great privileges from this appointment; they were in danger neither of violence nor war, but they were permitted to enjoy their possessions without molestation, as the games were celebrated within their territories. Only one person superintended till the 50th Olympiad, when two were appointed. In the 103d Olympiad, the number was increased to twelve, according to the number of the tribes of Elis. But in the following Olympiad, they were reduced to eight, and afterwards increased to ten, which number continued till the reign of Adrian. The presidents were obliged solemnly to swear that they would act impartially, and not take any bribes, or discover why they rejected some of the combatants. They generally sat naked, and held before them the crown which was prepared for the conqueror. There were also certain officers to keep good order and regularity, called αλυταί, much the same as the Roman lictors, of whom the chief was called αλυταρχος. No women were permitted to appear at the celebration of the Olympian games, and whoever dared to trespass this law was immediately thrown down from a rock. This, however, was sometimes neglected; for we find not only women present at the celebration, but also some among the combatants, and some rewarded with the crown. The preparations for these festivals were great. No person was permitted to enter the lists if he had not regularly exercised himself ten months before the celebration at the public gymnasium of Elis. No unfair dealings were allowed, and whoever attempted to bribe his adversary was subjected to a severe fine. No criminals, nor such as were connected with impious and guilty persons, were suffered to present themselves as combatants: and even the father and relations were obliged to swear that they would have recourse to no artifice which might decide the victory in favour of their friends. The wrestlers were appointed by lot. Some little balls, superscribed with a letter, were thrown into a silver urn, and such as drew the same letter were obliged to contend one with the other. He who had an odd letter remained the last, and he often had the advantage, as he was to encounter the last who had obtained the superiority over his adversary. He was called εργος. In these games were exhibited running, leaping, wrestling, boxing, and the throwing of the quoit, which was called altogether πενταθλον, or quinguer-tium. Besides these, there were horse and chariot races, and also contentions in poetry, eloquence, and the fine arts. The only reward that the conqueror obtained was a crown of olive; which, as some suppose, was in memory of the labours of Hercules, which were accomplished for the universal good of mankind, and for which the hero claimed no other reward but the consciousness of having been the friend of humanity. So small and trifling a reward stimulated courage and virtue, and was more the source of great honours than the most unbounded treasures. The statues of the conquerors, called Olympionica, were erected at Olympia, in the sacred wood of Jupiter. Their return home was that of a warlike conqueror; they were drawn in a chariot by four horses, and every where received with the greatest acclamations. Their entrance into their native city was not through the gates, but, to make it more grand and more solemn, a breach was made in the walls. Painters and poets were employed in celebrating their names; and indeed the victories severally obtained at Olympia are the subjects of the most beautiful odes of Pindar. The combatants were naked; a scarf was originally tied round their waist, but when it had entangled one of the adversaries, and been the cause that he lost the victory, it was laid aside, and no regard was paid to decency. The Olympic games were observed every fifth year, or, to speak with greater exactness, after a revolution of four years, and in the first month of the fifth year, and they continued for five successive days. As they were the most ancient and the most solemn of all the festivals of the Greeks, it will not appear wonderful that they drew so many people together, not only inhabitants of Greece, but of the neighbouring islands and countries. *Pind. OLYMPIAS, a certain space of time which elapsed between the celebration of the Olympic games. [vid. note prefixed to the Chronological table.] The Olympic games were celebrated after the expiration of four complete years, whence some have said that they were observed every fifth year. This period of time was called Olympiad, and became a celebrated era among the Greeks, who computed their time by it. The custom of reckoning time by the celebration of the Olympic games was not introduced at the first institution of these festivals, but to speak accurately, only the year in which Coræbus obtained the prize. This Olympiad, which has always been reckoned the first, fell, according to the accurate and learned computations of some of the moderns, exactly 776 years before the Christian era, in the year of the Julian period 3938, and 23 years before the building of Rome. The games were exhibited at the time of the full moon next after the summer solstice; therefore the Olympiads were of unequal lengths, because the time of the full moon differs 11 days every year, and for that reason they sometimes began the next day after the solstice, and at other times four weeks after. The computations by Olympiads ceased, as some suppose, after the 364th, in the year 440 of the Christian era. It was universally adopted, not only by the Greeks, but by many of the neighbouring countries, though still the Pythian games served as an epoch to the people of Delphi and to the Bœotians, the Nemæan games to the Argives and Arcadians, and the Isthmian to the Corinthians and the inhabitants of the Peloponnesian isthmus. To the Olympiads history is much indebted. They have served to fix the time of many momentous events, and indeed, before this method of computing time was observed, every page of history is mostly fabulous, and filled with obscurity and contradiction, and no true chronological account can be properly established and maintained with certainty. The mode of computation which was used after the suppression of the Olympiads and of the consular fasti of Rome, was more useful as it was more universal; but while the era of the creation of the world prevailed in the east, the western nations in the 6th century began to adopt with more propriety the Christian epoch, which was propagated in the 8th century, and at last, in the 10th, became legal and popular.—A celebrated woman who was daughter of a king of Epirus, and who married Philip king of Macedonia, by whom she had Alexander the Great. Her haughtiness, and more probably her infidelity, obliged Philip to repudiate her, and to marry Cleopatra, the niece of king Attalus. Olympias was sensible of this injury, and Alexander showed his disapprobation of his father's measures by retiring from the court of his mother. The murder of Philip, which soon followed this disgrace, and which some have attributed to the intrigues of Olympias, was productive of the greatest extravagancies. The queen paid the highest honour to her husband's murderer. She gathered his mangled limbs, placed a crown of gold on his head, and laid his ashes near those of Philip. The administration of Alexander, who had succeeded his father, was, in some instances, offensive to Olympias; but when the ambition of her son was concerned, she did not scruple to declare publicly that Alexander was not the son of Philip, but that he was the offspring of an enormous serpent which had supernaturally introduced itself into her bed. When Alexander was dead, Olympias seized the government of Macedonia, and, to establish her usurpation, she cruelly put to death Aridaeus, with his wife Eurydice, as also Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, with one hundred leading men of Macedon, who were inimical to her interest. Such barbarities did not long remain unpunished; Cassander besieged her in Pydna, where she retired with the remains of her family, and she was obliged to surrender after an obstinate siege. The conqueror ordered her to be accused, and to be put to death. A body of 200 soldiers were directed to put the bloody commands into execution, but the splendour and majesty of the queen disarmed their courage, and she was at last massacred by those whom she had cruelly deprived of their children, about 316 years before the Christian era. Justin. 7, c. 6, l. 9, c. 7.—Plut. in Alex.—Curt.—Paus.—A fountain of Arcadia, which flowed for one year and the next was dry. Paus. 8, c. 29.

OLYMPIODORUS, [an Alexandrian philosopher who flourished about the year 430 B. C. He is celebrated for his knowledge of the Aristotelian doctrines, and was the master of Proclus who attended upon his school before he was 20 years of age. This philosopher is not to be confounded with a Platonist of the same name who wrote a commentary upon Plato. He is also to be distinguished from a Peripatetic, of a still later age, who wrote a commentary on the Meteorology of Aristotle. The works of this last were edited by Aldus, 1550, in fol.]

OLYMPIUS, a surname of Jupiter at Olympia, where the god had a celebrated temple and statue which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world. It was the work of Phidias. Paus. 7, c. 2.—A native of Carthage, called also Nemesianus. vid. Nemesianus.

OLYMPUS, [a famous musician, a native of Mysia, who lived before the Trojan war. He was the disciple of Marsyas. Plato, Aristophanes, and Aristotle cite his verses.]—[Another, a native of Phrygia, who lived in the time of Midas. Aristoxenus relates that he composed, in the Lydian mode, the air for the flute which expressed the funeral sorrows for the death of Python. To him likewise are ascribed the Cerulean, Minervan, and Spondean modes. Plutarch says that he was the first who introduced among the Greeks the knowledge of stringed instruments; and that he instituted the custom of celebrating with the flute, hymns to the polycephalic nome in honour of the gods. Plato says that his music inflamed his auditors; Aristotle, that it exalted the soul; and Plutarch, that it surpassed in simplicity all other music.]

—A famous mountain on the coast of Thessaly, north of the mouth of the Peneas. The ancients supposed that it touched the heavens with its top; and from that circumstance they have placed the residence of the gods there, and have made it the court of Jupiter. It is about one mile and a half in perpendicular height, and is covered with pleasant woods, caves, and grottos. On the top of the mountain, according to the notions of the poets, there was neither wind nor rain, nor clouds, but an eternal spring. [Sonnini has particularly described his ascent to the summit of this mountain. Near the top he encountered large quantities of snow, and at last came to a part where the mountain became bare of all vegetation, and presented only a cap of snow and ice, on which it was impossible to be sustained or to walk. At this time it was the middle of July; the heat was extreme towards the base of the mountain as well as in the plain, while the masses of snow near its summit gave no signs of melting. The view from the highest accessible part of Olympus is described as being very extensive and grand. The mountain seemed to touch Pelion and Ossa, and the vale of Tempe appeared only a narrow gorge, while the Peneus was scarcely perceptible. There are hardly any quadrupeds to be seen beyond the half height of Olympus, and scarcely do even birds pass this limit.] Homer. Il. 1, &c.—Virg. Æn. 2, 6, &c.—*Ovid. OLYNTHUS, a celebrated town and republic of Macedonia, [in the district Chalcidice, north of the peninsula of Pallene, and at the head of the Sinus Toronæus or Gulf of Cassandria. It became famous for its flourishing situation, and for its being the scene of so many contests between the Athenians and king Philip, who destroyed it, and sold the inhabitants for slaves. OMBOS, [a city of Egypt a little north of Syene. Its position is now found in the name of Koum-Ombo, or "the hill of Ombo." Between the inhabitants of this place and Tentyra constant hostilities prevailed, the former adoring, the latter killing, the crocodile. A horrible instance of religious fury, which took place in consequence of their mutual discord, is the subject of the 15th satire of Juvenal.] Juv. 15, v. 35.

OMÔLE or HOMÔLE, a mountain of Thessaly. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 675.—There were some festivals called Homoleia, which were celebrated in Bœotia in honour of Jupiter, surnamed Homoleius.

OMOPHAGIA, a festival in honour of Bacchus. The word signifies the eating of raw flesh. vid. Dionysia.

OMPĦALE, a queen of Lydia, daughter of Jardaŋus. She married Tmolus, who, at his death left her mistress of his kingdom. Omphale had been informed of the great exploits of Hercules, and wished to see so illustrious a hero. Her wish was soon gratified. After the murder of Eurytus, Hercules fell sick, and was ordered to be sold as a slave, that he might recover his health and the right use of his senses. Mercury was commissioned to sell him, and Omphale bought him, and restored him to liberty. The hero became enamoured of his mistress, and the queen favoured his passion, and had a son by him, whom some call Agelaus, and others, Lamou. From this son were descended Gyges and Croesus; but this opinion is different from the account which make these Lydian monarchs spring from Alcæus, a son of Hercules, by Malis, one of the female servants of Omphale. Hercules is represented by the poets as so desperately enamoured of the queen, that, to conciliate her esteem, he spins by her side among her women, while she covers herself with the lion's skin, and arms herself with the club of the hero, and often strikes him with her sandals for the uncouth manner with which he holds the distaff, &c. Their fondness was mutual. As they once travelled together, they came to a grotto on Mount Tmolus, where the queen dressed herself in the habit of her lover, and obliged him to appear in a female garment. After they had supped, they both retired to rest in different rooms, as a sacrifice on the morrow to Bacchus required. In the night, Faunus, or rather Pan, who was enamoured of Omphale, introduced himself into the cave. He went to the bed of the queen, but the lion's skin persuaded him that it was the dress of Hercules, and therefore he repaired to the bed of Hercules, in hopes to find there the object of his affection. The female dress of Hercules deceived him, and he laid himself down by his side. The hero was awaked, and kicked the intruder into the middle of the cave. The noise awoke Omphale, and Faunus was discovered lying on the ground, greatly disappointed and ashamed. *Ovid. OMPĦALOS, a place of Crete, sacred to Jupiter, on the border of the river Triton. It received its name from the umbilical chord (ομφαλος) of Jupiter which fell there soon after his birth. Diod.

ONĦRUS, a priest of Bacchus, who is supposed to have married Ariadne after she had been abandoned by Theseus. Plut. in Thes.

ONĦSĦMUS, a sophist of Athens, who flourished in the reign of Constantine.

ONCHEMĦTES, a wind which blows from Onchesmus, a harbour of Epirus, towards Italy. The word is sometimes spelt Anchesites and Anchemites. Cic. ad Attic. 7, ep. 2.—Ptolemæus.

ONCHESTUS, a town of Bœotia, founded by Onchestus, a son of Neptune.—[A river of Thessaly flowing into the northern extremity of the Sinus Pelasgius, and passing, in a part of its course, through the lake Bœbeis.] Paus. 9, c. 26.

ONESICRĦTUS, a cynic philosopher of Ægina, who went with Alexander into Asia, and was sent to the Indian Gymnosophists. He wrote an history of the king's life, which has been censured for the romantic, exaggerated, and improbable narrative it gives. It is asserted, that Alexander upon reading it, said, that he should be glad to come to life again for some time to see what reception the historian's work met with. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 9, c. 10.

ONESĦMUS, a Macedonian nobleman treated with great kindness by the Roman emperors. He wrote an account of the life of the emperor Probus and of Carus, with great precision and elegance.

[ONĦON, a city of Egypt, south-west of Heroopolis. It was inhabited by Jews, who had a temple here, which continued from the time of Onias, who built it, to that of Vespasian. Onias was nephew to Menelaus, and the rightful successor to the priesthood at Jerusalem; but being rejected by Antiochus Eupator, who made Alcimus high-priest, he fled to Egypt and persuaded Ptolemy Philometer to let him build this temple there, about 173 B. C. which subsisted 243 years.]

ONOMACRĦTUS, a soothsayer of Athens. It is generally believed that the Greek poem on the Argonautic expedition, attributed to Orpheus, was written by Onomacritus. The elegant poems of Musæus are also, by some, supposed to be the production of his pen. [Mention has been already made of the interpolations of Onomacritus in the article Musæus. The oracles of this latter poet were collected by Onomacritus, in compliance with the orders of Hipparchus; but the poet Lasus of Hermione having discovered the fraud committed by him in intermingling his own productions among the ancient predictions, Onomacritus was thereupon driven into exile as an impostor by Hipparchus. It appears that from this time it was no longer possible to distinguish what was genuine in the poetry of Musæus from what was mere interpolation.] *Herodot. 7, c. 6.—A Locrion, who wrote concerning laws, &c. ONOMĦRCHUS, a Phocian, son of Euthycrates, and brother of Philomelus, whom he succeeded, as general of his countrymen, in the sacred war. After exploits of valour and perseverance, he was defeated and slain in Thessaly by Philip of Macedon, who ordered his body to be ignominiously hung up for the sacrilege offered to the temple of Delphi. He died 353 B. C. Aristot. Pol. 5, c. 4.—Diod. 16.

ONOSANDER, [a Greek author and Platonic philosopher. Concerning the period in which he flourished, nothing more can be ascertained than that he lived about the middle of the first century. He was the author of a work of much celebrity, entitled Στρατηγικὸς λόγος, being a treatise on the duties of a general. This production is the source, whence all the works on this subject, in Greek and Latin, that were subsequently published, derived their origin. It is still held in estimation by military men. The best editions are, that of Schwebel, Norimb. 1752. fol. and that of Coray, Paris, 1822, 8vo. Appended to the latter are the first elegy of Tyrtæus and a translation of Onosander, both in French. Coray writes the name Onesander. The profits of his edition were given to the unfortunate sufferers of Chios.]

OPALIA, festivals celebrated by the Romans in honour of Ops, on the 14th of the calends of January.

OPHIÆDES, an island on the coast of Arabia, so called from the great number of serpents found there. It belonged to the Egyptian kings, and was considered valuable for the topaz it produced. Diod. 3.

OPHIAS, a patronymic given to Combe, as daughter of Ophius, an unknown person. Ovid. Met. 7, v. 332.

OPHIONEUS, was an ancient soothsayer in the age of Aristodemus. He was born blind.

OPHIS, a small river of Arcadia which falls in the Alpheus.

OPHIÛSA, the ancient name of Rhodes.—A small island near Crete.—A town of Sarmatia.—An island near the Baleares, so called from the number of serpents which it produced (οφίς, serpens). It is now called Formentera.

OPICI, the ancient inhabitants of Campania, from whose mean occupations the word Opicus has been used to express disgrace. [According to Festus, Opicus and Oscus were precisely equivalent, and belonged as appellations to one and the same people. vid. Oscii.] Juv. 3, v. 207.

OPILIUS, a grammarian who flourished about 94 years before Christ. He wrote a work called Libri Musarum.

[OPIMA SPOLIA, spoils taken by a Roman general from a general of the enemy whom he had slain. They were dedicated and suspended in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius. These spoils were obtained only thrice before the fall of the republic. The first by Romulus, who slew Acron, king of the Cæninenses; the next by A. Cornelius Cossus, who slew Lar Tolumnius, king of the Veientes, A. U. C. 318; and the third by M. Claudius Marcellus, who slew Viridomærus, a king of the Gauls, A. U. C. 530.]

L. OPIMIUS, a Roman who made himself consul in opposition to the interest and efforts of the Gracchi. He showed himself a most inveterate enemy to C. Gracchus and his adherents, and behaved, during his consulship, like a dictator. [Caius Gracchus perished by means of the consul Opimius, who slaughtered a great number of the plebeians on that occasion.] He was accused of bribery, and banished. He died of want at Dyrrachium.

[During the consulship of Opimius the heat of the summer was so great as to produce an extraordinary fertility and excellence in all the fruits of the earth throughout Italy. Hence the Opimian wine became famous to a late period. vid. Falernus.] Cic. pro Sext. Plan. & in Pis.—Plut.

OPIS, a town on the Tigris, afterwards called Antiochia. Xenoph. Anab. 2.

OPITERGÏNI, a people near Aquileia, on the Adriatic. Their chief city is called Opitergum, now Oderso. Lucan. 4, v. 416.

OPPIA LEX, by C. Oppius the tribune, A. U. C. 540. It required that no woman should wear above half an ounce of gold, have party-coloured garments, be carried in any city or town, or to any place within a mile's distance, unless it was to celebrate some sacred festivals or solemnities. This famous law, which was made while Annibal was in Italy, and while Rome was in distressed circumstances, created discontent, and, 18 years after, the Roman ladies petitioned the assembly of the people that it might be repealed. Cato opposed it strongly, and made many satirical reflections upon the women for their appearing in public to solicit votes. The tribune Valerius, who had presented their petition to the assembly, answered the objections of Cato, and his eloquence had such an influence on the minds of the people, that the law was instantly abrogated with the unanimous consent of all the comitia, Cato alone excepted. Liv. 33 and 34.—Cic. de Orat. 3.

OPPIANUS, a Greek poet of Anazarbus in Cilicia, in the second century. His father's name was Agesilaus, and his mother's Zenodota. He wrote some poems celebrated for their elegance and sublimity. Two of his poems are now extant, five books on fishing, halæuticon, and four on hunting, called cynægeticon. [vid. the end of this article.] The emperor Caracalla was so pleased with his poetry that he gave him a piece of gold for every verse of his cynægeticon; from which circumstance the poem received the name of the golden verses of Oppian. The poet died of the plague in the 30th year of his age. His countrymen raised statues to his honour, and engraved on his tomb, that the gods had hastened to call back Oppian to the flower of youth, only because he had already excelled all mankind. [The best edition of his works is that of Schneider, 8vo. Argent. 1813. It is probable that there were two poets of this name; one of Corycus or Anazarbus in Cilicia, and the other of Apamea in Syria; and that the first flourished towards the end of the second century, the other at the beginning of the third. The Cilician will be the author of the poem on fishing, the Syrian of that on hunting. Athenæus makes mention of Oppian as a writer who lived a short time before him; he calls him a Cilician. A passage of the poem on fishing indicates the same origin. As to the author of the poem on hunting, he tells us in two places, that his natal city was situate in Syria, on the river Orontes. The former of these poems is much superior to the other, both in the instructive nature of its details, and in the purity and elegance of its style. Schneider supposes that the two Oppians were either father and son, or uncle and nephew, making them contemporaries.]

C. OPIUS, a friend of Julius Cæsar, celebrated for his life of Scipio Africanus, and of Pompey the Great. In the latter, he paid not much regard to historical facts, and took every opportunity to defame Pompey, and extol the character of his patron Cæsar. In the age of Suetonius, he was deemed the true author of the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish wars, which some attribute to Cæsar, and others to A. Hirtius. Tacit. Ann. 12.—Suet. in Cæs. 53.

Ops, (opis) the daughter of Cælus and Terra, the same as the Rhea of the Greeks, who married Saturn, and became mother of Jupiter. She was known among the ancients by the different names of Cybele, Bona Dea, Magna Mater, Thya, Tellus, Proserpina, and even of Juno and Minerva; and the worship which was paid to these apparently several deities was offered merely to one and the same person, mother of the gods. The word Ops seems to be derived from Opus; because the goddess, who is the same as the earth, gives nothing without labour. Tatius built her a temple at Rome. She was generally represented as a matron, with her right hand opened, as if offering assistance to the helpless, and holding a loaf in her left hand. Her festivals were called Opalia, &c. Varro de L. L. 4.—Dionys. Hal. 2, &c.—Tibull. el. 4, v. 68.—Plin. 19, c. 6.

OPTATUS, one of the fathers whose works were edited by Du Pin, fol. Paris, 1700.

OPTIMUS MAXIMUS, epithets given to Jupiter to denote his greatness, omnipotence, and supreme goodness. [They are usually expressed by the capitals O. M.] Cic. de N. D. 2, c. 25.

OPUS, (opuntis) [the capital of the Locri Opuntii. It was situate near the shores of the Opuntius Sinus, opposite to the island of Eubœa.] Strab. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Liv. 28, c. 7.

ORACULUM, an answer of the gods to the questions of men, or the place where those answers were given. Nothing is more famous than the ancient oracles of Egypt, Greece, Rome, &c. They were supposed to be the will of the gods themselves, and they were consulted, not only upon every important matter, but even in the affairs of private life. To make peace or war, to introduce a change of government, to plant a colony, to enact laws, to raise an edifice, to marry, were sufficient reasons to consult the will of the gods. Mankind, in consulting them, showed that they wished to pay implicit obedience to the command of the divinity, and, when they had been favoured with an answer, they acted with more spirit and with more vigour, conscious that the undertaking had met with the sanction and approbation of heaven. In this, therefore, it will not appear wonderful that so many places were sacred to oracular purposes. The small province of Bœotia could once boast of her 25 oracles, and Peloponnesus of the same number. Not only the chief of the gods gave oracles, but, in process of time, heroes were admitted to enjoy the same privileges; and the oracles of a Trophonius and an Antinous were soon able to rival the fame of Apollo and of Jupiter. The most celebrated oracles of antiquity were those of Dodona, Delphi, Jupiter Ammon, &c. [vid. Dodona, Delphi, Ammon.] The temple of Delphi seemed to claim a superiority over the other temples; its fame was once more extended, and its riches were so great, that not only private persons, but even kings and numerous armies, made it an object of plunder and of rapine. The manner of delivering oracles was different. A priestess at Delphi, [vid. Pythia] was permitted to pronounce the oracles of the god, and her delivery of the answers was always attended with acts of apparent madness and desperate fury. Not only women, but even doves, were the ministers of the temple of Dodona, and the suppliant votary was often startled to hear his questions readily answered by the decayed trunk, or the spreading branches of a neighbouring oak. Ammon conveyed his answers in a plain and open manner; but Amphiaraus required many ablutions and preparatory ceremonies, and he generally communicated his oracles to his suppliants in dreams and visions. Sometimes the first words that were heard, after issuing from the temple, were deemed the answers of the oracles, and sometimes the nodding or shaking of the head of the statue, the motion of fishes in a neighbouring lake, or their reluctance in accepting the food which was offered to them, were as strong and valid as the most express and the minutest explanations. The answers were also sometimes given in verse, or written on tablets, but their meaning was always obscure, and often the cause of disaster to such as consulted them. Cræsus, when he consulted the oracle of Delphi, was told that if he crossed the Halys he should destroy a great empire; he supposed that that empire was the empire of his enemy, but unfortunately it was his own. The words of Creto de te, Æcidea, Romanos vincere posse, which Pyrrhus received when he wished to assist the Tarentines against the Romans, by a favourable interpretation for himself, proved his ruin. Nero was ordered by the oracle of Delphi to beware of 73 years; but the pleasing idea that he should live to that age rendered him careless, and he was soon convinced of his mistake, when Galba, in his 73d year, had the presumption to dethrone him. It is a question among the learned, whether the oracles were given by the inspiration of evil spirits, or whether they proceeded from the imposture of the priests. [vid. the end of this article.] Imposture, however, and forgery, cannot long flourish, and falsehood becomes its own destroyer; and, on the contrary, it is well known how much confidence an enlightened age, therefore, much more the credulous and the superstitious, places upon dreams and romantic stories. Some have strongly believed that all the oracles of the earth ceased at the birth of Christ, but the supposition is false. It was, indeed, the beginning of their decline, but they remained in repute, and were consulted, though, perhaps, not so frequently, till the fourth century, when Christianity began to triumph over paganism. [vid. the end of this article.] The oracles often suffered themselves to be bribed. Alexander did it, but it is well known that Lysander failed in the attempt. Herodotus, who first mentioned the corruption which often prevailed in the oracular temples of Greece and Egypt has been severely treated for his remarks by the historian Plutarch. Demosthenes is also a witness of the corruption, and he observed, that the oracles of Greece were servilely subservient to the will and pleasure of Philip, king of Macedonia, as he beautifully expresses it by the word φιλιππιζου. If some of the Greeks, and other European and Asiatic countries, paid so much attention to oracles, and were so fully persuaded of their veracity, and even divinity, many of their leading men and of their philosophers were apprised of the deceit, and paid no regard to the command of priests whom money could corrupt, and interposition silence. The Egyptians showed themselves the most superstitious of mankind, by their blind acquiescence to the imposition of the priests, who persuaded them that the safety and happiness of their life depended upon the mere motions of an ox, or the tameness of a crocodile. [Bishop Sherlock, in his discourses concerning the use and intent of prophecy, expresses his opinion that it is impious to disbelieve the heathen oracles, and to deny them to have been given out by the devil; to which assertion Dr. Middleton, in his "Examination," &c. replies, that he is guilty of this impiety, and that he thinks himself warranted to pronounce, from the authority of the best and wisest heathens, and the evidence of these oracles, as well as from the nature of the thing itself, that they were all a mere imposture, wholly invented and supported by human craft, without any supernatural aid or interposition whatever. He adds, that Eusebius declares that there were 600 writers among the heathens themselves who had publicly written against the reality of them. Although the primitive fathers constantly affirmed them to be the real effects of a supernatural power, and given out by the devil, yet M. de Fontenelle maintains, that while they preferred this way of combating the authority of the oracles, as most commodious to themselves and the state of the controversy between them and the heathens, yet they believed them at the same time to be nothing else but the effects of human fraud and contrivance; which he has illustrated by the examples of Clemens of Alexandria, Origen, and Eusebius. That the oracles were silenced about the time of our Saviour's advent may be proved, says Dr. Leland, from express testimonies, not only of Christians, but even of heathens themselves. Lucan, who wrote his Pharsalia in the reign of Nero, scarcely thirty years after our Lord's crucifixion, laments it as one of the greatest misfortunes of the age that the Delphic oracle was become silent. Juvenal also alludes to its silence. Lucan. Phars. 5, v. 3.—Juv. Sat. 6, v. 541.]—*Homer. Il. ORÆA, certain solemn sacrifices of fruits offered in the four seasons of the year to obtain mild and temperate weather. They were offered to the goddesses who presided over the seasons, who attended upon the sun, and who received divine worship at Athens.

ORATES, a river of European Scythia. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, el. 10, v. 47. As this river is not now known, Vossius reads Crates, a river which is found in Scythia. [Isaac Vossius does not read Crates, but Cales. Burmann adopts Crates in his edition.] Val. Flacc. 4, v. 719.—Thucyd. 4.

ORBILIUS PUPILLUS, a grammarian of Beneventum, who was the first instructor of the poet Horace. He came to Rome in the consulship of Cicero, and there, as a public teacher, acquired more fame than money. He was naturally of a severe disposition, of which his pupils often felt the effects. He lived almost to his 100th year, and lost his memory some time before his death. Suet. de Illust. Gr. 9.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 71.

ORBONA, a mischievous goddess at Rome, who, as it was supposed, made children die. Her temple at Rome was near that of the gods Lares. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 25.—Plin. 2, c. 7.

ORCÆDES, islands on the northern coasts of Britain, now called the Orkneys. They were unknown till Britain was discovered to be an island by Agricola. [From the force of the ocean, the form of the Orkney islands, as may be supposed, is extremely irregular. Their size, also, varies greatly, some of them being mere isolated rocks, incapable of human habitation, while others are several miles in circumference. According to the most accurate surveys they are 67 in number, of which 28 are inhabited. The period at which these islands were first known is uncertain; they were probably discovered by the Carthaginians several centuries before the Christian era.] Tacit. in Agric.—Juv. 2, v. 161.

ORCHIA LEX, by Orchius the tribune, A. U. C. 566. It was enacted to limit the number of guests that were to be admitted at an entertainment; and it also enforced, that during supper, which was the chief meal among the Romans, the doors of every house should be left open.

ORCHOMENUS or ORCHOMENUM, a town of Bœotia, at the west of the lake Copais. It was anciently called Minyeia, and from that circumstance the inhabitants were often called Minyans of Orchomenos. There was at Orchomenos a celebrated temple, built by Eteocles son of Cephisus, sacred to the Graces, who were from thence called the Orchomenian goddesses. The inhabitants founded Teos in conjunction with the Ionians, under the sons of Codrus. Plin. 4, c. 8.—Herodot. 1, c. 146.—Paus. 9, c. 37.—Strab. 9.—A town of Arcadia, at the north of Mantinea. Homer. Il. 2.—A town of Thessaly, with a river of the same name. Strab.—A son of Lycaon, king of Arcadia, who gave his name to a city of Arcadia, &c. Paus. 8.—A son of Minyas, king of Bœotia, who gave the name of Orchomenians to his subjects. He died without issue, and the crown devolved to Clymenus, the son of Presbon, &c. Paus. 9, c. 36.

ORCUS, one of the names of the god of hell, the same as Pluto, though confounded by some with Charon. He had a temple at Rome. The word Orcus is generally used to signify the infernal regions. Horat. 1, od. 29, &c.—Virg. Æn. 4, v. 592, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 116, &c.

ORDOVICES, the people of North Wales in Britain, mentioned by Tacit. Ann. 12, c. 53. [It was probably owing to the nature of their country and to the vicinity of Deva, now Chester, where a whole Roman legion was quartered, that the Romans had so few towns and stations among the Ordovices. *Mediomani*um was their capital, and was probably situated at Maywood, or Meifud, in Montgomeryshire.]

ORÉADES, nymphs of the mountains (ορεες, mons), daughters of Phoroneus and Hecate. Some call them Orestiades, and give them Jupiter for father. They generally attended upon Diana, and accompanied her in hunting. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 504.—Homer. Il. 6.—Strab. 10.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 737.

ORESTÆ, a people of Epirus. They received their name from Orestes, who fled to Epirus when cured of his insanity. Lucan. 3, v. 249.

ORESTES, a son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When his father was cruelly murdered by Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, young Orestes was saved from his mother's dagger by means of his sister Electra, called Laodicea by Homer, and he was privately conveyed to the house of Strophius, who was king of Phocis, and who had married a sister of Agamemnon. He was tenderly treated by Strophius, who educated him with his son Pylades. The two young princes soon became acquainted, and, from their familiarity arose the most inviolable attachment and friendship. When Orestes was arrived to years of manhood, he visited Mycenæ, and avenged his father's death by assassinating his mother Clytemnestra, and her adulterer Ægisthus. The manner in which he committed this murder is variously reported. According to Æschylus, he was commissioned by Apollo to avenge his father, and therefore, he introduced himself, with his friend Pylades, at the court of Mycenæ, pretending to bring the news of the death of

Orestes from king Strophius. He was at first received with coldness; and when he came into the presence of Ægisthus, who wished to inform himself of the particulars, he murdered him, and soon Clytemnestra shared the adulterer's fate. Euripides and Sophocles mention the same circumstances. Ægisthus was assassinated after Clytemnestra, according to Sophocles; and, in Euripides, Orestes is represented as murdering the adulterer while he offers a sacrifice to the nymphs. This murder, as the poet mentions, irritates the guards who were present, but Orestes appeases their fury by telling them who he is, and immediately he is acknowledged king of the country. Afterwards he stabs his mother, at the instigation of his sister Electra, after he has upbraided her for her infidelity and cruelty to her husband. Such meditated murders receive the punishment which, among the ancients, was always supposed to attend parricide. Orestes is tormented by the Furies, and exiles himself to Argos, where he is still pursued by the avengeful goddesses. Apollo himself purifies him, and he is acquitted by the unanimous opinion of the Areopagites, whom Minerva herself instituted on this occasion, according to the narration of the poet Æschylus, who flatters the Athenians in his tragical story, by representing them as passing judgment, even upon the gods themselves. According to Pausanias, Orestes was purified of the murder, not at Delphi, but at Trœzene, where still was seen a large stone at the entrance of Diana's temple, upon which the ceremonies of purification had been performed by nine of the principal citizens of the place. There was also, at Megalopolis in Arcadia, a temple dedicated to the Furies, near which Orestes cut off one of his fingers with his teeth in a fit of insanity. These different traditions are confuted by Euripides, who says, that Orestes, after the murder of his mother, consulted the oracle of Apollo at Delphi, where he was informed that nothing could deliver him from the persecutions of the Furies, if he did not bring into Greece Diana's statue, which was in the Taurica Chersonesus, and which, as it is reported by some, had fallen down from heaven. This was an arduous enterprise. The king of Chersonesus always sacrificed on the altars of the goddess all such as entered the borders of his country. Orestes and his friend were both carried before Thoas, the king of the place, and they were doomed to be sacrificed. Iphigenia was then priestess of Diana's temple, and it was her office to immolate these strangers. The intelligence that they were Grecians delayed the preparations, and Iphigenia was anxious to learn something about a country which had given her birth. [vid. Iphigenia.] She even interested herself in their misfortunes, and offered to spare the life of one of them, provided he would convey letters to Greece from her hand. This was a difficult trial; never was friendship more truly displayed, according to the words of Ovid, ex Pont. 3, el. 2.

Ire jubet Pylades carum moriturus Orestem, Hic negat; inque vicem pugnat uterque mori. At last Pylades gave way to the pressing entreaties of his friend, and consented to carry the letters of Iphigenia to Greece. These were addressed to Orestes himself, and therefore, these circumstances soon led to a total discovery of the connections of the priestess with the man whom she was going to immolate. Iphigenia was convinced that he was her brother Orestes, and, when the causes of their journey had been explained, she resolved, with the two friends, to fly from Chersonesus, and to carry away the statue of Diana. Their flight was discovered, and Thoas prepared to pursue them; but Minerva interfered, and told him, that all had been done by the will and approbation of the gods. Some suppose that Orestes came to Cappadocia from Chersonesus, and that there he left the statue of Diana at Comana. Others contradict this tradition, and, according to Pausanias, the statue of Diana Orthia was the same as that which had been carried away from the Chersonesus. Some also suppose that Orestes brought it to Aricia, in Italy, where Diana's worship was established. After these celebrated adventures, Orestes ascended the throne of Argos, where he reigned in perfect security, and married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and gave his sister to his friend Pylades. The marriage of Orestes with Hermione is a matter of dispute among the ancients. All are agreed that she had been promised to the son of Agamemnon, but Menelaus had married her to Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles, who had shown himself so truly interested in his cause during the Trojan war. The marriage of Hermione with Neoptolemus displeased Orestes; he remembered that she had been early promised to him, and therefore he resolved to recover her by force or artifice. This he effected by causing Neoptolemus to be assassinated, or assassinating him himself. According to Ovid's epistle of Hermione to Orestes, Hermione had always been faithful to her first lover; and even it was by her persuasions that Orestes removed her from the house of Neoptolemus. Hermione was dissatisfied with the partiality of Neoptolemus for Andromache, and her attachment for Orestes was increased. Euripides, however, and others, speak differently of Hermione's attachment to Neoptolemus: she loved him so tenderly, that she resolved to murder Andromache, who seemed to share, in a small degree, the affections of her husband. She was ready to perpetrate the horrid deed when Orestes came into Epirus, and she was easily persuaded by the foreign prince to withdraw herself, in her husband's absence, from a country which seemed to contribute so much to her sorrows. Orestes, the better to secure the affections of Hermione, assassinated Neoptolemus, (vid. Neoptolemus,) and retired to his kingdom of Argos. His old age was crowned with peace and security, and he died in the 90th year of his age, leaving his throne to his son Tisamenus by Hermione. Three years after, the Heraclidæ recovered the Peloponnesus, and banished the descendants of Menelaus from the throne of Argos. Orestes died in Arcadia, as some suppose, by the bite of a serpent; and the Lacedæmonians, who had become his subjects at the death of Menelaus, were directed by an oracle to bring his bones to Sparta. They were, some time after, discovered at Tegea, and his stature appeared to be seven cubits, according to the traditions mentioned by Herodotus and others. The friendship of Orestes and of Pylades became proverbial, and the two friends received divine honours among the Scythians, and were worshipped in temples. Paus. 1, 2, 4, &c.—Paterc. 1, c. 1 and 3.—Apollod. 1, &c.—Strab. 9 and 13.—*Ovid. ORESTEUM, a town of Arcadia. It was founded by Orestes, a son of Lycaon, and originally called Oresthesium, and afterwards Oresteum, from Orestes, the son of Agamemnon, who resided there for some time after the murder of Clytemnestra. Paus. 8, c. 8.—Euripid.

[ORESTĪAS, the primitive name of Adriapolis, in Thrace, and which the Byzantine authors frequently employ in speaking of that city. The name is derived from the circumstance of Orestes having purified himself on this spot, after the murder of his mother: Three rivers had here their confluence, the Hebrus receiving the Ardiscus, or Arda, on one side, and the Tonsus or Tonza on the other.]

ORESTIDÆ, the descendants or subjects of Orestes, the son of Agamemnon. They were driven from the Peloponnesus by the Heraclidæ, and came to settle in a country which, from them, was called Orestidæ, at the southwest of Macedonia. Some suppose that that part of Greece originally received its name from Orestes, who fled and built there a city, which gave its founder's name to the whole province. Thucyd. 2.—Liv. 31.

ORIBÁSUS, a celebrated physician [born at Pergamus, or, as some have asserted, at Sardis.] He was greatly esteemed by the emperor Julian, in whose reign he flourished. He abridged the works of Galen, and of all the most respectable writers on physic, at the request of the emperor. [This work was in seventy, or, according to Suidas, seventy-two, books. Of these there remain only the first fifteen, together with two others, which are called by Rasarius his translator, the 24th and 25th, and which treat of anatomy.] He accompanied Julian into the east, but his skill proved ineffectual in attempting to cure the fatal wound which his benefactor had received. [After Julian's death, he became an object of persecution, and was sent into banishment among the barbarians, by Valentinian the 2d. His department and great professional skill gained him the respect and veneration of this rude people, among whom he was adored as a tutelary god. He was at length, however, recalled to court and restored to public favour.] The best edition of his works is that of Dundas, 4to. L. ORICUM or ORICUS, a town of Epirus, on the Ionian Sea, founded by a colony from Colchis according to Pliny. It was called Dardania, because Helenus, and Andromache, natives of Troy or Dardania reigned over the country after the Trojan war. It had a celebrated harbour, and was greatly esteemed by the Romans on account of its situation, but it was not well defended. The tree which produces the turpentine grew there in abundance. *Virg. ORIENS, in ancient geography, is taken for all the most eastern parts of the world, such as Parthia, India, Assyria, &c.

ORIGEN, a Greek writer, as much celebrated for the easiness of his manner, his humility, and modesty, as for his learning and the sublimity of his genius. [He was surnamed Adamantinus, either from his indefatigable application to study, or the incredible firmness with which he endured the persecutions to which his profession of Christianity exposed him. Porphyry supposes him to have been born of heathen parents, and educated in their religious principles; but Eusebius, who wrote his life, has shown most conclusively that his parents were Christians, and took the greatest possible care of his education.] He became so rigid a Christian that he made himself an eunuch, by following the literal sense of a passage in the Greek testament, which speaks of the voluntary eunuchs of Christ. [He was afterwards satisfied of his error, and publicly confuted in his writings the literal interpretation of this text, in such a manner as to show that he condemned himself. During the Decian persecution in the year 250, he underwent great suffering. From his own letter, however, it appears that he survived this persecution, and afforded arguments for consolation to others who might be placed in similar circumstances. He died, and was buried, at Tyre, in the 70th year of his age, A. D. 254.] His works were excellent and numerous, and contained a number of homilies, commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, and different treatises, besides the Hexapla, so called from its being divided into six columns, the first of which contained the Hebrew text, the second the same text in Greek characters, the third the Greek version of the Septuagint, the fourth that of Aquila, the fifth that of Symmachus, and the sixth Theodosian's Greek version. This famous work first gave the hint for the compilation of our Polyglot Bibles. The works of Origen have been learnedly edited by the Benedictine monks, though the whole is not yet completed, in four vols. fol. Paris, 1733, 1740, and 1759. The Hexapla was published in 8vo. at Lips. 1769, by Car. Frid. Bahrtdt.

ORION, a celebrated giant sprung from the urine of Jupiter, Neptune, and Mercury, [vid. the end of this article.] These three gods, as they travelled over Bœotia, met with great hospitality from Hyrieus, a peasant of the country, who was ignorant of their dignity and character. They were entertained with whatever the cottage afforded, and, when Hyrieus had discovered that they were gods, because Neptune told him to fill up Jupiter's cup with wine, after he had served it before the rest, the old man welcomed them by the voluntary sacrifice of an ox. Pleased with his piety, the gods promised to grant him whatever he required, and the old man, who had lately lost his wife, to whom he had promised never to marry again, desired them that, as he was childless, they would give him a son without another marriage. The gods consented, and they ordered him to bury in the ground the skin of the victim, into which they had all three made water. Hyrieus did as they commanded, and when nine months after he dug for the skin, he found in it a beautiful child, whom he called Urion, ab urinâ. The name was changed into Orion by the corruption of one letter, as Ovid says, Perdidit antiquum littera prima sonum. Orion soon rendered himself celebrated, and Diana took him among her attendants and even became deeply enamoured of him. His gigantic stature, however, displeased Cœnopion, king of Chios, whose daughter Hero or Merope he demanded in marriage. The king, not to deny him openly, promised to make him his son-in-law as soon as he delivered his island from wild beasts. This task, which Cœnopion deemed impracticable, was soon performed by Orion, who eagerly demanded his reward. Œnopion, on pretence of complying, intoxicated his illustrious guest and put out his eyes on the sea-shore, where he had laid himself down to sleep. Orion, finding himself blind when he awoke, was conducted by the sound to a neighbouring forge, where he placed one of the workmen on his back, and, by his directions, went to a place where the rising sun was seen with the greatest advantage. Here he turned his face towards the luminary, and, as it is reported, he immediately recovered his eye-sight, and hastened to punish the perfidious cruelty of Œnopion. It is said that Orion was an excellent workman in iron; and that he fabricated a subterraneous palace for Vulcan. Aurora, whom Venus had inspired with love, carried him away into the island of Delos, to enjoy his company with greater security: but Diana, who was jealous of this, destroyed Orion with her arrows. Some say that Orion had provoked Diana's resentment, by offering violence to Opis, one of her female attendants, or, according to others, because he had attempted the virtue of the goddess herself. According to Ovid, Orion died of the bite of a scorpion, which the earth produced, to punish his vanity in boasting that there was not on earth any animal which he could not conquer. Some say that Orion was the son of Neptune and Euryale, and that he had received from his father the privilege and power of walking over the sea without wetting his feet. Others make him son of Terra, like the rest of the giants. He married a nymph called Sida before his connection with the family of Œnopion; but Sida was the cause of her own death, by boasting herself fairer than Juno. According to Diodorus, Orion was a celebrated hunter, superior to the rest of mankind by his strength and uncommon stature. He built the port of Zancle, and fortified the coast of Sicily against the frequent inundations of the sea, by heaping a mound of earth, called Pelorum, on which he built a temple to the gods of the sea. After death, Orion was placed in heaven, where one of the constellations still bears his name. The constellation of Orion, placed near the feet of the bull, was composed of 17 stars, in the form of a man holding a sword, which has given occasion to the poets often to speak of Orion's sword. As the constellation of Orion, which rises about the ninth day of March and sets about the 21st of June, is generally supposed to be accompanied, at its rising, with great rains and storms, it has acquired the epithet of aquosus, given it by Virgil. Orion was buried in the island of Delos, and the monument which the people of Tanagra in Bœotia showed, as containing the remains of this celebrated hero, was nothing but a cenotaph. The daughters of Orion distinguished themselves as much as their father; and, when the oracle had declared that Bœotia should not be delivered from a dreadful pestilence before two of Jupiter's children were immolated on the altars, they joyfully accepted the offer, and voluntarily sacrificed themselves for the good of their country. Their names were Menippe and Metioche. They had been carefully educated by Diana, and Venus and Minerva had made them very rich and valuable presents. The deities of hell were struck at the patriotism of the two females, and immediately two stars were seen to arise from the earth, which still smoked with the blood, and they were placed in the heavens in the form of a crown. According to Ovid, their bodies were burned by the Thebans, and from their ashes arose two persons, whom the gods soon after changed into constellations. [Some suppose that the fable respecting Orion was a copy of the story of Abraham entertaining the three angels, who came and foretold to him the birth of a son, though his wife was superannuated. Others assert that it has a great resemblance to the story of Jacob, especially as the name of Jacob's staff is given to the three brightest stars in the constellation of Orion, and the name of Jacob, which signifies strong against the Lord, (upon account of the mysterious combat he had with an angel,) may have given rise to it. Besides, the Arabians call the constellation of Orion, Algebar, or Algebar, the strong, the giant. The Abbé Fourmont has also argued that this star is the same with that of the patriarch.] *Diod. 4. —Homer. Od. 5, v. 121, l. 11, v. 309. —Virg. Æn. 3, v. 517. —Apollod. 1, c. 4. —Ovid. ORÔDES, a prince of Parthia, who murdered his brother Mithridates, and ascended his throne. He defeated Crassus, the Roman triumvir, and poured melted gold down the throat of his fallen enemy, to reproach him for his avarice and ambition. He followed the interest of Cassius and Brutus at Philippi. It is said, that, when Orodes became old and infirm, his thirty children applied to him, and disputed, in his presence, their right to the succession. Phraates, the eldest of them, obtained the crown from his father, and to hasten him out of the world, he attempted to poison him. The poison had no effect, and Phraates, still determined on his father's death, strangled him with his own hands, about 37 years before the Christian era. ORONTES, [a river of Syria, rising on the eastern side of the range of Libanus, and, after pursuing a northerly course, falling into the Mediterranean about six leagues below Antiochia. It was called Orontes, according to Strabo, from the person who first built a bridge over it, its previous name having been Typhon. This name it received from a dragon, which, having been struck with a thunderbolt, sought in its flight a place of concealment by breaking through the surface of the earth, from which aperture the river broke forth, so that, according to this statement, it pursued a part of its course at first under ground. This, however, is a mere fable. Typhon was probably a fanciful appellation given to it by the Greeks, since it is altogether different from the Syriac term which the natives now apply to it, viz. El-Ausi, or, "the swift," and which no doubt was also given to it by the Syrians of former days, since from it the Greeks appeared to have formed their other name for this river, viz. the Axius. Scylax calls the stream Thapsacus. The Orontes is a large river in winter, on account of the accession to its waters from the rain and melted snows, but it is a very small stream in summer.] *Dionys. ORŌPUS, a town of Bœotia, on the borders of Attica, near the Euripus, which received its name from Oropus, a son of Macedon. It was the frequent cause of quarrels between the Bœotians and the Athenians, whence some have called it one of the cities of Attica, and was at last confirmed in the possession of the Athenians by Philip, king of Macedon. Amphiarus had a temple there. Paus. 1, c. 34.—Strab. 9.

OROSIUS, [a priest of Tarraco or Tarragona in Catalonia, who flourished in the beginning of the fifth century. The invasion of his country by the barbarians, and the troubles excited by the Priscillianistes, a sect of the Gnostics or Manichæans, caused him to betake himself to St. Augustine in Africa, who afterwards sent him to St. Jerome. The latter prelate was then in Palestine. Orosius acted in this country the part of a turbulent man, and embroiled St. Jerome with Pelagius and John of Jerusalem. From Palestine he returned to Africa. Rome having been taken by the Visigoths, the Gentiles ascribed the calamities which afflicted the empire to the abolition of the religion of their fathers, and the introduction of Christianity. To refute this charge Orosius, at the advice of St. Augustine, composed a history in seven books, in which he undertook to show that ever since the creation, which he dated back 5618 years, the habitable world had been the theatre of the greatest calamities. This work bears in the manuscripts the title of Hormesta, (or Ormeta) a name of unknown origin. The most probable opinion is, that it has arisen from a mistake made by some old copyist. The true title no doubt was Pauli Or. mæsta mundi, of which the copyist made Pauli Ormeta. This history was translated into the Saxon tongue by king Alfred, who has added some interesting remarks upon the geography of the Slavi and Scandinavians. Orosius was the author also of a "Defence of the Freedom of the Will" against Pelagius, and of other works. The best edition of the history is that of Havercamp, Lugd. B. 1788, 4to.]

OROSPEDA, [vid. Ortospeda.] Strab. 3.

ORPHEUS, a son of Cæger, by the muse Calliope. [vid. next page, line 39.] Some suppose him to be the son of Apollo, to render his birth more illustrious. He received a lyre from Apollo, or, according to some, from Mercury, upon which he played with such a masterly hand, that even the most rapid rivers ceased to flow, the savage beasts of the forest forgot their wildness, and the mountains moved to listen to his song. [vid. end of this article.] All nature seemed charmed and animated, and the nymphs were his constant companions. Eurydice was the only one who made a deep impression on the melodious musician, and their nuptials were celebrated. Their happiness, however, was short; Aristæus became enamoured of Eurydice, and, as she fled from her pursuer, a serpent, that was lurking in the grass, bit her foot, and she died of the poisoned wound. Her loss was severely felt by Orpheus, and he resolved to recover her, or perish in the attempt. With his lyre in his hand, he entered the infernal regions, and gained an easy admission to the palace of Pluto. The king of hell was charmed with the melody of his strains, and, according to the beautiful expressions of the poets, the wheel of Ixion stopped, the stone of Sisyphus stood still, Tantalus forgot his perpetual thirst, and even the furies relented. Pluto and Proserpine were moved with his sorrow, and consented to restore him Eurydice, provided he forebore looking behind till he had come to the extremest borders of hell. The conditions were gladly accepted, and Orpheus was already in sight of the upper regions of the air, when he forgot his promises, and turned back to look at his long-lost Eurydice. He saw her, but she instantly vanished from his eyes. He attempted to follow her, but he was refused admission; and the only comfort he could find, was to sooth his grief by the sound of his musical instruments, in grottos, or on the mountains. He totally separated himself from the society of mankind; and the Thracian women, whom he had offended by his coldness to their amorous passion, or, according to others, by his unnatural gratifications and impure indulgences, attacked him while they celebrated the orgies of Bacchus, and after they had torn his body to pieces, they threw his head into the Hebrus, which still articulated the words Eurydice! Eurydice! as it was carried down the stream into the Ægean Sea. [vid. Lesbos.] Orpheus was one of the Argonauts, of which celebrated expedition he wrote a poetical account still extant. Some maintain that he was killed by a thunderbolt. He was buried at Pieria in Macedonia, according to Apollodorus. The inhabitants of Dion boasted that his tomb was in their city, and the people of Mount Libethrus, in Thrace, claimed the same honour; and further observed, that the nightingales which built their nests near his tomb sang with greater melody than all other birds. [vid. Lesbos.] Orpheus, as some report, after death received divine honours, the muses gave an honourable burial to his remains, and his lyre became one of the constellations in the heavens. [Much of what the Greeks relate concerning Orpheus is to be ascribed to their credulous vanity and their constant love of the marvellous. When Orpheus is said to have moved both animate and inanimate nature by the tones of his lyre, nothing more appears in reality to be meant, than that he introduced the first rudiments of civilization and the arts of social life among a wild and savage race of men. The poems of both Orpheus and Musæus had reference no doubt to the mysteries established by them, and were not preserved, like the productions of a later age, in the oral communications of the uninitiated and profane. It was the veil of mystery with which these poems were enshrouded which proved the principal cause of the numerous falsifications they from time to time experienced. These alterations and interpolated passages were so numerous, that even as early as the days of Aristotle and Plato there existed nothing more which could be deemed authentic of the poems in question. It would be an idle task at the present day to attempt to pass any opinion upon the poetical merits of the former of these bards, or to form any idea of the nature of the mysteries which he established. His life belongs rather to mythology than to history, and to the history of civilization more than to that of literature. Orpheus must be regarded as the true author of the theology of the Greeks, as far as it is to be considered of northern original. He abolished human sacrifices, and instituted an expiation which was to put an end to those family feuds and retaliations which characterized the earlier Greeks, as they still do some half-civilized nations at the present day. That the works of Orpheus which have reached our time were composed long after his days is proved not only by historical evidence, but also by the artificial spirit in which they are written, and the philosophical reflections with which they are accompanied. These works are, 1. Hymns of Initiation (Ἱεραι), to the number of 23, in hexameter verse. They are generally supposed to have been the productions of Onomacritus. 2. An historical or epic poem on the Expedition of the Argonauts, (Ἀργοναυτικὰ) in 1384 verses. 3. A work on the magical virtues of stones, (Περὶ Λιθῶν, or Λιθικά), in 768 hexameters, showing how they may be used as preservatives against poisons, and as a means of conciliating the favour of the gods. And 4. Fragments of various other works, among which is placed a poem of 66 verses, entitled Περὶ σεισμῶν, concerning Earthquakes, that is, of the prognostics to be derived from this species of phenomena; a production sometimes ascribed to the fabulous Hermes Trismegistus. As late as the 17th century no one doubted but that the different works which bear the name of Orpheus, or at least the greater part of them, were either the productions of Orpheus himself, or of Onomacritus, who was regarded as the restorer of these ancient poems. The learned Huet was the first, who, believing that he had discovered in them traces of Christianity, expressed the suspicion that they might be the work of some pious impostor. In 1751, when Ruhnken published his second critical Letter, he attacked the opinion of Huet, and placed the composition of the works in question in the tenth century before the Christian era. Gesner went still farther, and in his Prolegomena Orphica, which were read in 1759 at the University of Göttingen, and subsequently placed in Hamberger's edition of Orpheus published after Gesner's death, he declared that he had found nothing in these poems which prevented the belief that they were composed before the period of the Trojan war. He allowed, however, at the same time, that they might have been retouched by Onomacritus. Gesner found an opponent in the celebrated Valckenaer, who believed the author of the poems in question to have belonged to the Alexandrian school. In 1771, Schneider revived and developed the theory of Huet. The same poems in which Ruhnken had found a diction almost Homeric, and Gesner the simple style of remote antiquity, appeared to the eyes of the German Professor, the work of a later Platonist initiated into the tenets of Judaism and the mysteries of Christianity. His arguments, deduced entirely from the style of these productions, were strengthened by Thunmann (Neue phi- olog. Bibliothek, vol. 4, p. 298,) who discovered in these poems historical and geographical errors, such as could only have been committed by a writer subsequent to the age of Ptolemy Euergetes. In 1782 Ruhnken published a new edition of his critical Letter; in which he endeavoured to refute the opinion of Schneider, allowing at the same time that the position assumed by Valckenaer was not an improbable one. The discussion rested for twenty years, when Schneider, in his edition of the Argonautics published in 1803, defended the theory which he had supported in his younger days, adding at the same time, however, some modifications; for he allowed that the author of the Argonautics, although comparatively modern, had appropriated to himself the style and manner of the Alexandrian school. Two years after, Hermann, in a memoir annexed to his edition of the Orphica, and subsequently in a separate dissertation, supported with rare erudition the opinion of Huet, and that which Schneider had advanced in 1771. His arguments are drawn from the style and metre of the work. Five German critics, Heyne, Voss, Wolf, Huschke, and Koenigs-mann, have opposed the hypothesis of Schneider and Hermann, and declared in favour of Valckenaer's theory. The authority of the grammarian Draco, who cites the Argonautics of Orpheus, having been strongly urged against Hermann, the latter obtained the work of Draco, which until then had remained unedited, from the celebrated Bast, and published it at Leipzig in 1812. Draco does in fact cite the Argonautics, and his authority is the more entitled to attention, since Hermann himself has shown that he lived before the time of Apollonius Dyscolus, and consequently at the beginning of the second century; whereas, before this, he had been generally assigned to the sixth century. Hermann, however, has greatly shaken the authority of Draco, and leads us to entertain the opinion that we possess only an extract of the work, augmented by interpolations and marginal glosses that have crept into the text. It is even probable that the very part relating to Orpheus was added by Constantine Lascaris. As regards Orpheus himself, he is stated by some ancient authorities to have abstained from eating of flesh, and to have had an abhorrence of eggs, considered as food, from a persuasion that the egg was the principle of all beings. Many other accounts are given of him, which would seem to assimilate his character to that of the ancient priests of India, or Brachmani. The ancients, however, unable to discover any mode by which he could have obtained his knowledge from any other source, pretended that he had visited Egypt, and had there been initiated in the mysteries of Isis and Osiris. This, however, appears to be a supposition purely gratuitous on the part of the ancient writers, since a careful examination of the subject leads directly to the belief that Orpheus was of Indian origin, that he was a member of one of those sacerdotal colonies which professed the religion of Buddha, and who, being driven from their home in the northern parts of India and in the plains of Tartary, by the superior power of the rival sect of Brahma, moved gradually onwards to the west, dispensing in their progress the benefits of civilization and the mysteries and tenets of their peculiar faith. There seems to be a curious analogy between the name of the poet and the old Greek term ορφος, dark or tawny-coloured, so that the appellation of Orpheus may have been derived by the early Greeks from his dusky Hindoo complexion. The death of Eurydice, and the descent of Orpheus to the shades for the purpose of effecting her restoration, appears to be nothing more than an allegorical allusion to certain events connected with the religious and moral instructions of the bard. "All that can be said concerning the Gods," observes Strabo,¹ "must be by the exposition of old opinions and fables; it being the custom of the ancients to wrap up in enigma and fable their thoughts and discourses concerning nature; which are not therefore easily explained." (Strab. 10, p. 474.) It will not, we hope, be viewed as too bold an assertion to affirm that such a female as Eurydice never existed. The name Eurydice (Ευρυδική) appears to be compounded of the adverbial form ευρυ, or perhaps the adjective ευγυς, considered as being of two terminations, (Matthie, G. G. vol. 1. § 120.) and the noun δική; and it would seem to be nothing more than an appellation for that system of just dealing which Orpheus had introduced among the earlier progenitors of the Grecian race, and the foundations of which had been laid broadly and deeply by him in the minds of his hearers. According to the statements of ancient mythologists, Aristæus, the son of Apollo and the nymph Cyrene, became enamoured of Eurydice the wife of Orpheus, and pursued her into a wood where a serpent stung her so that she died. It is very generally agreed among the expounders of mythology at the present day, that most of the individuals who act a conspicuous part in the earlier fables of the Greeks, as sons of Apollo, are to be regarded as having been of Oriental origin; the phrase "son of Apollo" meaning nothing more than that he to whom it is applied had come from the countries of the east. The name Aristæus, (Ἀρισταῖος), also, conveys the idea of supremacy, and he is styled in fact, by some of the ancient writers, king of Arcadia; though Thessaly more properly was his place of residence at the period of the alleged death of Eurydice. Cicero calls him a son of Bacchus; but as he is supported in this, apparently by no other authorities, the only safe conclusion we can deduce from it is, that Aristæus was attached to and disseminated the doctrines and mysteries of the rites of Bacchus. The impure indulgences and the gross immoralities, which characterized, even in an early age, the celebration of the Bacchanalian orgies, may well be supposed hostile in their influence to that purer system of morality and just dealing which had emanated from the instructions of Orpheus. A contest ensues between the rival systems; the followers of the latter are compelled to fly, by the hand of power, to the recesses of the forest, in order to practise there in security the rites to which they are attached; but the celebration of the orgies, the scene of which was invariably laid in woods and on mountains, lays open the place of their retreat to the followers of Bacchus, and the system of Orpheus is prostrated. In the language of poetry, Aristæus (power) pursues Eurydice (Εὐρυδική, the darling institutions of Orpheus) into the woods, where the serpent (the system of Bacchus) occasions her death. It is not pretended that the serpent was the peculiar emblem of Bacchus, but we have the authority of Justin Martyr (Apol. 2, p. 70,) for the remark that it was symbolical of almost every god, denoting the general attribute of immortality; and at this early period we know of no other mysteries having been prevalent in Greece but those of Orpheus and Bacchus. Orpheus, say the poets, lamenting the loss of his beloved Eurydice, descended in quest of her to the shades. The meaning of which evidently is, that, afflicted at the overthrow of the favourite system which he had promulgated, and the consequent gross corruption of the times, he endeavoured to reclaim men from the sensual indulgences to which they had become attached, by holding up to their view the terrors of future punishment in another world. Indeed, that he was the first who introduced among the Greeks the idea of a Hell is expressly asserted by ancient authorities. The awful threatenings that were thus unfolded to their view, and the blissful enjoyments of an Elysium which were at the same time promised to the faithful, succeeded in bringing back men for a time to the path of duty; but either the impatience of their instructor to see his efforts realized, or some inattention on his part, frustrated all his hopes, and mankind again relapsed into moral darkness. In the fanciful phraseology of the poet, the doctrine of a future state of punishment, as taught by Orpheus, was converted into his descent to the shades. His endeavour to re-establish by these means the moral system which he had originally promulgated, became, to the eye of the earlier bard, an impassioned search, even amid the darkness of the lower world, for the lost object of conjugal affection; and by the tones of the lyre, which bent even Pluto and Proserpina to his will, appear to be indicated those sweet and moving accents of moral harmony, in which were described the joys of Elysium, and whose power would be acknowledged even by those whom the terrors of punishment could not intimidate. The fate of the unhappy Orpheus in being torn to pieces by the Bacchantes on the banks of the Hebrus, is a direct confirmation of the truth of what has been advanced, and a proof of his having either been destroyed, or compelled to yield to their power, by the votaries of the system of Bacchus.—As regards the being and existence of Orpheus, it has been supposed by some that Cicero maintains the contrary. A careful examination, however, of the passage in question will not seem to confirm this result. The words of Cicero are as follows: "Orpheum poetam docet Aristoteles nunquam fuisse." (Nat. De. 1, c. 38.) The reference is to a passage of Aristotle in the third book of his Poetics, which is now lost. Cicero, however, does not mean to deny the existence of Orpheus, but merely quotes Aristotle for the purpose of showing that the works commonly ascribed to him were not his productions. The word poetam is equivalent in the text to "composer of the Orphic hymns," which were then circulating under his name, and in the collocation of the sentence must be placed after fuisse. The meaning will then be, "Aristotle informs us that Orpheus never was the author of the hymns which at present go by his name." On this explanation, see Gesner in Prolegom.—Harless, Fabr. Bib. Grundriss der Philologie. p. 56.—Brucker, in his "History of Philosophy" by Enfield, has deduced from the Orphic verses and other fragments of Orpheus, the following summary of his doctrine concerning God and nature. "God from all eternity contained within himself the unformed principles of the material world, and consisted of a compound nature, active and passive. By the energy of the active principle he sent forth from himself, at the commencement of a certain finite period, all material and spiritual beings which partake in different degrees of the divine nature. All beings, proceeding originally from God, will, after certain purgations, return to him. The universe itself will be destroyed by fire and afterwards renewed." OSCHOPHORIA, a festival observed by the Athenians. It receives its name απο του φερειντας οσχας, from carrying boughs hung up with grapes, called οσχα. Its original institution is thus mentioned by Plut. in These. Theseus, at his return from Crete, forgot to hang out the white sail by which his father was to be apprised of his success. This neglect was fatal to Ægeus, who threw himself into the sea and perished. Theseus no sooner reached the land than he sent a herald to inform his father of his safe return, and in the mean time he began to make the sacrifices which he vowed when he first set sail from Crete. The herald, on his entrance into the city, found the people in great agitation. Some lamented the king's death, while others, elated at the sudden news of the victory of Theseus, crowned the herald with garlands in demonstration of their joy. The herald carried back the garlands on his staff to the sea-shore, and after he had waited till Theseus had finished his sacrifice, he related the melancholy story of the king's death. Upon this, the people ran in crowds to the city, showing their grief by cries and lamentations. From that circumstance therefore, at the feast of Oschophoria, not the herald but his staff is crowned with garlands, and all the people that are present always exclaim οσχευ, οσχευ; the first of which expresses haste, and the others a consternation or depression of spirits. The historian further mentions, that Theseus, when he went to Crete, did not take with him the usual number of virgins, but that instead of two of them he filled up the number with two youths of his acquaintance, whom he made pass for women, by disguising their dress, and by using them to the ointments and perfumes of women as well as by a long and successful imitation of their voice. The imposition succeeded, their sex was not discovered in Crete, and when Theseus had triumphed over the Minotaur, he, with these two youths, led a procession with branches in their hands, in the same habit which is still used at the celebration of the Oschophoria. The branches which were carried were in honour of Bacchus or of Ariadne, or because they returned in autumn, when the grapes were ripe. Besides this procession, there was also a race exhibited, in which only young men, whose parents were both alive, were permitted to engage. It was usual for them to run from the temple of Bacchus to that of Minerva, which was on the sea-shore. The place where they stopped was called οσχοφοριον, because the boughs which they carried in their hands were deposited there. The reward of the conqueror was a cup called πεντα πλοα, five-fold, because it contained a mixture of five different things, wine, honey, cheese, meal, and oil. Plut. in These.

OSCI, a people between Campania and the country of the Volsci, who assisted Turnus against Æneas. Some suppose that they are the same as the Opici, the word Osci being a diminutive or abbreviation of the other. [Festus expressly makes Oscus and Opicus equivalent terms.] The language, the plays, and ludicrous expressions of this nation, are often mentioned by the ancients, and from their indecent tendency, some suppose the word obscenium (quasi oscenium) is derived. *Tacit. OSIRIS, a great deity of the Egyptians, son of Jupiter and Niobe. [vid. the end of this article.] All the ancients greatly differ in their opinions concerning this celebrated god, but they all agree that, as king of Egypt, he took particular care to civilize his subjects, to polish their morals, to give them good and salutary laws, and to teach them agriculture. After he had accomplished a reform at home, Osiris resolved to go and spread civilization in the other parts of the earth. He left his kingdom to the care of his wife Isis, and of her faithful minister Hermes or Mercury. The command of his troops at home was left to the trust of Hercules, a warlike officer. In his expedition Osiris was accompanied by his brother Apollo, and by Anubis, Macedo, and Pan. His march was through Ethiopia, where his army was increased by the addition of the Satyrs, a hairy race of monsters, who made dancing and playing on musical instruments their chief study. He afterwards passed through Arabia and visited the greatest part of the kingdoms of Asia and Europe, where he enlightened the minds of men by introducing among them the worship of the gods, and a reverence for the wisdom of a Supreme Being. At his return home Osiris found the minds of his subjects roused and agitated. His brother Typhon had raised seditions, and endeavoured to make himself popular. Osiris, whose sentiments were always of the most pacific nature, endeavoured to convince his brother of his ill conduct, but he fell a sacrifice to the attempt. Typhon murdered him in a secret apartment, and cut his body to pieces, which were divided among the associates of his guilt. Typhon, according to Plutarch, shut up his brother in a coffer and threw him into the Nile. The inquiries of Isis discovered the body of her husband on the coasts of Phœnicia, where it had been conveyed by the waves, but Typhon stole it as it was carrying to Memphis, and he divided it amongst his companions, as was before observed. This cruelty incensed Isis: she revenged her husband's death, and with her son Orus she defeated Typhon and the partizans of his conspiracy. She recovered the mangled pieces of her husband's body, the genitals excepted, which the murderer had thrown into the sea; and to render him all the honour which his humanity deserved, she made as many statues of wax as there were mangled pieces of his body. Each statue contained a piece of the flesh of the dead monarch; and Isis, after she had summoned in her presence one by one, the priests of all the different deities in her dominions, gave them each a statue, intimating, that in doing that she had preferred them to all the other communities of Egypt, and she bound them by a solemn oath that they would keep secret that mark of her favour, and endeavour to show their sense of it by establishing a form of worship and paying divine honours to their prince. They were further directed to choose whatever animals they pleased to represent the person and the divinity of Osiris, and they were enjoined to pay the greatest reverence to that representative of divinity, and to bury it when dead with the greatest solemnity. To render their establishment more popular, each sacerdotal body had a certain portion of land allotted to them to maintain them, and to defray the expenses which necessarily attend ed the sacrifices and ceremonial rites. That part of the body of Osiris which had not been recovered, was treated with more particular attention by Isis, and she ordered that it should receive honours more solemn, and at the same time more mysterious than the other members. (vid. Phallica.) As Osiris had particularly instructed his subjects in cultivating the ground, the priest chose the ox to represent him, and paid the most superstitious veneration to that animal. (vid. Apis.) Osiris, according to the opinion of some mythologists, is the same as the sun, and the adoration which is paid by different nations to an Anubis, a Bacchus, a Dionysius, a Jupiter, a Pan, &c. is the same as that which Osiris received in the Egyptian temples. Isis also after death received divine honours as well as her husband, and as the ox was the symbol of the sun, or Osiris, so the cow was the emblem of the moon, or of Isis. Nothing can give a clearer idea of the power and greatness of Osiris than this inscription, which has been found on some ancient monuments: Saturn, the youngest of all the gods, was my father; I am Osiris, who conducted a large and numerous army as far as the deserts of India, and travelled over the greatest part of the world, and visited the streams of the Ister, and the remote shores of the ocean, diffusing benevolence to all the inhabitants of the earth. Osiris was generally represented with a cap on his head like a mitre, with two horns; he held a stick in his left hand, and in his right a whip with three thongs. Sometimes he appears with the head of a hawk, as that bird, by its quick and piercing eyes, is a proper emblem of the sun. [The Abbé Banier is of opinion that Osiris is the same with Misraim, the son of Ham, who peopled Egypt some time after the deluge, and who after his death was deified; and he is called by the ancients the son of Jupiter, because he was the son of Ham or Hammon, whom he himself had acknowledged as a god. Marsham takes Osiris to have been Ham himself. The learned, in general, allow that Osiris was one of the first descendants of Noah by Ham, and that he governed Egypt, whither his father had repaired, and there founded a small kingdom a few years after the dispersion which happened in the time of Peleg. But Zoëga (De Obeliscis, p. 577, seqq.) has the following theory. He supposes that Egypt, at the period when it began to be inhabited, received some colonies from Arabia which followed a pastoral mode of life, and others from Ethiopia who were acquainted with the cultivation of the earth. The former took up their abode in the vicinity of Pelusium and along a part of the Delta, and extended southwards as far as the middle of Heptanomis. The Ethiopians, on the other hand, founded Thebes and Abydos, together with many towns in Thebais and the Delta itself, and for many ages waged war with various success against the shepherd race. To this period, in the opinion of Zoëga, the history of Osiris belongs. He makes him to have been a new-comer from Ethiopia, who communicated many useful precepts respecting the cultivation of the earth, and taught many of the arts of civilized life. He was at length entrapped and put to death by Baby, the king of the shepherds, whom the Greeks call Typhon, and afforded occasion by his death to many mournful rites. The Ethiopians finally prevailed over their opponents, founded Memphis, and wrested from the shepherd race Heliopolis, and also Pelusium. But as they were divided into many separate communities, and at variance among themselves, they were often exposed to the invasions of the shepherds from the Delta and from Arabia: occasionally they were subjugated by them. At length Sesostris or Sethos, the son of Amenophis, having driven out the shepherds into Arabia and Syria, carried his victorious arms even into Palestine, and on his return to Egypt was declared king of the whole country. He promulgated a code of laws, which he pretended to have received from Hermes the ancient deity of the Egyptian priests, and after his death was celebrated in the traditions and sacred hymns of the Egyptians.] *Plut. in Isid. & Os.—Herodot. 2, c. 144.—Diod. 1.—Homer. OSTIA, a town built at the mouth of the river Tiber by Ancus Martius, king of Rome, about 16 miles distant from Rome. It had a celebrated harbour, and was so pleasantly situated that the Romans generally spent a part of the year there as in a country-seat. There was a small tower in the port, like the Pharos of Alexandria, built upon the wreck of a large ship which had been sunk there, and which contained the obelisks of Egypt with which the Roman emperors intended to adorn the capital of Italy. In the age of Strabo the sand and mud deposited by the Tiber had choked the harbour, and added much to the size of the small islands which sheltered the ships at the entrance of the river. Ostia and her harbour, called Portus, became gradually separated, and are now at a considerable distance from the sea. [Ostia was the only port of Rome until the time of Claudius, who built what is now Porto on the opposite bank of the Tiber. The marshy insula sacra, in the middle of the river, once sacred to Apollo, divides the ancient harbours, which Casiodorus calls the two eyes of Rome. After the building of Claudius's new port on the right bank of the river, the left stream, on which Ostia stands, was quite deserted. The ruins of old Ostia are now in the midst of a wilderness, and the sea is nearly two miles from the ancient port. The cause of this seems to be owing to the extreme flatness of the land, which does not allow the Tiber to carry off the immense quantity of earth and mud its turbid waters bring down; and the more that is deposited, the more sluggishly it flows; and thus the shore rises, the sea recedes, and the marshes extend.] Flor. 1, c. 4. l. 3, c. 21.—Liv. 1, c. 33.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Sueton.—Plin.

OTHO, M. SALVIUS, a Roman emperor, descended from the ancient kings of Etruria. He was one of Nero's favourites, and as such he was raised to the highest offices of the state, and made governor of Pannonia by the interest of Seneca, who wished to remove him from Rome, lest Nero's love for Poppæa should prove his ruin. After Nero's death, Otho conciliated the favour of Galba, the new emperor; but when he did not gain his point, and when Galba had refused to adopt him as his successor, he resolved to make himself absolute without any regard to the age or dignity of his friend. The great debts which he had contracted encouraged his avarice, and he caused Galba to be assassinated, and he made himself emperor. He was acknowledged by the senate and the Roman people, but the sudden revolt of Vitellius in Germany rendered his situation precarious, and it was mutually resolved that their respective right to the empire should be decided by arms. Otho obtained three victories over his enemies, but in a general engagement near Brixellum, his forces were defeated, and he stabbed himself when all hopes of success were vanished, after a reign of about three months, on the 20th of April, A. D. 69. It has been justly observed, that the last moments of Otho's life were those of a philosopher. He comforted his soldiers who lamented his fortune, and he expressed his concern for their safety, when they earnestly solicited to pay him the last friendly offices before he stabbed himself, and he observed that it was better that one man should die than that all should be involved in ruin for his obstinacy. His nephew was pale and distressed, fearing the anger and haughtiness of the conqueror; but Otho comforted him, and observed, that Vitellius would be kind and affectionate to the friends and relations of Otho, since Otho was not ashamed to say, that, in the time of their greatest enmity, the mother of Vitellius had received every friendly treatment from his hands. He also burnt the letters which, by falling into the hands of Vitellius, might provoke his resentment against those who had favoured the cause of an unfortunate general. These noble and humane sentiments in a man who was the associate of Nero's shameful pleasures, and who stained his hand in the blood of his master, have appeared to some wonderful, and passed for the features of policy, and not of a naturally virtuous and benevolent heart. Plut. in vitâ.—Suet.—Tacit. 2, Hist. c. 50, &c.—Juv. 2, v. 90.—Roscius, a tribune of the people, who, in Cicero's consulship, made a regulation to permit the Roman knights at public spectacles to have the 14 first rows after the seats of the senators. [The equites, previous to this, sat promiscuously with the commons. By this new regulation of Otho's, the commons considered themselves dishonoured, and hissed and insulted Otho when he appeared in the theatre: the equites, on the other hand, received him with loud plaudits. The commons repeated their hissings, and the knights their applause, until, at last they came to mutual reproaches, and the whole theatre became a scene of the greatest disorder. Cicero, being informed of the disturbance, came and summoned the people to the temple of Bellona, where, partly by his reproofs, and partly by his lenity, he so wrought upon them, that they returned to the theatre, loudly testified their approbation of Otho, and strove with the equites which should show him the most honour. The speech delivered on this occasion was afterwards reduced to writing. It is now lost, but having been delivered ex tempore affords a strong example of the persuasive nature of his eloquence. One topic which he touched on in this oration, and the only one of which we have any hint from antiquity, was his reproaching the rioters for their want of taste, in creating a tumult while Roscius was performing on the stage.] Horat. ep. 4, v. 10.—The father of the Roman emperor Otho was the favourite of Claudius.

OTHRYADES, one of the 300 Spartans who fought against 300 Argives, when those two nations disputed their respective right to Thyrea. Two Argives, Alcino and Cronius, and Othryades survived the battle. The Argives went home to carry the news of their victory, but Othryades, who had been reckoned among the number of the slain, on account of his wounds, recovered himself and carried some of the spoils, of which he had stripped the Argives, into the camp of his countrymen; and after he had raised a trophy, and had written with his own blood "I have conquered" on his shield, he killed himself, unwilling to survive the death of his countrymen. *Val. OTUS and EPHALTES, sons of Neptune. vid. Aloides.

P. OVIDIUS NASO, a celebrated Roman poet, born at Sulmo on the 20th of March, about 43 B. C. As he was intended for the bar, his father sent him early to Rome, and removed him to Athens in the sixteenth year of his age. The progress of Ovid in the study of eloquence was great, but the father's expectations were frustrated; his son was born a poet, and nothing could deter him from pursuing his natural inclination, though he was often reminded that Homer lived and died in the greatest poverty. Every thing he wrote was expressed in poetical numbers, as he himself says, et quod tentabam scribere versus erat. A lively genius and a fertile imagination soon gained him admirers; the learned became his friends; Virgil, Propertius, Tibullus, and Horace, honoured him with their correspondence; and Augustus patronized him with the most unbounded liberality. These favours, however, were but momentary, and the poet was soon after banished to Tomos, on the Euxine Sea, by the emperor. The true cause of this sudden exile is unknown. Some attribute it to a shameful amour with Livia, the wife of Augustus, while others support that it arose from the knowledge which Ovid had of the unpardonable incest of the emperor with his daughter Julia. These reasons are indeed merely conjectural; the cause was of a very private and very secret nature, of which Ovid himself is afraid to speak, as it arose from error and not from criminality. It was, however, something improper in the family and court of Augustus, as these lines seem to indicate:

Cur imprudenti cognita culpa mihi est?

Inscius Actæon vidit sine veste Dianam;

Præda fuit canibus non minus ille suis.

Again,

Inscia quod crimen viderunt lumina plector,

Peccatumque oculos est habuisse meum.

And in another place,

Perdiderunt cum me duo crimina, carmen et error,

Alterius facti culpa silenda mihi est.

[Tiraboschi (Storia della Letter. Ital. Tom. 1, p. 201.) has given the subject a very careful and full examination, and seems to have proved very satisfactorily that the offence of Ovid consisted in his having been an accidental witness of some scandalous intrigue on the part of Julia, in which, however, Augustus was not at all implicated.] In his banishment, Ovid betrayed his pusillanimity, and however afflicted and distressed his situation was, yet the flattery and impatience which he showed in his writings are a disgrace to his pen, and expose him more to ridicule than pity. Though he prostituted his pen and his time to adulation, yet the emperor proved deaf to all entreaties, and refused to listen to his most ardent friends at Rome, who wished for the return of the poet. Ovid, who undoubtedly wished for a Brutus to deliver Rome of her tyrannical Augustus, continued his flattery even to meanness; and when the emperor died, he was so mercenary as to consecrate a temple to the departed tyrant on the shore of the Euxine, where he regularly offered frankincense every morning. Tiberius proved as regardless as his predecessor to the entreaties which were made for Ovid, and the poet died in the 7th or 8th year of his banishment, in the 59th year of his age, A. D. 17, and was buried at Tomos. In the year 1508 of the Christian era, the following epitaph was found at Stain, in the modern kingdom of Austria.

Augusti patriâ cedere jussit humo.
Sæpe miser voluit patriâs occumbere terris,
Sed frustra! Hunc illi fata dedere locum.*

This, however, is an imposition to render celebrated an obscure corner of the world which never contained the bones of Ovid. The greatest part of Ovid's poems are remaining. His Metamorphoses in 15 books are extremely curious, on account of the many different mythological facts and traditions which they relate, but they can have no claim to an epic poem. In composing this, the poet was more indebted to the then existing traditions, and to the theogony of the ancients, than to the powers of his own imagination. His Fasti were divided into 12 books, the same number as the constellations of the zodiac; but of these, six have perished, and the learned world have reason to lament the loss of a poem which must have thrown so much light upon the religious rites and ceremonies, festivals and sacrifices, of the ancient Romans, as we may judge from the six that have survived the ravages of time and barbarity. His Tristia, which are divided into five books, contain much elegance and softness of expression, as also his Elegies on different subjects. [His Tristia, however, are rendered very fatiguing by the monotony which pervades them. The despondency of Ovid and his exaggerated description of his sufferings inspire neither esteem for his character nor pity for his misfortunes.] The Heroides are nervous, spirited, and diffuse, the poetry is excellent, the language varied, [but the expressions are often too wanton and indelicate, a fault which is common in his compositions.—[These epistles, however, are the most finished of the productions of Ovid, and form that part of his works which has met with the largest number of imitators. The epistle of Sappho to Phaon is regarded as a masterpiece. Three of the Heroides, viz. Ulysses to Penelope, Demophoon to Phyllis, and Paris to Oenone, are not the productions of Ovid, nor were they written, apparently, by any poet of the Augustan age. Some critics ascribe them to Angelius Sabinus, a Neapolitan poet of the 15th century.] His three books of Amorum, and the same number of Arte Amandi, with the other de Remedio Amoris, are written with great elegance, and contain many flowery descriptions; but the doctrine which they hold forth is dangerous, and they are to be read with caution, as they seem to be calculated to corrupt the heart and sap the foundations of virtue and morality. His Ibis, which is written in imitation of a poem of Callimachus of the same name, is a satirical performance. Besides these, there are extant some fragments of other poems, and among these some of a tragedy called Medea. The talents of Ovid as a dramatic writer have been disputed, and some have observed, that he who is so often void of sentiment, was not born to shine as a tragedian. Ovid has attempted perhaps too many sorts of poetry at once. On whatever he has written, he has totally exhausted the subject and left nothing unsaid. He every where paints nature with a masterly hand, and gives strength to the most vulgar expressions. It has been judiciously observed, that his poetry, after his banishment from Rome, was destitute of that spirit and vivacity which we admire in his other compositions. His Fasti are perhaps the best written of all his poems, and after them we may fairly rank his love verses, his Heroides, and after all his Metamorphoses, which were not totally finished when Augustus sent him into banishment. His Epistles from Pontus are the language of an abject and pusillanimous flatterer. However critics may censure the indelicacy and the inaccuracies of Ovid, it is to be acknowledged that his poetry contains great sweetness and elegance, and, like that of Tibullus, charms the ear and captivates the mind. Ovid married three wives, but of the last alone he speaks with fondness and affection. He had only one daughter, but by which of his wives is unknown; and she herself became mother of two children, by two husbands. The best editions of Ovid's works are those of Burman, 4 vols. 4to. Amst. 1727; of L. Bat. 1670, in 8vo. and of Utrecht, in 12mo. 4 vols. 1713. Ovid. Trist. 3 and 4, &c.—Paterc. 2.—Martial. 3 and 8.

[OXÆE, small pointed isles near the Echinades, now called Cursolari. Their ancient name has reference to their form, (ὄξυται.)]

OXUS, [a large river of Bactriana, rising in the north-eastern extremity of that country, or rather in the south-eastern part of Great Bukharia, and flowing for the greater part of its course in a north-west direction. It receives numerous tributaries, and falls after a course of 1200 miles into the sea of Aral. The ancient geographers supposed it to fall into the Caspian, being ignorant of the existence of the Sea of Aral to the east of the former. The Oxus is now the Amu, called by the Arabian geographers Chilon or Gihon.]

OXYDRACÆ, a nation of India. [They are supposed to have inhabited the district now called Outsch, near the confluence of the Acesines and Indus. Perhaps, however, it would be more correct to locate them a little beyond its junction with the Hyphasis.] Curt. 9, c. 4.

OXYRYNCHUS, [a city of Egypt, on the canal of Mœris. It took its name from a fish called ὄξυρυγχος in Greek, or pike, which was an object of worship to the Egyptians, and had a temple here. Nothing remains of this city, in the village called Benese, built on its ruins, but some fragments of stone pillars, and a single column left standing, and which appears to have formed part of a portico of the composite order.] Strab.

OZOLÆ or OZOLI, a people who inhabited the eastern parts of Ætolia, which were called Ozolea. This tract of territory lay at the north of the bay of Corinth, and extended about twelve miles northward. They received their name from the bad stench (ὄζειν) of their bodies and of their clothing, which was the raw hides of wild beasts, or from the offensive smell of the body of Nessus the centaur, which after death was left to putrify in the country without the honours of a burial. Some derive it with more propriety from the stench of the stagnated water in the neighbouring lakes and marshes. [vid. Locri.] According to a fabulous tradition, they received their name from a very different circumstance: During the reign of a son of Deucalion, a bitch brought into the world a stick instead of whelps. The stick was planted in the ground by the king, and it grew up a large vine and produced grapes, from which the inhabitants of the country were called Ozole, not from ὄζειν, to smell bad, but from ὄζω, a branch or sprout. The name of Ozole, on account of its indelicate signification, highly displeased the inhabitants, and they exchanged it soon for that of Ætoliens. [According to some authorities, the arrows of Hercules were buried in this district by Philoctetes, and a mephitic vapour arose from them, as they were tinged with the poison of the Hydra. According to others, the Ozole continued for a long time to dress in the skins of animals, and hence their persons were rendered offensive.] Paus. 10, c. 33.—Herodot. 8, c. 32.

PACATIANUS, Titus Julius, a general of the Roman armies, who proclaimed himself emperor in Gaul, about the latter part of Philip's reign. He was soon after defeated, A. D. 249, and put to death, &c.

PACHINUS, or Pachynus, now Passaro, a promontory of Sicily, projecting about two miles into the sea, in the form of a peninsula, at the south-east corner of the island, with a small harbour of the same name. Strab. 6.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 699.—Paus. 5, c. 25.

PACORUS, the eldest of the thirty sons of Orodes, king of Parthia, sent against Crassus, whose army he defeated, and whom he took prisoner. He took Syria from the Romans and supported the republican party of Pompey, and of the murderers of Julius Cæsar. He was killed in a battle by Ventidius Bassus, B. C. 39, on the same day (9th of June) that Crassus had been defeated. Flor. 4, c. 9.—Horat. 3, od. 6, v. 9.—A king of Parthia, who made a treaty of alliance with the Romans, &c.

PACTOLUS, a celebrated river of Lydia, rising in Mount Tmolus, and falling into the Hermus after it has watered the city of Sardes. It was in this river that Midas washed himself when he turned into gold whatever he touched; and from that circumstance it ever after rolled golden sands, and received the name of Chrysoorhoas. It is called Tmolus by Pliny. Strabo observes, that it had golden sands in his age. [The gold found amid the sands of the Pactolus was derived from the mines of Mount Tmolus, and when these were exhausted the supply of the river ceased. This river, according to Varro and Chrysostom, was the chief source of the wealth of Croesus.] Virg. Æn. 10, v. 142.—Strab. 18.—Ovid. Met. 11, v. 36.—Herodot. 5, c. 110.—Plin. 33, c. 8.

PACTYAS, a Lydian intrusted with the care of the treasures of Croesus at Sardes. The immense riches which he could command, corrupted him, and to make himself independent he gathered a large army. He laid siege to the citadel of Sardes, but the arrival of one of the Persian generals soon put him to flight. He retired to Cumæ and afterwards to Lesbos, where he was delivered into the hands of Cyrus. Herodot. 1, c. 154, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 35.

PACUVIUS, M. a native of Brundisium, son of the sister of the poet Ennius who distinguished himself by his skill in painting, and by his poetical talents. [He was one of the first Romans who attained any degree of eminence in painting; and he particularly distinguished himself by the picture which he executed for the temple of Hercules in the Forum Boarium.] He wrote satires and tragedies which were represented at Rome, and of some of which the names are preserved, as Peribœa, Hermione, Atalanta, Ilione, Teucer, Antiope, &c. Orestes was considered as the best finished performance; the style, however, though rough and without either purity or elegance, deserved the commendation of Cicero and Quintilian, who perceived strong rays of genius and perfection frequently beaming through the clouds of the barbarity and ignorance of the times. [Cicero, though he blames his style, places him on the same level for tragedy as Ennius for epic poetry, or Cæcilius for comedy; and he mentions in his treatise De Oratore, that his verses were considered by many as highly laboured and adorned. It was in this laboured polish of versification, and skill in the dramatic conduct of the scene, that the excellence of Pacuvius chiefly consisted. The passages of Horace and Quintilian which relate to this poet must have this meaning annexed to them, and no other. Most other Latin critics, though on the whole they seem to prefer Attius, allow Pacuvius to be the more correct writer.] The poet in his old age retired to Tarentum, where he died in his 90th year, about 131 years before Christ. Of all his compositions about 437 scattered lines are preserved in the collections of Latin poets. [From no one play of Pacuvius are there more than fifty lines preserved, and these generally very much detached. The longest passages which we have in continuation are a fragment concerning Fortune, in the Hermione; the exclamations of Ulysses, while writhing under the agony of a recent wound in the Niptra; and a description of a storm in the Dulorestes.] Cic. de Orat. 2, ad Heren. 2, c. 27.—Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 56.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.

PADINUM, now Bondeno, a town on the Po, where it begins to branch into different channels. Plin. 3, c. 15.

PADUS, [now the Po, the largest river of Italy, anciently called also Eridanus, an appellation which is frequently used by the Roman poets, and almost always by Greek authors. vid. Eridanus. D'Anville makes this latter name belong properly to the Ostium Spineticum of the Padus. The name Padus is said to have been derived from a word in the language of the Gauls, which denoted a poplar tree, in consequence of the great number of those trees growing on its banks. Whatever be the derivation of the term Padus, the more ancient name of the river, which was Bodincus, is certainly of Celtic origin, and is said to signify bottomless. The Po rises in Mons Vesulus, now Monte Viso, near the sources of the Druentia or Durance, runs in an easterly direction for more than 500 miles, and discharges its waters into the Adriatic, about 30 miles south of Portus Venetus, or Venice. It is sufficiently deep to bear boats and barges at 30 miles from its source, but the navigation is at all times difficult, and not unfrequently hazardous on account of the rapidity of the current. Its waters are liable to sudden increase from the melting of the snows and from heavy falls of rain, the rivers that flow into it being almost all mountain-streams; and in the flat country, in the lower part of its course, great dikes are erected on both sides of the river to protect the lands from inundation. During its long course it receives a great number of tributaries, its channel being the final receptacle of almost every stream which rises on the eastern and southern declivities of the Alps, and the northern declivity of the Appenines. The mouths of the Po were anciently reckoned seven in number, the principal one, which was the southernmost, called Padusa, and now Po di Primaro. It was this mouth also to which the appellations Eridanus and Spineticum Ostium were applied. It sends off a branch from itself near Trigaboli, the modern Ferrara, which was anciently styled Volana Ostium, but is now denominated Po di Ferrara.] It was formerly said that it rolled gold dust in its sands, which was carefully searched by the inhabitants. The consuls C. Flaminius Nepos and P. Furius Philus, were the first Roman generals who crossed it. The Po is famous for the death of Phaeton, who, as the poets mention, was thrown down there by the thunderbolts of Jupiter. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 258, &c.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Lucan. 2, &c.—Virg. Æn. 9, v. 680.—Strab. 5.—Plin. 37, c. 2.

PADUSA, the most southern mouth of the Po. It was said to abound in swans, and from it there was a cut to the town of Ravenna. [It is now the Po di Primaro. vid. Padus.] Virg. Æn. 11, v. 455.

PÆAN, a surname of Apollo, derived from the word pæan, an hymn which was sung in his honour, because he had killed the serpent Python, which had given cause to the people to exclaim Io Pæan! The exclamation of Io Pæan! was made use of in speaking to the other gods, as it often was a demonstration of joy. [Damm derives the term Pæan, (Παιαν) from παύω, cessare facio, Apollo being honoured in hymns, as the divinity who protected from and caused evil to cease.] Juv. 6, v. 171.—Ovid. Met. 1, v. 538, l. 14, v. 720.—Lucan. 1, &c.—Strab. 18.

PÆMANI, a people of Belgic Gaul, supposed to dwell in the present country at the west of Luxemburg. Ces. G. 2, c. 4.

PÆON, a celebrated physician during the Trojan war. From him physicians are sometimes called Pæonii, and herbs serviceable in medicinal processes, Pæonia herbe. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 769.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 535.

PÆONES, [a people of Macedonia, who inhabited the coast of Macedonia and the vicinity of Mount Rhodope, according to Dio Cassius. Herodotus places them on the banks of the Strymon; and Ptolemy assigns to them the parts of Macedonia towards the sources of the Helicæon.] Paus. 5, c. 1.—Herodot. 5, c. 13, &c.

PÆONIA, [a country of Macedonia, deriving its name from Pæon, the son of Endymion. vid. Pæones.] Liv. 42, c. 51, l. 45, c. 29.

PÆONIDES, a name given to the daughters of Pæon, who were defeated by the Muses, because their mother was a native of Pæonia. Ovid. Met. 5, ult. fab.

PÆSOS, a town of the Hellespont, called also Apæsos, situated at the north of Lampsacus. When it was destroyed the inhabitants migrated to Lampsacus, where they settled. They were of Milesian origin. Strab. 13.—Homer. Il. 2.

PÆSTUM, a town of Lucania, called also Neptunia, and Posidonia by the Greeks, where the soil produced roses which blossomed twice a year. The ancient walls of the town, about three miles in extent, are still standing, and likewise venerable remains of temples and porticoes. The Sinus Pastanus, on which it stood, is now called the gulf of Salerno. [Pæstum was founded by a colony from Sybaris, and its original name was Posidonia. It became a very flourishing city after the overthrow of the parent state, and its ruins still attest its former magnificence. The Lucanians, however, subsequently dispossessed the Sybarites, and checked the prosperity of Posidonia. Under the Roman dominion an effort was made to revive the ancient city, and a colony was sent to it, but the attempt never completely succeeded; and though the Roman poets expatiate with delight upon its beautiful gardens and scenery, the place itself never recovered its former importance. Under the Romans the name first appears to have been changed to Pæstum. The learned Mazzochi is in error when he makes this city of Phœnician origin, and its name Pæstum to have been the more ancient of the two, originating from the Phœnician word Posetan or Postan, an appellation, according to him, for Neptune. Nothing can be more fallacious than Phœnician etymologies. The city was plundered in a later age by the Saracens and Normans successively. Its ruins, however, are in some respects more perfect than those of any other city in Italy, and equally as magnificent. In their solidity, bordering on heaviness, they seem to form an intermediate link between the Egyptian and Etrurian manner. They mark the earlier stages of the Doric. The walls of the town remain in all their circumference, five at least, and in some places twelve, feet high. They are formed of solid blocks of stone with towers at intervals. The roses of Pæstum still, according to travellers, support their ancient frame by their fragrance, and by their blossoming twice a year, in May and in December. A stream, called Solofone, flows under the walls, and by spreading its waters over its low borders, and thus producing pools that corrupt in hot weather, continues, as in ancient times, to infect the air, and render Pæstum a dangerous residence in summer.] *Virg. CÆCINNA PÆTUS, the husband of Arria. (vid. Arria.)

PAGASÆ or PAGASA, a town of Magnesia, in Macedonia, with an harbour and a promontory of the same name. The ship Argo was built there, as some suppose, and, according to Propertius, the Argonauts set sail from that harbour. From that circumstance not only the ship Argo, but also the Argonauts themselves, were ever after distinguished by the epithet of Pagasæus. [The place whence the Argo set sail was rather the port of Aphetæ. vid. Aphetæ. The term Pagasæus refers to the gulf on which Aphetæ was situated more than to the city of Pagasæ.] Pliny confounds Pagasæ with Demetrias, but they are different, and the latter was peopled by the inhabitants of the former, who preferred the situation of Demetrias for its conveniences. *Ovid. PALÆPHĀTUS, an ancient Greek philosopher, whose age is unknown, though it can be ascertained that he flourished between the times of Aristotle and Augustus. He wrote 5 books de incredibilibus, of which only the first remains, and in it he endeavours to explain fabulous and mythological traditions by historical facts. The best edition of Palæphatus is that of J. Frid. Fischer, in 8vo. Lisp. 1773. [There were several ancient writers named Palæphatus, one an Athenian, placed by the poets before the time of Homer; one a native of Paros, who lived under Artaxerxes Mneumon, and one a grammarian and philosopher, born at Athens or in Egypt, posterior to Aristotle. The greatest number of authorities are in favour of the latter, as the author of the work de incredibilibus, or περι απιστων.]

PALÆSTĪNA, [a district of Asia, deriving its name from the Philistæi or Philistines who inhabited the coast. As it was the promised inheritance of the seed of Abraham, and the scene of the birth, sufferings, and death of our Redeemer, we are accustomed to designate it by the more religious appellation of the Holy Land. It was bounded on the north by Phœnicia and Cœlesyria, on the east by Arabia Deserta, on the south by Arabia Pe- traea, and on the west by the Mediterranean, called in Scripture the Great Sea. On the western side of the Jordan were the three districts of Judæa in the south, Samaria in the middle, and Galilæa in the north. Moses has described its great fertility, Deut. 8, 7, &c; and it is said to have exceeded even the celebrated land of Egypt in the number of cattle which it bred, and in the quantity and excellence of the oil, corn, wine, and various fruits which it yielded. Its fecundity has been extolled even by Julian the Apostate. The visible effects of divine displeasure which this country has experienced, not only under Titus, but much more since that emperor's time in the inundations of the northern barbarians, of the Saracens, of the Crusaders, and the oppression it now feels under the Turkish yoke, are causes more than sufficient to have reduced the greater part of it to its present state, a mere desert. The Turks moreover neither protect the agriculturalist from the incursions of the Arab, nor afford him any encouragement; and yet it is the unanimous testimony of travellers in regard to this country, that where it is cultivated it is extremely fertile. It produces all sorts of fruit trees; and vines are not wanting, although the Mahometans do not drink wine.] Herodot. 1, c. 105.—Sil. It. 3, v. 606.—Strab. 16.

PALÆSTINUS, an ancient name of the river Strymon.

PALÆTYRUS, the ancient town of Tyre on the continent. [vid. Tyrus.] Strab. 16.

PALAMÈDES, a Grecian chief, son of Nauplius, king of Eubœa by Clymene. He was sent by the Greek princes who were going to the Trojan war to bring Ulysses to the camp, who, to withdraw himself from the expedition, pretended insanity; and the better to impose upon his friends, used to harness different animals to a plough, and sow salt instead of barley into the furrows. The deceit was soon perceived by Palamedes; he knew that the regret to part from his wife Penelope, whom he had lately married, was the only reason of the pretended insanity of Ulysses; and to demonstrate this, Palamedes took Telemachus, whom Penelope had lately brought into the world, and put him before the plough of his father. Ulysses showed that he was not insane by turning the plough a different way not to hurt his child. This having been discovered, Ulysses was obliged to attend the Greek princes to the war, but an immortal enmity arose between Ulysses and Palamedes. The king of Ithaca resolved to take every opportunity to distress him; and when all his expectations were frustrated, he had the meanness to bribe one of his servants, and to make him dig a hole in his master's tent, and there conceal a large sum of money. After this Ulysses forged a letter in Phrygian characters, which king Priam was supposed to have sent to Palamedes. In the letter the Trojan king seemed to entreat Palamedes to deliver into his hands the Grecian army, according to the conditions which had been previously agreed upon when he received the money. This forged letter was carried by means of Ulysses before the princes of the Grecian army. Palamedes was summoned, and he made the most solemn protestations of innocence, but all was in vain; the money that was discovered in his tent served only to corroborate the accusation. He was found guilty by all the army and stoned to death. Homer is silent about the miserable fate of Palamedes, and Pausanias mentions that it had been reported by some that Ulysses and Diomedes had drowned him in the sea as he was fishing on the coast. Philostratus, who mentions the tragical story above related, adds that Achilles and Ajax buried his body with great pomp on the sea-shore, and that they raised upon it a small chapel, where sacrifices were regularly offered by the inhabitants of Troas. Palamedes was a learned man as well as a soldier, and, according to some, he completed the alphabet of Cadmus by the addition of the four letters, θ , ξ , χ , ϕ , during the Trojan war. [A fragment of Euripides, preserved by Stobæus, ascribes to Palamedes the honour of the invention of the vowels. The meaning of this evidently is, that he was the first who conceived the idea of employing the four signs of aspiration in the Phœnician alphabet to express the vowel-sounds. Aristotle states that Epicharmus invented the ϕ and χ .] To him also is attributed the invention of dice and backgammon; and it is said he was the first who regularly ranged an army in a line of battle, and who placed sentinels round a camp, and excited their vigilance and attention by giving them a watchword. Hygin. fab. 95, 105, &c.—Apollod. 2, &c.—*Dictys. PALĀTINUS MONS, a celebrated hill, the largest of the seven hills on which Rome was built. It was upon it that Romulus laid the first foundation of the capital of Italy, in a quadrangular form, and there also he kept his court, as well as Tullus Hostilius and Augustus, and all the succeeding emperors; from which circumstance the word Palatium has ever since been applied to the residence of a monarch or prince. The Palatine hill received its name from the goddess Pales, or from the Palatini, who originally inhabited the place, or from balare or palare, the bleatings of sheep, which were frequent there, or perhaps from the word palantes, wandering, because Evander, when he came to settle in Italy, gathered all the inhabitants, and made them all one society. There were some games celebrated in honour of Augustus, and called Palatine, because kept on the hill. Dio. Cass. 53.—Ital. 12, v. 709.—Liv. 1, c. 7 and 33.—*Ovid. His temple there had been built, or rather repaired by Augustus, who had enriched it with a library, valuable for the various collections of Greek and Latin manuscripts which it contained, as also for the Sibylline books deposited there. Horat. 1, ep. 3, v. 17.

PALANTIUM, a town of Arcadia. [vid Roma.]

PALES, the goddess of sheepfolds and of pastures among the Romans. She was worshipped with great solemnity at Rome, and her festivals, called Palilia, were celebrated the very day that Romulus began to lay the foundation of the city of Rome, [21st of April.] *Virg. PALIBOTHTA, a city of India, supposed now to be Patna, or, according to others, Allahabad. Strab. 15.

PALICI, or PALISCI, two deities, sons of Jupiter by Thalia, whom Æschylus calls Ætina, in a tragedy which is now lost, according to the words of Macrobius. The nymph Ætina, when pregnant, entreated her lover to remove her from the pursuits of Juno. The god concealed her in the bowels of the earth, and when the time of her delivery was come, the earth opened and brought into the world two children, who received the name of Palici, απο του πλινυισθααι, because they came again into the world from the bowels of the earth. These deities were worshipped with great ceremonies by the Sicilians, and near their temple were two small lakes of sulphureous water, which were supposed to have sprang out of the earth at the same time that they were born. Near these pools it was usual to take the most solemn oaths, by those who wished to decide controversies and quarrels. If any of the persons who took the oath prejured themselves, they were immediately punished in a supernatural manner by the deities of the place, and those whose oath was sincere departed unhurt. The Palici had also an oracle which was consulted upon great emergencies, and which rendered the truest and most unequivocal answers. In a superstitious age, the altars of the Palici were stained with the blood of human sacrifices, but this barbarous custom was soon abolished, and the deities were satisfied with their usual offerings. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 585.—Ovid. Met. 5, v. 506.—Diod. 2.—Macrob. Saturn. 4, c. 10.—Ital. 14, v. 219.

PALILIA, a festival celebrated by the Romans, in honour of the goddess Pales. The ceremony consisted in bringing heaps of straw, and in leaping over them. No sacrifices were offered, but the purifications were made with the smoke of horses' blood, and with the ashes of a calf that had been taken from the belly of his mother after it had been sacrificed, and with the ashes of beans. The purification of the flocks was also made with the smoke of sulphur, of the olive, the pine, the laurel, and the rosemary. Offerings of mild cheese, boiled wine, and cakes of millet, were afterwards made to the goddess. This festival was observed on the 21st of April, and it was during the celebration that Romulus first began to build the city. Some call this festival Parilia, quasi pariendo, because the sacrifices were offered to the divinity for the fecundity of the flocks. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 774. Fast. 4, v. 721, &c. l. 6, v. 257.—Propert. 4, el. 1, v. 19.—Tibull. 2, el. 5, v. 87.

PALINURUS, a skilful pilot of the ship of Æneas. He fell into the sea in his sleep, and was three days exposed to the tempests and the waves of the sea, and at last came safe to land near Velia, where the cruel inhabitants of the place murdered him to obtain his clothes. His body was left unburied on the sea-shore; and as, according to the religion of the ancient Romans, no person was suffered to cross the Stygian lake before one hundred years were elapsed, if his remains had not been decently buried, we find Æneas, when he visited the infernal regions, speaking to Palinurus, and assuring him, that though his bones were deprived of a funeral, yet the place where his body was exposed should soon be adorned with a monument, and bear his name; and accordingly a promontory was called Palinurus, now Palinuro. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 513, l. 5, v. 840, &c. l. 6, v. 341.—Ovid. de Rem. 577.—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Strab.—Horat. 3, od. 4, v. 28.

PALISCÖRUM, or PALICÖRUM STAGNUM, a sulphureous pool in Sicily. [vid Palici.]

PALIÛRUS, now Nahil, a river [in the north-western part of Marmarica in Africa, flowing into the Mediterranean.] It had a town of the same name at its mouth. Strab. 17.

PALLÆDES, certain virgins of illustrious parents, who were consecrated to Jupiter by the Thebans of Egypt. It was required that they should prostitute themselves, an infamous custom, which was considered as a purification, during which they were publicly mourned, and afterwards they were permitted to marry. Strab. 17.

PALLÄDIUM, a celebrated statue of Pallas. It was about three cubits high, and represented the goddess as sitting and holding a pike in her right hand, and in her left a distaff and a spindle. It fell down from heaven near the tent of Ilus, as that prince was building the citadel of Ilium. Some nevertheless suppose that it fell at Pessinus in Phrygia, or, according to others, Dardanus received it as a present from his mother Electra. There are some authors who maintain that the Palladium was made with the bones of Pelops by Abaris; but Apollodorus seems to say, that it was no more than a piece of clock-work which moved of itself. However discordant the opinions of ancient authors be about this famous statue, it is universally agreed, that on its preservation depended the safety of Troy. This fatality was well known to the Greeks during the Trojan war, and therefore Ulysses and Diomedes determined to steal it away. They effected their purpose, and if we rely upon the authority of some authors, they were directed how to carry it away by Helenus, the son of Priam, who proved, in this, unfaithful to his country, because his brother Deiphobus.

at the death of Paris, had married Helen, of whom he was enamoured. Minerva was displeased with the violence which was offered to her statue, and, according to Virgil, the Palladium itself appeared to have received life and motion, and by the flashes which started from its eyes, and its sudden springs from the earth, it seemed to show the resentment of the goddess. The true Palladium, as some authors observe, was not carried away from Troy by the Greeks, but only one of the statues of similar size and shape, which were placed near it to deceive whatever sacrilegious persons attempted to steal it. The Palladium, therefore, as they say, was conveyed safe from Troy to Italy by Æneas, and it was afterwards preserved by the Romans with the greatest secrecy and veneration, in the temple of Vesta, a circumstance which none but the vestal virgins knew. Herodian. 1, c. 14, &c.—*Ovid. PALLADIUS, [an eastern prelate and ecclesiastical writer, a native of Galatia, born about A. D. 368. He was made bishop of Hellenopolis in Bithynia. He was ordained by Chrysostom, to whose party he attached himself, and, on the banishment of Chrysostom in 404, fell under persecution, and being obliged to withdraw from his see, retired to Italy and took refuge at Rome. Some time after, venturing to return to the east, he was banished to Syene. Having regained his liberty, he resigned the see of Hellenopolis, and was appointed to the bishopric of Alexandria. He is thought to have died A. D. 431. He wrote the Lausiatic history about the year 421, which contains the lives of persons who were at that time eminent for their extraordinary austerities in Egypt and Palestine. It was so called from Lausus, a man of the imperial court at Constantinople, to whom it is inscribed. It is by no means certain whether Palladius author of the Lausiatic History, and Palladius author of the life of Chrysostom, were different persons, or one and the same. Dupin thinks that these were the productions of the same person; Tillemont and Fabricius adopt the opposite opinion. The best edition of the history is that of Meursius, L. Bat. 1616.]—A Greek physician, whose treatise on fevers was edited 8vo. L. Bat. 1745.

PALLANTĒUM, a town of Italy, or perhaps more properly a citadel, built by Evander on Mount Palatine, from whence its name originates. [vid. Roma.] Virgil says, it was called after Pallas, the grandfather of Evander; but Dionysius derives its name from Palantium, a town of Arcadia. Dionys. 1, c. 31.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 54 and 341.

PALLANTĪA, a town of Spain, now Palencia, on the river Cea. Mela, 2, c. 6.

PALLANTIAS, a patronymic of Aurora, as the giant Pallas. Ovid. Met. 9, fab. 12.

PALLANTĪDES, the 50 sons of Pallas, the son of Pandion, and the brother of Ægeus. They were all killed by Theseus, the son of Ægeus, whom they opposed when he came to take possession of his father's kingdom. This opposition they showed in hopes of succeeding to the throne, as Ægeus left no children, except Theseus, whose legitimacy was even disputed, as he was born at Træzene. Plut. in Thes.—Paus. 1, c. 22.

PALLAS, (adis), a daughter of Jupiter, the same as Minerva. The goddess received this name, either because she killed the giant Pallas, or perhaps from the spear which she seems to brandish in her hands (παλλων.) For the functions, power, and character of the goddess, vid. Minerva.

PALLAS, (antis), a son of king Evander, sent with some troops to assist Æneas. He was killed by Turnus, the king of the Rutuli, after he had made a great slaughter of the enemy. Virg. Æn. 8, v. 104, &c.—One of the giants, son of Tartarus and Terra. He was killed by Minerva, who covered herself with his skin, whence, as some suppose, she is called Pallas. Apollod. 3, c. 12.—A freedman of Claudius, famous for the power and the riches he obtained. He advised the emperor, his master, to marry Agrippina, and to adopt her son Nero for his successor. It was by his means, and those of Agrippina, that the death of Claudius was hastened, and that Nero was raised to the throne. Nero forgot to whom he was indebted for the crown. He discarded Pallas, and some time after caused him to be put to death, that he might make himself master of his great riches, A. D. 61. Tacit. 12, Ann. c. 53.

PALLENE, [a small peninsula of Macedonia, one of the three which form the southern part of the district of Chalcidice. It was situate between the Sinus Thermaicus, or Gulf of Saloniki, and the Sinus Toronaicus, or Gulf of Cassandria. It was also called Phlegra, a name derived from φλεγω, υρη, and having reference to a battle and overthrow of the giants in this place.] It contained five cities, the principal of which was called Pallene. Liv. 31, c. 45, l. 45, c. 30.—Virg. G. 4, v. 391.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 357.—A village of Attica, where Minerva had a temple, and where the Pallantides chiefly resided. Herodot. 1, c. 161.—Plut. in Thes.

PALMARIA, a small island opposite Tarracina in Latium. Plin. 3, c. 6.

PALMYRA, the capital of Palmyrene, a country on the eastern boundaries of Syria, now called Theudemor, or Tadmor. It is famous for being the seat of the celebrated Zenobia and of Odenatus, in the reign of the emperor Aurelian. It is now in ruins, and the splendour and magnificence of its porticoes, temples, and palaces, are now daily examined by the curious and the learned. [This city appears to have been originally built by Solomon, and called Tadmor, (1 Kings, ix. 18. 2 Chron. viii. 4.) Josephus assures us, that this was the same city which the Greeks and Romans afterwards called Palmyra. It is still called Tadmor by the Arabs of the country. But many circumstances, besides the style of the buildings, render it probable that the present ruins are not those of the city built by Solomon, though neither history nor tradition mention the building of any other. Palmyra was built on a fertile spot in the midst of a desert. The name Tadmor, as well as that of Palmyra, had reference to the multitude of palm trees by which the city was surrounded. Its situation was extremely favourable for the caravan trade, and it became in a short time a rich and powerful city. It seems to have early passed out of the power of the Jewish nation, probably soon after the death of Solomon, and to have been annexed to the Persian empire, and afterwards to that of the Seleucidæ. It sided with the Romans in the reign of Adrian, during the Parthian war, and was greatly embellished by that prince. After the capture of Zenobia it was given up to the emperor Aurelian, but the inhabitants having revolted on his departure, he returned, destroyed the city, and put nearly all to the sword. He afterwards attempted to restore it, but in vain; it gradually sank into an obscure town, a trifling fortress, and at last a miserable village. With respect to the ruins of this city, they appear to be of two different and distinct periods: the oldest are so far decayed as not to admit of admeasurement, and seem to have been reduced to that state by the hand of time; the others appear to have been broken by the hand of violence. It is sometimes made a subject of inquiry, why Palmyra was built in the midst of deserts? The true answer is, that as soon as the springs of Palmyra were discovered by those who traversed the desert, a settlement was made on the spot for the purpose of carrying on the trade with India, and preserving an intercourse between the Mediterranean and Red Sea.] Plin. 6, c. 26 and 30.

PAMISOS, a river of Thessaly, falling into the Peneus. Herodot. 7, c. 129.—Plin. 4, c. 8.—Another of Messenia in Peloponnesus.

PAMMÈNES, a learned Grecian, who was preceptor to Brutus. Cic. Brut. 97. Orat. 9.

PAMPHILUS, a celebrated painter of Macedonia, in the age of Philip, distinguished above his rivals by a superior knowledge of literature, and the cultivation of those studies which taught him to infuse more successfully grace and dignity into his pieces. He was founder of the school for painting at Sicyon, and he made a law which was observed not only in Sicyon, but all over Greece, that none but the children of noble and dignified persons should be permitted to learn painting. Apelles was one of his pupils. Diog.

PAMPHOS, a Greek poet, supposed to have lived before Hesiod's age.

PAMPHÛLA, a Greek woman, who wrote a general history in 33 books, in Nero's reign. This history, so much commended by the ancients, is lost.

PAMPHÛLIA, a province of Asir Minor, anciently called Mopsopia, and bounded on the south by a part of the Mediterranean, called the Pamphylian Sea, west by Lycia, north by Pisidia, and east by Cilicia. [The name Pamphylia is said to come from πας, omnis, and φύλη, tribus, and to have been applied to this tract of country, from the circumstance of many and various tribes of Greeks settling here under Amphilochus and Calchas, after the destruction of Troy.] It abounded with pastures, vines, and olives. Strab. 14.—Mela, 1.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Plin. 5, c. 26.—Liv. 37, c. 23 and 40.

PAN, was the god of shepherds, of huntsmen, and of all the inhabitants of the country. He was the son of Mercury by Dryope, according to Homer. Some give him Jupiter and Callisto for parents, others Jupiter and Ybis or Oneis. Lucian, Hyginus, &c. support that he was the son of Mercury and Penelope, the daughter of Icarius, and that the god gained the affections of the princess under the form of a goat, as she tended her father's flocks on Mount Taygetus, before her marriage with the king of Ithaca. Some authors maintain that Penelope became mother of Pan during the absence of Ulysses in the Trojan war, and that he was the offspring of all the suitors that frequented the palace of Penelope, whence he received the name of Pan, which signifies all or every thing. Pan was a monster in appearance, he had two small horns on his head, his complexion was ruddy, his nose flat, and his legs, thighs, tail, and feet, were those of a goat. The education of Pan was intrusted to a nymph of Arcadia, called Sinoe, but the nurse, according to Homer, terrified at the sight of such a monster, fled away and left him. He was wrapped up in the skin of beasts by his father, and carried to heaven, where Jupiter and the gods long entertained themselves with the oddity of his appearance. Bacchus was greatly pleased with him, and gave him the name of Pan. The god of shepherds chiefly resided in Arcadia, where the woods and the most rugged mountains were his habitation. He invented the flute with seven reeds, which he called Syrinx, in honour of a beautiful nymph of the same name, to whom he attempted to offer violence, and was changed into a reed. He was continually employed in deceiving the neighbouring nymphs, and often with success. Though deformed in his shape and features, yet he had the good fortune to captivate Diana, and of gaining her favour, by transforming himself into a beautiful white goat. He was also enamoured of a nymph of the mountains, called Echo, by whom he had a son called Lynx. He also paid his addresses to Omphale, queen of Lydia, and it is well known in what manner he was received. [vid. Omphale.] The worship of Pan was well established, particularly in Arcadia, where he gave oracles on Mount Lycæus. His festivals, called by the Greeks Lycæa, were brought to Italy by Evander, and they were well known at Rome by the name of the Lupercalia. [vid. Lupercalia.] The worship, and the different functions of Pan, are derived from the mythology of the ancient Egyptians. This god was one of the eight great gods of the Egyptians, who ranked before the other 12 gods, whom the Romans called Consentes. He was worshipped with the greatest solemnity all over Egypt. His statues represented him as a goat, not because he was really such, but this was done for mysterious reasons. He was the emblem of fecundity, and they looked upon him as the principle of all things. His horns, as some observed, represented the rays of the sun, and the brightness of the heavens was expressed by the vivacity and the ruddiness of his complexion. The star which he wore on his breast was the symbol of the firmament, and his hairy legs and feet denoted the inferior parts of the earth, such as the woods and plants. Some suppose that he appeared as a goat because, when the gods fled into Egypt in their war against the giants, Pan transformed himself into a goat, an example which was immediately followed by all the deities. Pan, according to some, is the same as Faunus, and he is the chief of all the Satyrs. Plutarch mentions, that in the reign of Tiberius, an extraordinary voice was heard near the Echinades in the Ionian Sea, which exclaimed that the great Pan was dead. This was readily believed by the emperor, and the astrologers were consulted, but they were unable to explain the meaning of so supernatural a voice, which probably proceeded from the imposition of one of the courtiers who attempted to terrify Tiberius. In Egypt, in the town of Mendes, which word also signifies a goat, there was a sacred goat kept with the most ceremonious sanctity. The death of this animal was always attended with the greatest solemnities, and, like that of another Apis, became the cause of an universal mourning. As Pan usually terrified the inhabitants of the neighbouring country, that kind of fear which often seizes men, and which is only ideal and imaginary, has received from him the name of panic fear. This kind of terror has been exemplified not only in individuals, but in numerous armies, such as that of Brennus, which was thrown into the greatest consternation at Rome, without any cause or plausible reason. [Polyænus makes Pan a general of Bacchus, and attributes to him the invention of the order of battle, and of the distribution of an army into right and left wings or horns, whence it is said he derived his horns. He ascribes to him also the art of striking terror into a foe by stratagem and address, whence the expression, panic terrors.] Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 396, l. 2, v. 277. Met. 1, v. 639.—*Virg. PANACEA, a goddess, daughter of Æsculapius, who presided over health. [The term is derived from παν, every thing, and αναιμα,

I cure. This word is applied among medical practitioners to an universal remedy, or one that is capable of curing all diseases. The idea, however, of a panacea is now justly exploded by enlightened physicians. There were three panaceas held in high value among the ancients, the Heracleian, the Asclepian, and the Chironian; the first is termed in English, true all-heal of Hercules, from the root and stem of which is drawn by incision the gum opopanax; the second is a kind of ferula; the third Doria's woodwort.] Lucan. 9, v. 918.—Plin. 35, c. 11, &c.

PANÆTIUS, a stoic philosopher of Rhodes, 138 B. C. He studied at Athens for some time, of which he refused to become a citizen, observing, that a good and modest man ought to be satisfied with one country. He came to Rome where he reckoned among his pupils Lælius and Scipio the second Africanus. To the latter he was attached by the closest ties of friendship and familiarity, he attended him in his expeditions and partook of all his pleasures and amusements. To the interest of their countrymen at Rome the Rhodians were greatly indebted for their prosperity, and the immunities which they for some time enjoyed. Panætius wrote a treatise on the duties of man, whose merit can be ascertained from the encomiums which Cicero bestows upon it. Cic. in Offic. de Div. 1. In Acad. 2, c. 2. de N. D. 2, c. 46.

PANATHENÆA, festivals in honour of Minerva the patroness of Athens. They were first instituted by Erectheus or Orpheus, and called Athenæa, but Theseus afterwards renewed them, and caused them to be celebrated and observed by all the tribes of Athens, which he had united into one, and from which reason the festivals received their name. Some suppose that they are the same as the Roman Quinquatria, as they are often called by that name among the Latins. In the first years of the institution, they were observed only during one day, but afterwards the time was prolonged, and the celebration was attended with greater pomp and solemnity. The festivals were two; the great Panathæa (μεγαρα), which were observed every 5th year, beginning on the 22d of the month called Hecatombæon, on 7th of July, and the lesser Panathæna (μικρα); which were kept every 3d year, or rather annually, beginning on the 21st or 20th of the month called Thargelion, corresponding to the 5th or 6th day of the month of May. In the lesser festivals there were three games conducted by ten presidents chosen from the ten tribes of Athens, who continued four years in office. On the evening of the first day there was a race with torches, in which men on foot, and afterwards on horseback, contended. The same was also exhibited in the greater festivals. The second combat was gymnical, and exhibited a trial of strength and bodily dexterity. The last was a musical contention, first instituted by Pericles. In the songs they celebrated the generous undertaking of Harmodius and Aristogiton, who opposed the Pisistratidæ, and of Thrasylbulus, who delivered Athens from its thirty tyrants. Phrynus of Mitylene was the first who obtained the victory by playing upon the harp. There were besides other musical instruments, on which they played in concert, such as flutes, &c. The poets contended in four plays, called from their number τετραλογία. The last of these was a satire. There was also at Sunium an imitation of a naval fight. Whoever obtained the victory in any of these games was rewarded with a vessel of oil, which he was permitted to dispose of in whatever manner he pleased, and it was unlawful for any other person to transport that commodity. The conqueror also received a crown of the olives which grew in the groves of Academus, and were sacred to Minerva, and called μορταίαι, from μορτος, death, in remembrance of the tragical end of Hallirhotius, the son of Neptune, who cut his own legs when he attempted to cut down the olive which had given the victory to Minerva in preference to his father, when these two deities contended about giving a name to Athens. Some suppose that the word is derived from μερτος, a part, because these olives were given by contribution by all such as attended at the festivals. There was also a dance, called Pyrrhichia, performed by young boys in armour, in imitation of Minerva, who thus expressed her triumph over the vanquished Titans. Gladiators were also introduced when Athens became tributary to the Romans. During the celebration no person was permitted to appear in dyed garments, and if any one transgressed he was punished according to the discretion of the president of the games. After these things, a sumptuous sacrifice was offered, in which every one of the Athenian boroughs contributed an ox, and the whole was concluded by an entertainment for all the company with the flesh that remained from the sacrifice. In the greater festivals, the same rites and ceremonies were usually observed, but with more solemnity and magnificence. Others were also added, particularly the procession, in which Minerva's sacred πέπλος, or garment, was carried. This garment was woven by a select number of virgins, called εργασιμαίαι, from έργον, work. They were superintended by two of the αεθνηφοροι, or young virgins, not above seventeen years of age, nor under eleven, whose garments were white and set off with ornaments of gold. Minerva's peplos was of a white colour, without sleeves, and embroidered with gold. Upon it were described the achievements of the goddess, particularly her victories over the giants. The exploits of Jupiter and the other gods were also represented there, and from that circumstance men of courage and bravery are said to be αξιοι πεπλου, worthy to be portrayed in Minerva's sacred garment. In the procession of the peplos, the following ceremonies were observed. In the ceramicus, without the city, there was an engine built in the form of a ship, upon which Minerva's garment was hung as a sail, and the whole was conducted, not by beasts, as some have supposed, but by subterraneous machines, to the temple of Ceres Eleusinia, and from thence to the citadel, where the peplos was placed upon Minerva's statue, which was laid upon a bed woven or strewed with flowers, which was called πλακίς. Persons of all ages, of every sex and quality, attended the procession, which was led by old men and women carrying olive branches in their hands, from which reason they were called Φαλληφοροι, bearers of green boughs. Next followed men of full ages with shields and spears. They were attended by the μετοικοι, or foreigners, who carried small boats as a token of their foreign origin, and from that account they were called σκαφηφοροι, boat-bearers. After them came the women attended by the wives of the foreigners called υδρηφοροι, because they carried water-pots. Next to these came young men crowned with millet, and singing hymns to the goddess, and after them followed select virgins of the noblest families, called κρηφοροι, basket-bearers, because they carried baskets, in which were certain things necessary for the celebration, with whatever utensils were also requisite. These several necessaries were generally in the possession of the chief manager of the festival, called αρχιδεωρος, who distributed them when occasion offered. The virgins were attended by the daughters of the foreigners who carried umbrellas and little seats, from which they were named διαρηφοροι, seat-carriers. The boys, called παιδαρμικοι, as it may be supposed, led the rear, clothed in coats generally worn at processions. The necessaries for this and every other festival were prepared in a public hall erected for that purpose, between the Piræan gate and the temple of Ceres. The management and the care of the whole was intrusted to the νομοφυλακας, or people employed in seeing the rites and ceremonies properly observed. It was also usual to set all prisoners at liberty, and to present golden crowns to such as had deserved well of their country. Some persons were also chosen to sing some of Homer's poems, a custom which was first introduced by Hipparchus the son of Pisistratus. It was also customary in this festival and every other quinquennial festival, to pray for the prosperity of the Plataeans, whose services had been so conspicuous at the battle of Marathon. Plut. in Thes.—Paus. Arc. 2.—Ælian. V. H. 8, c. 2.—Apollod. 3, c. 14.

PANCHÆA, PANCHEÆA, or Panchaia, an island of Arabia Felix, where Jupiter Triphylus had a magnificent temple. [According to Diodorus Siculus, it was inhabited by natives of the country, and also by Indians, Cretans, and Scythians. He relates many particulars of a marvellous nature respecting it. The chief town was Panara, whose inhabitants were singularly happy according to Diodorus. There were besides three other towns, Hiracia, Dabi, and Oceanis; but the existence of such an island is very doubtful.]—A part of Arabia Felix, celebrated for the myrrh, frankincense, and perfumes which it produced.

PANDA, two deities at Rome, who presided one over the openings of roads, and the other over the openings of towns. Varro de P. R. 1. A. Gell. 13, c. 22.

PANDARUS, a son of Lycaon, who assisted the Trojans in their war against the Greeks. He went to the war without a chariot, and therefore he generally fought on foot. He broke the truce which had been agreed upon between the Greeks and Trojans, and wounded Menelaus and Diomedes, and showed himself brave and unusually courageous. He was at last killed by Diomedes; and Æneas, who then carried him in his chariot, by attempting to revenge his death, nearly perished by the hand of the furious enemy. Dictys. Cre. 2, c. 35.—Homer. Il. 2 and 5.—Hygin. fab. 112.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 495.—Strab. 14.—Servius in loco.—A native of Crete punished with death for being accessory to the theft of Tantalus. What this theft was is unknown. Some, however, suppose that Tantalus stole the ambrosia and the nectar from the table of the gods to which he had been admitted, or that he carried away a dog which watched Jupiter's temple in Crete, in which crimes Pandarus was concerned, and for which he suffered. Pandarus had two daughters, Camiro and Clytia, who were also deprived of their mother by a sudden death, and left without friends or protectors. Venus had compassion upon them, and she fed them with milk, honey, and wine. The goddesses were all equally interested in their welfare. Juno gave them wisdom and beauty, Diana a handsome figure and regular features, and Minerva instructed them in whatever domestic accomplishments can recommend a wife. Venus wished still to make their happiness more complete; and when they were come to nubile years the goddess prayed Jupiter to grant them kind and tender husbands. But in her absence the Harpies carried away the virgins and delivered them to the Eumenides to share the punishment which their father suffered. Paus. 10, c. 30.—Pindar.

PANDATARIA, [an island in the Mare Tyrrhenum, in the Sinus Puteolanus, on the coast of Italy. It was the place of banishment for Julia the daughter of Augustus, and many others. It is now called Santa Maria.]

PANDEMIA, a surname of Venus, expressive of her great power over the affections of mankind.

PANDEMUS, one of the surnames of the god of love among the Egyptians and the Greeks, who distinguished two Cupids, one of whom was the vulgar called Pandemus, and another of a purer and more celestial origin. Plut. in Erol.

PANDIA, a festival at Athens established by Pandion, from whom it received its name, or because it was observed in honour of Jupiter, who can τα πάντα δειναι, move and turn all things as he pleases. Some suppose that it concerned the moon, because it does πάντοτε levas, move incessantly by showing itself day and night, rather than the sun which never appears but in the day-time. It was celebrated after the Dionysia, because Bacchus is sometimes taken for the Sun or Apollo, and therefore the brother, or, as some will have it, the son of the moon.

PANDION, a king of Athens, son of Erichthon and Pasithea, who succeeded his father B. C. 1437. [vid. end of this article.] He became father of Procne and Philomela, Erectheus, and Butes. During his reign there was such an abundance of corn, wine, and oil, that it was publicly reported that Bacchus and Minerva had personally visited Attica. He waged a successful war against Labdachus, king of Bœotia, and gave his daughter Procne in marriage to Tereus, king of Thrace, who had assisted him. The treatment which Philomela received from her brother-in-law, Tereus, (vid. Philomela), was the source of infinite grief to Pandion, and he died, through excess of sorrow, after a reign of 40 years. There was also another Pandion, son of Cecrops 2d, by Metiaduca, who succeeded to his father, B. C. 130. He was driven from his paternal dominions, and fled to Pylas, king of Megara, who gave him his daughter Pelia in marriage, and resigned his crown to him. Pandion became father of four children, called from him Pandionide, Ægeus, Pallas, Nisus, and Lycus. The eldest of these children recovered his father's kingdom. Some authors have confounded the two Pandions together in such an indiscriminate manner, that they seem to have been only one and the same person. Many believe that Philomela and Procne were the daughters, not of Pandion the 1st, but of Pandion the 2d. [There seems to be some analogy between the name Pandion and the Brahminical system of belief. Among the old dynasties of the Hindoos mention is made of a race of heroes named Pandus, who triumphed over their opponents the Koros; and the latter are therefore denominated, in the sacred songs of the East, the race of evil princes. In the time even when the Periplus recorded by Arrian was effected, we find a monarch of the name of Pandion in South Decan, to whose dominions the pearl-fishery belonged; and Ptolemy (7, c. 1, p. 174,) makes Modoura the residence of Pandion. It is curious to observe that in the sacred traditions of the East, a place named Madura or Mathura, on the upper part of the Ganges, is the home of Crishnoo, who is celebrated as having been the friend of the Pandus in Mahabarat.] Ovid. Met. 6, v. 676.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Paus. 1, c. 5.—Hygin. fab. 48.

PANDORA, a celebrated woman, the first mortal female that ever lived, according to the opinion of the poet Hesiod. She was made with clay by Vulcan, at the request of Jupiter, who wished to punish the impiety and artifice of Prometheus, by giving him a wife. When this woman of clay had been made by the artist, and received life, all the gods vied in making her presents. Venus gave her beauty and the art of pleasing; the Graces gave her the power of captivating; Apollo taught her how to sing; Mercury instructed her in eloquence; and Minerva gave her the most rich and splendid ornaments. From all these valuable presents, which she had received from the gods, the woman was called Pandora, which intimates that she had received every necessary gift, παν δωρον. Jupiter after this gave her a beautiful box, which she was ordered to present to the man who married her; and by the commission of the god, Mercury conducted her to Prometheus. The artful mortal was sensible of the deceit, and as he had always distrusted Jupiter, as well as the rest of the gods, since he had stolen fire away from the sun to animate his man of clay, he sent away Pandora without suffering himself to be captivated by her charms. His brother Epimetheus was not possessed of the same prudence and sagacity. He married Pandora, and when he opened the box which she presented to him, there issued from it a multitude of evils and distempers, which dispersed themselves all over the world, and which, from that fatal moment, have never ceased to afflict the human race. Hope was the only one who remained at the bottom of the box, and it is she alone who has the wonderful power of easing the labours of man, and of rendering his troubles and his sorrows less painful in life. [The story of the box brought by Pandora is of a more recent date than that stated by Hesiod. The elder fable is as follows: There was a cask or large box (πιθος) in the house of Epimetheus, which an oracle had forbidden to be opened. Pandora, full of curiosity, lifted the fatal lid, and immediately all evils issued forth and spread themselves over the earth. The terrified female at length regained sufficient presence of mind to close the lid, and hope thereupon was alone secured. There is a curious analogy between this more ancient tradition and the account of the fall of our first parents as detailed by the inspired penman. Prometheus, or forethought, may denote the purity and wisdom of our early progenitor before he yielded to temptation; Epimetheus or afterthought is indicative of his change of resolution, and his yielding to the arguments of Eve; which the poet expresses by saying, that Epimetheus received Pandora after he had been cautioned by Prometheus not to do it. The curiosity of Pandora violates the injunction of the oracle, as our first parent Eve disregarded the commands of her Maker. Pandora, moreover, the author of all human woes, is the author likewise of their chief and in fact only solace; for she closed the lid of the fatal box before Hope could escape; and this she did, according to Hesiod, in compliance with the will of Jove. May not Hope thus secured be that hope and expectation of a Redeemer which has been traditional from the earliest ages of the world? Even so our first parents commit the fatal sin of disobedience, but from the seed of the woman, who was the first to offend, was to spring one who should be the hope and the only solace of our race.] Hesiod. Theog. & Dins.—Apollod. 1, c. 7.—Paus. 1, c. 24.—Hygin. 14.

PANDROSIA, [a town of Italy, in the territory of the Bruttii, on the western coast. It was founded by the Cœntrians, who made it the capital of their territory. It was situate on a small mountain, at the foot of which ran a small stream called Acheron.] Alexander, king of the Molossi, died here. Strab. 6.—A town of Epirus. Plin. 4, c. 1.

PANDROSOS, a daughter of Cœrops, king of Athens, sister to Aglauros and Herse. She was the only one of the sisters who had not the fatal curiosity to open a basket which Minerva had intrusted to their care, [vid. Erichonius,] for which sincerity a temple was raised to her near that of Minerva, and a festival instituted in her honour, called Pandrosia. Ovid. Met. 2, v. 738.—Apollod. 3.—Paus. 1, &c.

PANENUS, or PANÆUS, a celebrated painter, who was for some time engaged in painting the battle of Marathon. Plin. 35.

PANGÆUS, a mountain of Thrace, anciently called Mons Caraminus, and joined to Mount Rhodope near the sources of the river Nestus. It was inhabited by four different nations. It was on this mountain that Lycurgus, the Thracian king, was torn to pieces, and that Orpheus called the attention of the wild beasts and of the mountains and woods to listen to his song. It abounded in gold and silver mines. Herodot. 5, c. 16, &c. 1. 7, c. 113.—Virg. G. 4, v. 462.—Ovid. Fast. 3, v. 739.—Thucyd. 2.—Lucan. 1, v. 679, 1. 7, v. 482.

PANIONIUM, a place on Mount Mycale, sacred to Neptune of Helice. It was in this place that all the states of Ionia assembled, either to consult for their own safety and prosperity, or to celebrate festivals, or to offer a sacrifice for the good of all the nation, whence the name πανιονιον, all Ionia. The deputies of the twelve Ionian cities which assembled there were those of Miletus, Myus, Priene, Ephesus, Lebedos, Colophon, Clazomenæ, Phocæa, Teos, Chios, Samos, and Erythræ. If the bull offered in sacrifice bellowed, it was accounted an omen of the highest favour, as the sound was particularly acceptable to the god of the sea, as in some manner it resembled the roaring of the waves of the ocean. Herodot. 1, c. 148, &c.—Strab. 14.—Mela, 1, c. 17.

PANIUS [or PANEUS, a mountain of Syria, forming part of the chain of Mount Libanus. It makes part of the northern boundary of Palestine, and at the foot of it was situate the town of Paneas, afterwards called Cæsarea Philippi. Herod, out of gratitude for having been put in possession of Trachonitis by Augustus, erected a temple to that prince on the mountain. On the partition of the states of Herod among his children, Philip, who had the district Trachonitis, gave to the city Paneas the name of Cæsarea, to which was annexed for distinction sake the surname of Philippi. This did not, however, prevent the resumption of its primitive denomination, pronounced Banias, more purely than Belines, as it is written by the historians of the crusades.]—A place in Cœle-Syria, where Antiochus defeated Scopas B. C. 198.

PANNŌNIA, a large country of Europe, bounded on the east by Upper Mœsia, south by Dalmatia, west by Noricum, and north by the Danube. [It was during the war of Augustus with the Japydes that the Roman arms penetrated into Pannonia. It became a Roman province under Tiberius. In the time of Antonine, Pannonia was divided into Superior and Inferior, the former answering to part of Hungary, the latter to Slavonia. The separation between them was made by the river Arrabo or Raab. The more ancient inhabitants of Pannonia were the Scordisci and Torisci, who were in their origin Gauls. This country was occupied by a semi-barbarous people when Philip, king of Macedon, conquered it; they soon afterwards revolted and Alexander re-conquered them. Cæsar gained a settlement in part of it, and in passing to it, crossed what were hence called Alpes Juliæ. It became a Roman province, as has been already mentioned, under Tiberius. It was afterwards seized by the Goths, and wrested from them by the Huns. The chief city in Pannonia Superior was Carnuntum, now Allenbourg, a little to the east of Vindobona or Vienna. The chief city in Pannonia Inferior was Sirmium.] Lucan. 3, v. 95, l. 6, v. 220.—Tibull. 4, el. 1, v. 109.—Plin. 3.—Dion. Cass. 49.—Strab. 4 and 7.—Jordan.—Patere. 2, c. 9.—*Suet. PANOMPHÆUS, a surname of Jupiter, either because he was worshipped by every nation on earth, or because he heard the prayers and the supplications which were addressed to him, or because the rest of the gods derived from him their knowledge of futurity (παν, omnis, ὁμῶν vox.) Ovid. Met. 11, v. 198.—Homér. II. 8.

PANŌPE, or PANŌPEA, one of the Nereides, whom sailors generally invoked in storms. Her name signifies, giving every assistance, or seeing every thing. Hesiod. Theog. 251.—Virg. Æn. 5, v. 825.

PANŌPES, a famous huntsman among the attendants of Acestes king of Sicily, who was one of those that engaged in the games exhibited by Æneas. Virg. Æn. 5, v. 300.

PANŌPEUS, a son of Phocus and Asterodia, who accompanied Amphitryon when he made war against the Teleboans. He was father to Epeus who made the celebrated horse at the siege of Troy. Paus. 2, c. 29.—Apollod. 2, c. 4.—A town of Phocis, between Orchomenos and the Cephisus. Paus. 10, c. 4.—Strab. 9.

PANOPŌLIS, the city of Pan, a town of Egypt, called also Chemmis. Pan had there a temple, where he was worshipped with great solemnity. Diod. 5.—Strab. 17.

PANOPTES, a name of Argus, from the power of his eyes. Apollod. 2.

PANORMUS, now called Palermo, a town of Sicily, built by the Phœnicians on the northwest part of the island, with a good and capacious harbour. [The ancient name is derived from the excellence and capaciousness of the harbour, (παν, ἰσχυρός) and is equivalent to All-Port.] It was the strongest hold of the Carthaginians in Sicily, and it was at last taken with difficulty by the Romans. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Ital. 14, v. 262.—A town of the Thracian Chersonesus.—A town of Ionis, near Ephesus.—Another in Crete,—in Macedonia,—Achaia,—Samos.—A Messenian who insulted the religion of the Lacedæmonians. vid. Gonippus.

PANSA, C. Vibius, a Roman consul, who, with A. Hirtius, pursued the murderers of J. Cæsar, and was killed in a battle near Mutina. On his death-bed he advised young Octavius to unite his interest with that of Antony if he wished to revenge the death of Julius Cæsar, and from his friendly advice soon after rose the celebrated second triumvirate. Some suppose that Pansa was put to death by Octavius himself, or through him, by the physician Glicon, who poured poison into the wounds of his patient. Pansa and Hirtius were the two last consuls who enjoyed the dignity of chief magistrates of Rome with full power. The authority of the consul afterwards dwindled into a shadow. Patere. 2, c. 6.—Dio. 46.—Ovid. Trist. 3, el. 5.—Plut. & Appian.

PANTAGŶAS, a small river on the eastern coast of Sicily, which falls into the sea, after running a short space in rough cascades over rugged stones and precipices. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 639.—Ital. 14, v. 232.—Ovid. Fast. 4, v. 471.

PANTALĒON, a king of Pisa, who presided at the Olympic games, B. C. 664, after excluding the Eleans, who on that account expelled the Olympiad from the Fasti, and called it the 2d Anolympiad. They had called for the same reason the 8th the 1st Anolympiad, because the Pisæans presided.—An Ætolian chief. Liv. 42, c. 15.

PANTANUS' LACUS, the lake of Lesina, is situated in Apulia at the mouth of the Frento. Liv. 3, c. 12.

PANTHĒA, the wife of Abradates, celebrated for her beauty and conjugal affection. She was taken prisoner by Cyrus, who refused to visit her, not to be ensnared by the power of her personal charms. She killed herself on the body of her husband who had been slain in a battle, &c. [vid. Abradates.] Xenoph. Cyrop.—Suidas.

PANTHĒON, [a famous temple of a circular form, built by M. Agrippa, son-in-law of Augustus, in his third consulship, about 27 A. C. and repaired by Septimius Severus, and Caracalla. It was dedicated by Agrippa to Mars, and Jupiter the avenger, in memory of the victory obtained by Augustus over Antony and Cleopatra, as an inscription upon it indicates even now. "The name, the form, tradition, or some other cause," observes a late writer, "has given rise to the popular belief that it was dedicated to Jupiter and all the gods of antiquity (πανς θεῶς). But of this there is no proof; and it is inconsistent with the known principles of the Pagan religion, which forbade a temple to be dedicated to more than one divinity; and enjoined that even when vowed to two, as in the case of Virtue and Honour, Venus and Rome, Isis and Serapis, &c. a double temple should be raised, and one altar serve for their common worship. There was indeed one species of temple, a Delubrum, which might be devoted to the worship of several deities at once; and thus, though a temple could only be dedicated to one god, it might contain small Ædiculæ, or Chapels, for the worship of others. Indeed, the recesses and niches around the Pantheon are similar in form, though inferior in magnitude, to the great one, fronting the door where the image of Jupiter must have stood, and seem to indicate that they were formerly the Ædiculæ of pagan gods." Antiquaries and architects have been of various opinions respecting this edifice, which still remains; some imagine that it was only a vestibule to the baths of Agrippa, but all the ancient authors agree in calling it a temple. Others suppose that he merely made the portico, and the temple had been constructed previously by some other consul; and they found their opinion upon the difference of the architecture, that of the portico being better than the other part of the temple. It seems now, however, to be generally agreed that the body of the Rotunda is of earlier erection than the Portico, that it was built as an appendage to the public Baths of Agrippa, and that the portico was afterwards added in order to convert it into a temple. The portico is 103 feet long and 61 wide: it was formerly ascended by five steps, now, however, by only two. It is decorated with 16 magnificent pillars, all made out of one piece of oriental granite. They are of the Corinthian order. The plates of bronze, which covered the beams of the portico-ceiling, were removed by Urban 8th, partly for the construction of the great canopy of St. Peter's, and the rest for the guns at the Castle of St. Angelo; the nails alone weighed 9,374 pounds; the total weight of this bronze was more than forty five millions of pounds. The diameter of the temple itself is 132 feet, and the height from the pavement to the summit is the same, and 396 feet in circumference. The temple receives light from one circular opening in the middle of the ceiling. The Pantheon is now commonly called the "Rotunda," from its circular form. It was given to Boniface 4th by the emperor Phocas in 609, and was dedicated as a Christian church to the Virgin and the Holy Martyrs, a quantity of whose relics were placed under the great altar. In 830, Gregory 4th dedicated it to all the saints.] Plin. 36, c. 15.—Marcell. 16, c. 10.

PANTHEUS, or PANTHUS, a Trojan, son of Othryas the priest of Apollo. When Troy was burnt by the Greeks he followed the fortune of Æneas, and was killed. Virg. Æn. 2 v. 429.

PANTHOÏDES, a patronymic of Euphorbus, the son of Panthous. Pythagoras is sometimes called by that name, as he asserted that he was Euphorbus during the Trojan war. Horat. 1, od. 28, v. 10.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 161.

PANTICAPÆUM, now Kerche, a town of Taurica Chersonesus, built by the Milesians, and governed some time by its own laws, and afterwards subdued by the kings of Bosphorus. It was, according to Strabo, the capital of the European Bosphorus. Mithridates the Great died there. Plin.—Strab.

PANTICAPÆUS, a river of European Scythia, which falls into the Borysthenes, supposed to be the Samara of the moderns. Herodot. 4, c. 54.

PAPHIA, a surname of Venus because the goddess was worshipped at Paphos.—An ancient name of the island of Cyprus.

PAPHLAGONIA, now Penderachia, a country of Asia Minor, [bounded on the north by the Euxine, on the south by Galatia, on the west by Bithynia, from which the river Parthenius separates it, and on the east partly by the Euxine, and partly by Pontus, from which last the Halys separates it. PAPHOS, now Bafø, a famous city of the island of Cyprus, founded, as some suppose, about 1184 years before Christ, by Agepenor, at the head of a colony from Arcadia. The goddess of beauty was particularly worshipped there, and all male animals were offered on her altars, which, though 100 in number, daily smoked with the profusion of Arabian frankincense. The inhabitants were very effeminate and lascivious, and the young virgins were permitted by the laws of the place to get a dowry by prostitution. [There were two cities of the name of Paphos; the more ancient, which had received Venus when issuing from the foam of the sea, and the one above-mentioned. The former is placed on D'Anville's map south-east of the latter, and is called Palæ-Paphos.] Strab. 3, &c.—Plin. 2, c. 96.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Homer. Od. 8.—*Virg. PAPHUS, a son of Pygmalion, by a statue which had been changed into a woman by Venus. [vid. Pygmalion.] Ovid. Met. 10, v. 297.

PAPIA LEX, de peregrinis, by Papius the tribune, A. U. C. 638, which required that all strangers should be driven away from Rome. It was afterwards confirmed and extended by the Julian law.—Another, called Papia Poppæa, because it was enacted by the tribunes, M. Papius Mutilus and Q. Poppæus Secundus, who had received consular power from the consuls for six months. It was called the Julian law, after it had been published by order of Augustus, who himself was of the Julian family. vid. Julia lex de Maritandis or- divibus.—Another, to empower the high-priest to choose 20 virgins for the service of the goddess Vesta.—Another in the age of Augustus. It gave the patron a certain right to the property of his client, if he had left a specified sum of money, or if he had not three children.

PAPIANUS, a man who proclaimed himself emperor some time after the Gordians. He was put to death.

PAPIAS, an early Christian writer who first propagated the doctrine of the Millennium. There are remaining some historical fragments of his.

PAPINIANUS, a writer, A. D. 212. vid. Æmylius Papinianus.

PAPIRUS, a patrician, chosen rex sacrorum after the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome.—Carbo, a Roman consul who undertook the defence of Opimius who was accused of condemning and putting to death a number of citizens on Mount Aventinus without the formalities of a trial. His client was acquitted.—Cursor, a man who first erected a sun-dial in the temple of Quirinus, at Rome, B. C. 293; from which time the days began to be divided into hours.—A dictator who ordered his master of horse to be put to death because he had fought and conquered the enemies of the republic without his consent. The people interfered, and the dictator pardoned him. Cursor made war against the Sabines and conquered them, and also triumphed over the Samnites. His great severity displeased the people. He flourished about 320 years before the Christian era. Liv. 9, c. 14.—One of his family, surnamed Prætextatus, from an action of his whilst he wore the prætexta, a certain gown for young men. His father, of the same name, carried him to the senate-house, where affairs of the greatest importance were then in debate before the senators. The mother of young Papirius wished to know what had passed in the senate; but Papirius, unwilling to betray the secrets of that august assembly, amused his mother by telling her that it had been considered whether it would be more advantageous to the republic to give two wives to one husband, than two husbands to one wife. The mother of Papirius was alarmed, and she communicated the secret to the other Roman matrons, and, on the morrow, they assembled in the senate, petitioning that one woman might have two husbands rather than one husband two wives. The senators were astonished at this petition, but young Papirius unravelled the whole mystery, and from that time it was made a law among the senators, that no young man should for the future be introduced into the senate-house, except Papirius. This law was carefully observed till the age of Augustus, who permitted children of all ages to hear the debates of the senators. Macrob. Sat. 1, c. 6.—Carbo, a friend of Cinna and Marius. He raised cabals against Sylla and Pompey, and was at last put to death by order of Pompey, after he had rendered himself odious by a tyrannical consul-ship, and after he had been proscribed by Sylla.—A consul defeated by the armies of the Cimbri.—Maso, a consul who conquered Sardinia and Corsica, and reduced them into the form of a province. At his return to Rome he was refused a triumph, upon which he introduced a triumphal procession on the Alban Mount, and walked with his victorious army, wearing a crown of myrtle on his head. His example was afterwards followed by such generals as were refused a triumph by the Roman senate. *Val. It bore the different surnames of Crassus, Cursor, Mugillanus, Maso, Prætextatus, and Patus, of which the three first branches became the most illustrious.

PAPPUS, a philosopher and mathematician of Alexandria, in the age of Theodosius the Great. [Such of his works as are still extant prove that he was profoundly skilled in the mathematical sciences: the greater part of his productions are probably lost, among which are a Commentary upon Ptolemy's Almagest, a description of the rivers of Lybia, an Universal Chorography, a Treatise on Military engines, a Commentary upon Aristarchus of Samos, concerning the magnitude and distance of the sun and moon, &c. Reference is made by Marinus, a disciple of Proclus, to his Mathematical Collections, in eight books, of which the last six and part of the second remain. They were among the manuscripts presented by Sir Henry Saville to the Bodleian library at Oxford. They were published at Bologna in 1660, parts of them have also appeared in various mathematical works.]

PARCÆ, powerful goddesses, who presided

over the birth and the life of mankind. They were three in number. Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, daughters of Nox and Erebus, according to Hesiod, or of Jupiter and Themis, according to the same poet in another poem. Some make them daughters of the sea. Clotho, the youngest of the sisters, presided over the moment in which we are born, and held a distaff in her hand; Lachesis spun out all the events and actions of our life; and Atropos, the eldest of the three, cut the thread of human life with a pair of scissors. Their different functions are well expressed in this ancient verse;

Clotho colum retinet, Lachesis net, & Atropas occat.

The name of the Parcæ, according to Varro, is derived a partu or parturiendo, because they presided over the birth of men, and, by corruption, the word parca is formed, from parta or partus, but, according to Servius, they are called so by Antiphrasis, quod nemini parcant. The power of the Parcæ was great and extensive. Some suppose that they were subjected to none of the gods but Jupiter; while others support that even Jupiter himself was obedient to their commands; and indeed we see the father of the gods, in Homer's Iliad, unwilling to see Patroclus perish, yet obliged, by the superior power of the Fates, to abandon him to his destiny. According to the more received opinions, they were the arbiters of the life and death of mankind, and whatever good or evil befalls us in the world immediately proceeds from the Fates or Parcæ. Some make them ministers of the king of hell, and represent them as sitting at the foot of his throne; others represent them as placed on radiant thrones, amidst the celestial spheres, clothed in robes spangled with stars, and wearing crowns on their heads. According to Pausanias, the names of the Parcæ were different from those already mentioned. The most ancient of all, as the geographer observes, was Venus Urania, who presided over the birth of men; the second was Fortune; Ilythia was the third. To these some add a fourth, Proserpina, who often disputes with Atropos the right of cutting the thread of human life. The worship of the Parcæ was well established in some cities of Greece, and though mankind were well convinced that they were inexorable, and that it was impossible to mitigate them, yet they were eager to show a proper respect to their divinity, by raising them temples and statues. They received the same worship as the Furies, and their votaries yearly sacrificed to them black sheep, during which solemnity the priests were obliged to wear garlands of flowers. The Parcæ were generally represented as three old women with chaplets made with wool, and interwoven with the flowers of the Narcissus. They were covered with a white robe and fillet of the same colour, bound with chaplets. One of them held a distaff, another the spindle, and the third was armed with scissors, with which she cut the thread which her sisters had spun. Their dress is differ-ently represented by some authors. Clotho appears in a variegated robe, and on her head is a crown of seven stars. She holds a distaff in her hand reaching from heaven to earth. The robe which Lachesis wore was variegated with a great number of stars, and near her were placed a variety of spindles. Atropos was clothed in black, she held scissors in her hand, with clues of thread of different sizes, according to the length and shortness of the lives whose destinies they seemed to contain. Hyginus attributes to them the invention of these Greek letters, α , β , γ , τ , ν , and others call them the secretaries of heaven, and the keepers of the archives of eternity. The Greeks call the Parcæ by the different names of μοιρα, μισα, κη, εμαρμυνη, which are expressive of their power and of their inexorable decrees. *Hesiod. Theog. & scut. PÄRIAS, a son of Priam, king of Troy, by Hecuba, also called Alexander. He was destined, even before his birth, to become the ruin of his country; and when his mother, in the first month of her pregnancy, had dreamed that she brought forth a torch which set fire to her palace, the soothsayers foretold the calamities which might be expected from the imprudence of her future son, and which would end in the destruction of Troy. Priam, to prevent so great and so alarming an evil, ordered his slave Archelaus to destroy the child at soon as born. The slave, either touched with humanity, or influenced by Hecuba, did not destroy him, but was satisfied to expose him on Mount Ida, where the shepherds of the place found him, and educated him as their own son. Some attribute the preservation of his life, before he was found by the shepherds, to the motherly tenderness of a she-bear which suckled him. Young Paris, though educated among shepherds and peasants, gave early proofs of courage and intrepidity, and from his care in protecting the flocks of Mount Ida against the rapacity of the wild beasts, he obtained the name of Alexander (helper or defender). He gained the esteem of all the shepherds, and his graceful countenance and manly deportment recommended him to the favour of Ænone, a nymph of Ida, whom he married, and with whom he lived with the most perfect tenderness. Their conjugal peace was soon disturbed. At the marriage of Peleus and Thetis, the goddess of discord, who had not been invited to partake of the entertainment, showed her displeasure by throwing into the assembly of the gods, who were at the celebration of the nuptials, a golden apple, on which were written the words, Detur pulchriori. All the goddesses claimed it as their own, the contention at first became general, but at last only three, Juno, Venus, and Minerva, wished to dispute their respective right to beauty. The gods, unwilling to become arbiters in an affair of so tender and so delicate a nature, appointed Paris to adjudge the prize of beauty to the fairest of the goddesses, and indeed the shepherd seemed properly qualified to decide so great a contest, as his wisdom was so well established, and his prudence and sagacity so well known. The goddesses appeared before their judge without any covering or ornament, and each tried by promises and entreaties to gain the attention of Paris, and to influence his judgment. Juno promised him a kingdom; Minerva, military glory; and Venus, the fairest woman in the world for his wife, as Ovid expresses it. Heroid. 17, v. 118.

Tyndaridis conjux, Tertia dixit, eris.

After he had heard their several claims and promises, Paris adjudged the prize to Venus, and gave her the golden apple, to which, perhaps, she seemed entitled, as the goddess of beauty. This decision of Paris in favour of Venus, drew upon the judge and his family the resentment of the two other goddesses. Soon after Priam proposed a contest among his sons and other princes, and promised to reward the conqueror with one of the finest bulls of Mount Ida. His emissaries were sent to procure the animal, and it was found in the possession of Paris, who reluctantly yielded it up. The shepherd was desirous of obtaining again this favourite animal, and he went to Troy and entered the lists of the combatants. He was received with the greatest applause, and obtained the victory over his rivals, Nestor, the son of Neleus; Cycnus, king of Neptune; Polites, Helenus, and Deiphobus, sons of Priam. He also obtained a superiority over Hector himself; and the prince, enraged to see himself conquered by an unknown stranger, pursued him closely, and Paris must have fallen a victim to his brother's resentment, had he not fled to the altar of Jupiter. This sacred retreat preserved his life, and Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, struck with the similarity of the features of Paris with those of her brothers, inquired his birth and his age. From these circumstances she soon discovered that he was her brother, and as such she introduced him to her father and to his children. Priam acknowledged Paris as his son, forgetful of the alarming dream which had influenced him to meditate his death, and all jealousy ceased among the brothers. Paris did not long suffer himself to remain inactive; he equipped a fleet, as if willing to redeem Hesione, his father's sister, whom Hercules had carried away and obliged to marry Telamon the son of Æacus. This was the pretended motive of his voyage, but the causes were far different. Paris recollected that he was to be the husband of the fairest of women, and if he had been led to form those expectations while he was an obscure shepherd of Ida, he had now every plausible reason to see them realized, since he was acknowledged son of the king of Troy. Helen was the fairest woman of the age, and Venus had promised her to him. On these grounds, therefore, he visited Sparta, the residence of Helen who had married Menelaus. He was received with every mark of respect, but he abused the hospitality of Menelaus, and while the husband was absent in Crete, Paris persuaded Helen to elope with him, and to fly to Asia. Helen consented, and Priam received her into his palace without difficulty, as his sister was then detained in a foreign country, and as he wished to show himself as hostile as possible to the Greeks. This affair was soon productive of serious consequences. When Menelaus had married Helen, all her suitors had bound themselves by a solemn oath to protect her person, and to defend her from every violence, (vid. Helena,) and therefore the injured husband reminded them of their engagements, and called upon them to recover Helen. Upon this all Greece took up arms in the cause of Menelaus. [vid. the true account of the cause of the war in the remarks under Troja.] Agamemnon was chosen general of all the combined forces, and a regular war was begun. (vid. Troja.) Paris, meanwhile, who had refused Helen to the petitions and embassies of the Greeks, armed himself with his brothers and subjects to oppose the enemy; but the success of the war was neither hindered nor accelerated by his means. He fought with little courage, and at the very sight of Menelaus, whom he had so recently injured, all his resolution vanished, and he retired from the front of the army, where he walked before like a conqueror. In a combat with Menelaus, which he undertook at the persuasion of his brother Hector, Paris must have perished, had not Venus interfered and stolen him from the resentment of his adversary. He nevertheless wounded, in another battle, Machaon, Eurypilus, and Diomedes, and, according to some opinions, he killed with one of his arrows the great Achilles. (vid. Achilles.) The death of Paris is differently related, some suppose that he was mortally wounded by one of the arrows of Philoctetes, which had been once in the possession of Hercules, and that when he found himself languid on account of his wounds, he ordered himself to be carried to the feet of Ænone, whom he had basely abandoned, and who, in the years of his obscurity, had foretold him that he would solicit her assistance in his dying moments. He expired before he came into the presence of Ænone, and the nymph, still mindful of their former loves, threw herself upon the body, and stabbed herself to the heart, after she had plentifully bathed it with her tears. According to some authors, Paris did not immediately go to Troy when he left the Peloponnesus, but he was driven on the coast of Egypt, where Proteus, who was king of the country, detained him, and when he heard of the violence which had been offered to the king of Sparta, he kept Helen at his court, and permitted Paris to retire. It is said to have suffered much from the licentious cruelty of Antony, and its sufferings on this occasion are pathetically deplored and immortalized by Cicero in his 14th Philippic, the last tribute which he paid to Rome and to Liberty.] The poet Cassius and the critic Macrobius were born there. It was made a Roman colony A. U. C. 569. The inhabitants are called Parmenses and Parmani. Cic. Philip. 14.—Liv. 39, c. 55.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 1, ep. 4, v. 3.—*Cic. PARMENIDES, [a celebrated Greek philosopher of the Eleatic sect, who flourished about 500 B. C. He was a native of Elea, possessed a large patrimony, and lived in much splendour in his earlier years. He was distinguished in civil affairs, and is said to have drawn up for his fellow-citizens some excellent laws, to which their magistrates annually compelled them to swear obedience. He at length devoted himself to philosophy, and became the disciple and successor of Xenophanes. According to Cebes he was a pattern of virtue. He wrote the doctrine of his school in verses, of which only a few remain. Plato, in the dialogue which he denominated Parmenides, professed to represent his tenets, but confounded them with his own. Parmenides maintained that the universe is one, immovable, eternal, and of a spherical form; that the earth is spherical, and in the centre, being exactly balanced by its distance from the heavens, so that there is no cause why it should move one way rather than another. There were, as he supposed, only two sorts of philosophy—one founded on reason, and the other on the evidence of the senses.] Diog.

PARMENIO, a celebrated general in the armies of Alexander, who enjoyed the king's confidence, and was more attached to his person as a man than as a monarch. When Darius, king of Persia, offered Alexander all the country which lies at the west of the Euphrates, with his daughter Statira in marriage, and 10,000 talents of gold, Parmenio took occasion to observe, that he would without hesitation accept of these conditions if he were Alexander, so would I were I Parmenio, replied the conqueror. This friendship, so true and inviolable, was sacrificed to a moment of resentment and suspicion; and Alexander, who had too eagerly listened to a light and perhaps a false accusation, ordered Parmenio and his son to be put to death, as if guilty of treason against his person. Parmenio was in the 70th year of his age, B. C. 330. He died in the greatest popularity, and it has been judiciously observed, that Parmenio obtained many victories without Alexander, but Alexander not one without Parmenio. Curt. 7, &c.—Plut. in Alex.

PARNASSUS, a mountain of Phocis, anciently called Larnassus, from the boat of Deucalion (λαρναξ) which was carried there in the universal deluge. It received the name of Parnassus from Parnassus the son of Neptune by Cleobula. The soil was barren, but the vallies and the green woods that covered its sides rendered it agreeable, and fit for solitude and meditation. [Parnassus was remarkable for its two summits, and hence was called Biceps.] [vid. Lycorea.] One of these summits was sacred to Apollo and the Muses, the other to Bacchus; and the Greeks had a tradition that whoever slept on the mountain became either an inspired poet or mad. On the south-east side, about a mile up, was situate the city of Delphi. Here also was the famed Castalian fount. [vid. Delphi.] Parnassus is not so much a rocky mountain as a vast range of hills, which once formed the western boundary of Phocis, and the line of separation of the Locri Ozolæ, Opuntii, and Epicnemidii, and is now the limit between the district of Salona and that of Livadia. The extreme summits of Parnassus, the southern one of which was formerly called Lycorea, and is now termed Liakura, is considered by Wheeler to be as high as Mount Cenis. They were anciently reckoned 60 stadia above Delphi by the nearest path. The summits of Par- massus, says Pausanias, are above the clouds, and upon them the Thyades celebrate their mad orgies to Bacchus and Apollo. At present they are the summer retreats of the Albanian robbers. PAROS, a celebrated island among the Cyclades, about seven and a half miles distant from Naxos, and twenty-eight from Delos. According to Pliny, it is half as large as Naxos, that is, about thirty-six or thirty-seven miles in circumference, a measure which some of the moderns have extended to fifty and even eighty miles. It has borne the different names of Pactia, Minoa, Hiria, Demetrius, Zacynthus, Cabarnis, and Hyleassa. It received the name of Paros, which it still bears, from Paros a son of Jason, or, as some maintain, of Parrhasius. The island of Paros was rich and powerful, and well known for its famous marble, which was always used by the best statuarys. The best quarries were those of Marpesus, a mountain where still caverns, of the most extraordinary depth, are seen by modern travellers, and admired as the sources from whence the Labyrinth of Egypt and the porticoes of Greece received their splendour. [vid. some valuable remarks on the Parian marble of antiquity, in Clarke's "Travels in Greece, Egypt, and the Holy Land," vol. 2, p. 280.] According to Pliny, the quarries were so uncommonly deep, that, in the clearest weather, the workmen were obliged to use lamps, from which circumstance the Greeks have called the marble Lychnites, worked by the light of lamps. Paros is also famous for the fine cattle which it produces, and for its partridges and wild pigeons. The capital city was called Paros. It was first peopled by the Phœnicians, and afterwards a colony of Cretans settled in it. The Athenians made war against it, because it had assisted the Persians in the invasion of Greece, and took it, and it became a Roman province in the age of Pompey. Archilochus was born there. The Parian marbles, perhaps better known by the appellation of Arundelian, were engraved in this island in capital letters, B. C. 264, and as a valuable chronicle, preserved the most celebrated epochs of Greece, from the year 1582 B. C. These valuable pieces of antiquity were procured originally by M. de Peiresc, a Frenchman, and afterwards purchased by the earl of Arundel, by whom they were given to the university of Oxford, where they are still to be seen. PARRHĀSIUS, a famous painter, son of Evonor of Ephesus, in the age of Zeuxis, about 415 years before Christ. He was a great master of his profession, and particularly excelled in strongly expressing the violent passions. He was blessed with a great genius and much invention, and he was particularly happy in his designs. He acquired himself great reputation by his pieces, but by none more than that in which he allegorically represented the people of Athens, with all the injustice, the clemency, the fickleness, timidity, the arrogance, and inconsistency, which so eminently characterized that celebrated nation. He once entered the list against Zeuxis, and when they had produced their respective pieces, the birds came to pick with the greatest avidity the grapes which Zeuxis had painted. Immediately Parrhasius exhibited his piece, and Zeuxis, said, remove your curtain, that we may see the painting. The curtain was the painting, and Zeuxis acknowledged himself conquered by exclaiming, Zeuxis has deceived birds, but Parrhasius has deceived Zeuxis himself. Parrhasius grew so vain of his art, that he clothed himself in purple, and wore a crown of gold, calling himself the king of painters. He was lavish in his own praises, and by his vanity too often exposed himself to the ridicule of his enemies. Plut. in Thes. de Poet. aud.—Paus. 1, c. 28.—Plin. 35, v. 10.—Horat. 4, od. 8.

PARTHĒNIÆ and PARTHĒNII, a certain number of desperate citizens of Sparta. During the Messenian war, the Spartans were absent from their city for the space of ten years, and it was unlawful for them to return, as they had bound themselves by a solemn oath not to revisit Sparta before they had totally subdued Messenia. This long absence alarmed the Lacedæmonian women, as well as the magistrates. The Spartans were reminded by their wives, that if they continued in their resolution, the state must at last decay for want of citizens; and when they had duly considered this embassy, they empowered all the young men in the army, who had come to the war while yet under age, and who therefore were not bound by the oath, to return to Sparta, and, by a familiar and promiscuous intercourse with all the unmarried women of the state, to raise a future generation. It was carried into execution, and the children that sprang from this union were called Partheniæ, or sons of virgins, (παρθένων.) The war with Messenia was some time after ended, and the Spartans returned victorious: but the cold indifference with which they looked upon the Partheniæ was attended with serious consequences. The Partheniæ knew they had no legitimate fathers, and no inheritance, and that therefore their life depended upon their own exertions. This drove them almost to despair. They joined with the Helots, whose maintenance was as precarious as their own, and it was mutually agreed to murder all the citizens of Sparta and to seize their possessions. This massacre was to be done at a general assembly, and the signal was the throwing of a cap in the air. The whole, however, was discovered through the diffidence and apprehensions of the Helots; and when the people had assembled, the Partheniæ discovered that all was known, by the voice of a crier, who proclaimed that no man should throw up his cap. The Partheniæ, though apprehensive of punishment, were not visibly treated with greater severity; their calamitous conditions was attentively examined, and the Spartans, afraid of another conspiracy and awed by their numbers, permitted them to sail for Italy with Phalantus their ringleader at their head. They settled in Magna Græcia, and built Tarentum, about 707 years before Christ. Justin. 3, c. 5.—Strab. 6.—Paus. in Lacon. &c.—Plut. in Apoph.

PARTHËNIUS, a river of Paphlagonia, which, after separating Bithynia, falls into the Euxine Sea near Sesamum. It received its name either because the virgin Diana, (παρθένων) bathed herself there, or perhaps it received it from the purity and mildness of its waters. PARTHËNON, a temple of Athens, sacred to Minerva. It was destroyed by the Persians, and afterwards rebuilt by Pericles, in a more magnificent manner, [being enlarged fifty feet on each side.] All the circumstances which related to the birth of Minerva were beautifully and minutely represented in bass relief, on the front of the entrance. The statue of the goddess, 26 cubits high, and made of gold and ivory, passed for one of the master-pieces of Phidias. [The Parthenon was of the Doric order, and stood on the highest area of the Acropolis. It was 217 feet 9 inches long, and 98 feet 6 inches broad. "If the progress of decay," observes Mr. Hobhouse, "be as rapid as it has been for more than a century past, there will, in a few years, be not one marble standing upon another on the site of the Parthenon." Alaric the Goth is supposed to have commenced the work of destruction. In 1667 every antiquity of which there is now any trace in the Acropolis was in a tolerable state of preservation. All the travellers who visited Athens previous to the siege of Morosini, saw the Acropolis, less changed, perhaps, from its ancient state, than it has been from the condition in which it then stood, in the short period subsequent to their time. This great temple might at that period be called entire; having been previously a Christian church, it was then a mosque, the most beautiful in the world. The Venetians, who besieged the Acropolis in 1687, threw a bomb, which demolished the roof and did much damage to the fabric. Since then the Turks have made it a quarry, and virtuosi and noble antiquaries have more than rivalled them in the work of havoc and spoliation. At present only 29 columns remain, some of which no longer support their entablatures.] Plin. 34.

PARTHËNŌPÆUS, a son of Meleager and Atalanta, or, according to some, of Milanion and another Atalanta. PARTHIA, a celebrated country of Asia, [called by the Greeks Parthyæa, and Parthi-ene,] bounded on the west by Media, south by Carmania, north by Hyrcania, and east by Aria, &c. containing, according to Ptolemy, 25 large cities, the most capital of which was called Hecatompylos. [In this restricted sense, Parthia must not be confounded with what the ancients called the Parthian empire. This last was of vast extent, being bounded on the east by the Indus, on the west by the Tigris, on the south by the Mare Erythræum, and on the north by Caucasus.] Some suppose that the present capital of the country [Isphan] is built on the ruins of Hecatompylos. According to some authors, the Parthians were Scythians by origin, who made an invasion on the more southern provinces of Asia, and at last fixed their residence near Hyrcania. They long remained unknown and unnoticed, and became successively tributary to the empire of the Assyrians, Medes, and Persians. When Alexander invaded Asia, the Parthians submitted, like the other dependent provinces of Persia, and they were for some time under the power of Eumenes, Antigonus, Seleucus Nicator, and Antiochus, till the rapacity and oppression of Agathocles, a lieutenant of the latter, roused their spirit and fomented rebellion. Arsaces, a man of obscure origin, but blessed with great military powers, placed himself at the head of his countrymen, and laid the foundation of the Parthian empire about 250 years before the Christian era. The Macedonians attempted in vain to recover it; a race of active and vigilant princes, who assumed the surname of Arsacides from the founder of their kingdom, increased its power, and rendered it so formidable, that, while it possessed 18 kingdoms between the Caspian and Arabian seas, it even disputed the empire of the world with the Romans, and could never be subdued by that nation which had seen no people on earth unconquered by their arms. It remained a kingdom till the reign of Artabanus, who was killed about the year 229 of the Christian era, and from that time it became a province of the newly re-established kingdom of Persia under Artaxerxes. The Parthians were naturally strong and warlike, and were esteemed the most expert horsemen and archers in the world. The peculiar custom of discharging their arrows while they were retiring full speed has been greatly celebrated by the ancients, particularly by the poets, who all observe that their flight was more formidable than their attacks. This manner of fighting, and the wonderful address and dexterity with which it was performed, gained them many victories. They were addicted much to drinking, and to every manner of lewdness. Strab. 2, c. 6, &c.—Curt. 6, c. 11.—Flor. 3, c. 5.—*Virg. PARYSÄTIS, a Persian princess, wife of Darius Ochus, by whom she had Artaxerxes Mnemon, and Cyrus the younger. She was so extremely partial to her younger son, that she committed the greatest cruelties to encourage his ambition, and she supported him with all her interest in his rebellion against his brother Mnemon. The death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa was revenged with the greatest barbarity, and Parysatis sacrificed to her resentment all such as she found concerned in his fall. She also poisoned Stastira, the wife of her son Artaxerxes, and ordered one of the eunuchs of the court to be flayed alive, and his skin to be stretched on two poles before her eyes, because he had, by order of the king, cut off the hand and the head of Cyrus. These cruelties offended Artaxerxes, and he ordered his mother to be confined in Babylon; but they were soon after reconciled, and Parysatis regained all her power and influence till the time of her death. Plut. in Art.—Ctes.

PASARGÄDA, a town of Persia, near Carmania, founded by Cyrus on the very spot where he had conquered Astyages. The kings of Persia were always crowned there, and the Pasargadæ were the noblest families in Persia, in the number of which were the Achæmenides. [In this city the Magi resided, and here was the tomb of Cyrus. The ruins are now called Mourg-Aub, and contain the remains of an ancient fire-temple, and other buildings, with sculptures which have exercised the skill of many of the learned, and are well described in the travels of Morier and of Porter. There is a tomb here called Meshed Madre-i-Suleman, or "The tomb of Solomon's mother," a name given at random by the natives, and which is frequently done in such cases, showing the wide extended fame of Solomon in the east. This tomb is described by Porter, who considers it to have been that of Cyrus. The name Pasargadæ signifies "an entrenched Persian camp," and the original form very probably was Parsagard, from which the Greeks made Pasargadæ. It is said that a curious resemblance exists between the Persian and Icelandic tongues, and that Parsagard would have precisely the same meaning in both languages.] Herodot. 1, c. 125.—Mela. 3, c. 8.

PASIPHÆE, a daughter of the Sun and of Perseis, who married Minos king of Crete. She disgraced herself by her unnatural passion for a bull, which, according to some authors, she was enabled to gratify by means of the artist Dædalus. This celebrated bull had been given to Minos by Neptune, to be offered on his altars; but as the monarch refused to sacrifice the animal on account of his beauty, the god revenged his disobedience by inspiring Pasiphæe with an unnatural love for it. This fabulous tradition, which is universally believed by the poets, who observe that the Minotaur was the fruit of this infamous commerce, is refuted by some writers, who suppose that the infidelity of Pasiphæe to her husband was betrayed in her affection for an officer called Taurus; and that Dædalus, by permitting his house to be the asylum of the two lovers, was looked upon as accessory to the gratification of Pasiphæe's lust. From the amour with Taurus, as it is further remarked, the queen became mother of twins, and the name of Minotaurus arises from the resemblance of the children to the husband and the lover of Pasiphæe. Minos had four sons by Pasiphæe, Castreus, Deucalion, Glaucus, and Androgeus, and three daughters, Hecate, Ariadne, and Phædra. The god was supposed by some to reside for the six winter months at Patara, and the rest of the year at Delphi. The city was greatly embellished by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who attempted in vain to change its original name into that of his wife Arsinoe. Liv. 37, c. 15.—Strab. 14.—Paus. 9, c. 41.—Horat. 3, od. 14, v. 64.—*Ovid. PĀTĀVIUM, a city of Italy, at the north of the Po, on the shores of the Adriatic, now called Padua, and once said to be capable of sending 20,000 men into the field. It was the birth-place of Livy, from which reason some writers have denominated Patavinity those peculiar expressions and provincial dialect which they seem to discover in the historian's style, not strictly agreeable to the purity and refined language of the Roman authors who flourished in or near the Augustan age. PĀTRŌCLUS, one of the Grecian chiefs during the Trojan war, son of Menœtius by Sthenela, whom some call Philomela, or Polymela. The accidental murder of Clysonymus, the son of Amphidamus, in the time of his youth, obliged him to fly from Opus where his father reigned. He retired to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia, where he was kindly received, and where he contracted the most intimate friendship with Achilles, the monarch's son. When the Greeks went to the Trojan war, Patroclus also accompanied them at the express command of his father, who had visited the court of Peleus, and he embarked with 10 ships from Phthia. He was the constant companion of Achilles, and lodged in the same tent; and when his friend refused to appear in the field of battle, because he had been offended by Agamemnon, Patroclus imitated his example, and by his absence was the cause of the overthrow of the Greeks. But at last Nestor prevailed on him to return to the war, and Achilles permitted him to appear in his armour. The valour of Patroclus, together with the terror which the sight of the arms of Achilles inspired, soon routed the victorious armies of the Trojans, and obliged them to fly within their walls for safety. He would have broken down the walls of the city; but Apollo, who had interested himself for the Trojans, placed himself to oppose him; and Hector, at the instigation of the god, dismounted from his chariot to attack him, as he attempted to strip one of the Trojans whom he had slain. The engagement was obstinate, but at last Patroclus was overpowered by the valour of Hector, and the interposition of Apollo. His arms became the property of the conqueror, and Hector would have severed his head from his body had not Ajax and Menelaus intervened. His body was at last recovered and carried to the Grecian camp, where Achilles received it with the bitterest lamentations. His funeral was observed with the greatest solemnity. Achilles sacrificed near the burning pile twelve young Trojans, besides four of his horses and two of his dogs, and the whole was concluded by the exhibition of funeral games, in which the conquerors were liberally rewarded by Achilles. The death of Patroclus, as it is described by Homer, gave rise to new events; Achilles forgot his resentment against Agamemnon, and entered the field to avenge the fall of his friend, and his anger was gratified only by the slaughter of Hector, who had more powerfully kindled his wrath by appearing at the head of the Trojan armies in the armour which had been taken from the body of Patroclus. The patronymic of Actorides is often applied to Patroclus, because Actor was father to Menæcius. Dictys. Cret. 1, &c.—Homer. Il. 9, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 13.—Hygin. fab. 97 and 275.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 273.

PATRŪS, a surname of Jupiter among the Greeks, represented by his statues as having three eyes, which some suppose to signify that he reigned in three different places, in heaven, on earth, and in hell. Paus. 2.

PATULCIUS, a surname of Janus, which he received a pateo because the doors of his temples were always open in the time of war. Some suppose that he received it because he presided over gates, or because the year began by the celebration of his festivals. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 129.

Ann.* 13, c. 53.—Suetonius.—A Roman general, the first who crossed Mount Atlas with an army. He wrote a history of this expedition in Africa, which is lost. Paulinus also distinguished himself in Britain, &c. He followed the arms of Otho against Vitellius. Plin. 5, c. 1.

PAULUS ÆMYLIUS, a Roman, son of the Æmylius who fell at Cannæ, was celebrated for his victories, and received the surname of Macedonicus from his conquest of Macedonia. In the early part of life he distinguished himself by his uncommon application, and by his fondness for military discipline. His first appearance in the field was attended with great success, and the barbarians that had revolted in Spain were reduced with the greatest facility under the power of the Romans. In his first consulship his arms were directed against the Ligurians whom he totally subjected. His applications for a second consulship proved abortive; but when Perseus, the king of Macedonia, had declared war against Rome, the abilities of Paulus were remembered, and he was honoured with the consulship about the 60th year of his age. After this appointment he behaved with uncommon vigour, and soon a general engagement was fought near Pydæa. The Romans obtained the victory, and Perseus saw himself deserted by all his subjects. In two days the conqueror made himself master of all Macedonia, and soon after the fugitive monarch was brought into his presence. Paulus did not exult over his fallen enemy; but when he had gently rebuked him for his temerity in attacking the Romans, he addressed himself in a pathetic speech to the officers of his army who surrounded him, and feelingly enlarged on the instability of fortune and the vicissitude of all human affairs. When he had finally settled the government of Macedonia with ten commissioners from Rome, and after he had sacked 70 cities of Epirus, and divided the booty amongst his soldiers, Paulus returned to Italy. He was received with the usual acclamations, and though some of the seditious soldiers attempted to prevent his triumphal entry into the capitol, yet three days were appointed to exhibit the fruits of his victories. Perseus with his wretched family adorned the triumph of the conqueror, and as they were dragged through the streets before the chariot of Paulus, they drew tears of compassion from the people. The riches which the Romans derived from this conquest were immense, and the people were freed from all taxes till the consulship of Hirtius and Pansa; but, while every one of the citizens received some benefit from the victories of Paulus, the conqueror himself was poor, and appropriated for his own use nothing of the Macedonian treasures except the library of Perseus. In the office of censor, to which he was afterwards elected, Paulus behaved with the greatest moderation; and at his death, which happened about 168 years before the Christian era, not only the Romans, but their very enemies confessed, by their lamentations, the loss which they had sustained. He had married Papiria, by whom he had two sons, one of which was adopted by the family of Maximus, and the other in that of Scipio Africanus. He had also two daughters, one of whom married a son of Cato, and the other Ælius Tubero. He afterwards divorced Papiria; and when his friends wished to reprobate his conduct in doing so, by observing that she was young and handsome, and that she had made him father of a fine family, Paulus replied, that the shoe which he then wore was new and well made, but that he was obliged to leave it off, though no one but himself, as he said, knew where it pinched him. He married a second wife by whom he had two sons, whose sudden death exhibited to the Romans in the most engaging view, their father's philosophy and stoicism. The elder of these sons died five days before Paulus triumphed over Perseus, and the other three days after the public procession. This domestic calamity did not shake the firmness of the conqueror; yet before he retired to a private station, he harangued the people, and, in mentioning the severity of fortune upon his family, he expressed his wish that every evil might be averted from the republic by the sacrifice of the domestic prosperity of an individual. Plut. in vitâ.—Liv. 43, 44, &c.—Justin. 33, c. 1, &c.—Samosatenus, an author in the reign of Gallienus.—Maximus. His advice was rejected, and the battle of Cannæ, so glorious to Annibal, and so fatal to Rome, soon followed. Paulus was wounded, but when he might have escaped from the slaughter, by accepting a horse generously offered by one of his officers, he disdained to fly, and perished by the darts of the enemy. Horat. od. 12, v. 38.—Liv. 22, c. 39.—Julius, a Latin poet in the age of Adrian and Antoninus. FAVOR, an emotion of the mind which received divine honours among the Romans, and was considered of a most tremendous power, as the ancients swore by her name in the most solemn manner. Tullus Hostilius, the third king of Rome, was the first who built her temples, and raised altars to her honour, as also to Pallor, the goddess of paleness. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 17.

PAUSANIAS, a Spartan general who greatly signalized himself at the battle of Plataea against the Persians. The Greeks were very sensible of his services, and they rewarded his merit with a tenth of the spoils taken from the Persians. He was afterwards set at the head of the Spartan armies, and extended his conquests in Asia; but the haughtiness of his behaviour created him many enemies, and the Athenians soon obtained a superiority in the affairs of Greece. Pausanias was dissatisfied with his countrymen, and he offered to betray Greece to the Persians, if he received in marriage as the reward of his perfidy, the daughter of their monarch. His intrigues were discovered by means of a youth who was entrusted with his letters to Persia, and who refused to go, on the recollection that such as had been employed in that office before had never returned. The letters were given to the Ephori of Sparta, and the perfidy of Pausanias laid open. He fled for safety to a temple of Minerva, and as the sanctity of the place screened him from the violence of his pursuers, the sacred building was blocked up with heaps of stones, the first of which was carried there by the indignant mother of the unhappy man. He was starved to death in the temple, and died about 471 years before the Christian era. There was a festival, and solemn games instituted in his honour, in which only free-born Spartans contended. There was also an oration spoken in his praise, in which his actions were celebrated, particularly the battle of Plataea, and the defeat of Mardonius. C. Nep. in vitâ.—Plut. Arist. & Them.—Herodot. 9.—A youth at the court of king Philip. He was grossly and unnaturally abused by Attalus, one of the friends of Philip, and when he complained of the injuries he had received, the king in some measure disregarded his remonstrances, and wished them to be forgot. This incensed Pausanias, he resolved to revenge himself; and when he had heard from his master Hermocrates the sophist, that the most effectual way to render himself illustrious was to murder a person who had signalized himself by uncommon actions, he stabbed Philip as he entered a public theatre. After this bloody action he attempted to make his escape to his chariot, which waited for him at the door of the city, but he was stopped accidentally by the twig of a vine and fell down. Attalus, Perdicas, and other friends of Philip, who pursued him, immediately fell upon him and dispatched him. Some suppose that Pausanias committed this murder at the instigation of Olympias, the wife of Philip, and of her son Alexander. Diod. 16.—Justin. 9.—Plut. in Apoph.—A king of Macedonia, deposed by Amyntas, after a year's reign. Diod.—Another, who attempted to seize upon the kingdom of Macedonia, from which he was prevented by Iphicrates the Athenian.—A friend of Alexander the Great, made governor of Sardis.—A celebrated orator and historian, who settled at Rome, A. D. 170, where he died in a very advanced age. He wrote an history of Greece in ten books, in the Ionic dialect, in which he gives, with great precision and geographical knowledge, an account of the situation of its different cities, their antiquities, and the several curiosities which they contained. He has also interwoven mythology in his historical account, and introduced many fabulous traditions and superstitious stories. In each book the author treats of a separate country, such as Attica, Arcadia, Messenia, Elis, &c. Some suppose that he gave a similar description of Phœnicia and Syria. There was another Pausanias, a native of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, who wrote some declamations, and who is often confounded with the historian of that name. The best edition of Pausanias, is that of Khunius, fol. Lips. 1696. [The edition of Facius, Lips. 1794-7, in 4 vols. 8vo. is preferred by many to that of Kuhnus. An edition, however, is now publishing in Leipsic, by Siebelis, of which 3 volumes have already appeared, which promises to be the editio optima.]

PAUSIAS, a painter of Sicyon, the first who understood how to apply colours to wood or ivory, by means of fire. He made a beautiful painting of his mistress Glycere, whom he represented as sitting on the ground, and making garlands with flowers, and from this circumstance the picture, which was bought afterwards by Lucullus for two talents, received the name of Stephanoplocon. Some time after the death of Pausias, the Sicyonians were obliged to part with the pictures they possessed, to deliver themselves from an enormous debt, and M. Scavrus the Roman bought them all, in which were those of Pausias, to adorn the theatre which had been built during his edileship. Pausias lived about 350 years before Christ. Plin. 35, c. 11.

PAUSILYPUS, [a celebrated mountain and grotto near the city of Naples. It took its name from a villa of Vedius Pollio, erected in the time of Augustus, and called Pausylpam, from the effect which its beauty was supposed to produce in suspending sorrow and anxiety (παυσαν λυπην, cessare facturus dolorem.) This mountain is said to be beautiful in the extreme, and justly to merit the name bestowed upon it. The grotto is nearly a mile in length, and is made through the mountain 20 feet in breadth and 30 in height. On the mountain Vedius Pollio had not only a villa, but also a reservoir or pond in which he kept a number of lampreys, to which he used to throw such slaves as had committed a fault. When he died, he bequeathed, among other parts of his possessions, his villa to Augustus; but this monarch, abhorring a house where so many ill-fated creatures had lost their lives for very slight faults, caused it to be demolished, and the finest materials in it to be brought to Rome, and with them raised Julia's portico. Virgil's tomb is said to be above the entrance of the grotto of Pausilypo. Cluverius and Addison, however, deny this to be the tomb of the poet. *vid. PAX, an allegorical divinity among the ancients. The Athenians raised her a statue, which represented her as holding Plutus the god of wealth in her lap, to intimate that peace gives rise to prosperity and to opulence, and they were the first who erected an altar to her honour after the victories obtained by Timotheus over the Lacedæmonian power, though Plutarch asserts it had been done after the conquest of Cimon over the Persians. She was represented among the Romans with the horn of plenty, and also carrying an olive branch in her hand. The emperor Vespasian built her a celebrated temple at Rome, which was consumed by fire in the reign of Commodus. It was customary for men of learning to assemble in that temple, and even to deposit their writings there, as in a place of the greatest security. Therefore, when it was burnt, not only books, but also many valuable things, jewels, and immense treasures, were lost in the general conflagration. *C. PEGĀSIUM STAGNUM, a lake near Ephesus, which arose from the earth when Pegasus struck it with his foot.

PEGĀSUS, a winged horse sprung from the blood of Medusa when Perseus had cut off her head. He received his name from his being born, according to Hesiod, near the sources (πηγή) of the ocean. As soon as born he left the earth and flew up into heaven, or, rather, according to Ovid, he fixed his residence on Mount Helicon, where, by striking the earth with his foot, he instantly raised a fountain, which has been called Hippocrene. He became the favourite of the muses; and being afterwards tamed by Neptune or Minerva, he was given to Bellerophon to conquer the Chimæra. No sooner was this fiery monster destroyed than Pegasus threw down his rider because he was a mortal, or rather, according to the more received opinion, because he attempted to fly to heaven. This act of temerity in Bellerophon was punished by Jupiter, who sent an insect to torment Pegasus, which occasioned the melancholy fall of his rider. Pegasus continued his flight up to heaven, and was placed among the constellations by Jupiter. Perseus, according to Ovid, was mounted on the horse Pegasus when he destroyed the sea-monster which was going to devour Andromache. [Those mythologists who suppose the Gorgons to have been ships, (vid. Gorgones.) make Pegasus to have been also a vessel with sails, which Perseus brought to Greece after having used it in rescuing Andromeda. (vid. Gaza.) When Pegasus is said by the Poets to have sprung from the blood of Medusa, they are supposed to mean, that Perseus did not carry off the ship so called until after a severe engagement, in which much blood was shed. When Pausanias says that Pegasus was broke by Minerva, we may suppose him to mean that Perseus found occasion for a great share of prudence in manag- ing to advantage a ship with sails, the use of which was then unknown to him. The fable of Pegasus flying away to heaven, may allude to Perseus having consecrated the prow of the vessel in the temple of Jupiter on Mount Olympus; and, with regard to Mount Parnassus, we may suppose Perseus to have dedicated there, also, in the temple of Apollo, some other part of the vessel.] *Hesiod. PELASGI. [The most ancient traditions respecting the early population of Greece, represent that country as covered, in various parts, by a people named Pelasgi, distinguished among the rude aborigines by the progress which they appeared to have made in the arts of civilized life. The origin of this singular people is lost amid the obscurity of fable, and will always remain an enigma. Two theories respecting them have for a long time divided the opinions of the learned: we shall state them each in succession, and then give the hypothesis of Mannert, which seems preferable to both. According to the first of these theories, at a period of remote antiquity, some event unknown to us, either a convulsion of nature, or intestine divisions, or perhaps merely a superabundance of population, caused many of the numerous nations, which had their original seats in the vicinity of the Caspian and Euxine seas, to seek new habitations in regions farther to the west. This migration was, without doubt, successive, and must have lasted for many centuries. The countries which extend from the Borysthenes to the Propontis appear to have been the point whence this vast multitude from Upper Asia diverged in quest of abodes. One portion of them, continuing their route to the west, established themselves in the Carpathian mountains, now the mountains of Krapak, which hence became the cradle of the early population of Europe. From this quarter proceeded the tribes which peopled Italy and Greece, while another stream of emigration, ascending the course of the Danube, after leaving colonies along its northern banks, passed the Rhine, and then the Pyrenees, and did not stop until they found a barrier to their progress in the Atlantic ocean. Another portion of the nations from Caucasus settled in the fertile plains of Asia Minor, of which number were the Thynians, Bithynians, Phrygians, and Mysians. Some of them, however, remained between the Danube and the Dnieper, and are known by the name of Cimmerians and Taurians. One of these tribes last mentioned were, according to this theory, the Pelasgi. In search of a milder climate, they moved towards the south, and established themselves in the mountains of Thessaly, and in Bœotia, which countries, more especially the first, hence bore the name of Pelasgia long before that of Hellas. Masters of these countries, they spread themselves next over what was called in a subsequent age Peloponnesus, but which at that early period was denominated from them Pelasgia. Hence is explained, say the defenders of this theory, a fact which has occasioned so much embarrassment to the learned, namely, the simultaneous existence of two Pelasgias, one to the north of the isthmus of Corinth, the other in the most southern part of Greece. The abundant productions of the land, and its numerous harbours, made the Pelasgi from a roving and pastoral, an agricultural and commercial people. Their vessels carried them to every known land, and at the period when the light of history becomes clear and distinct, we find settlements of Pelasgi in the isles of the Ægean, along the Propontis, on the coasts of Asia Minor, and even in Italy in the west. Such is a brief outline of the first of these theories. It is based, as will appear even from a slight examination, upon the assumed fact that the Pelasgi and the early Grecian race were the same. This is contradicted by the positive testimony of all antiquity. Herodotus, in whose time settlements of the Pelasgi still existed along the Propontis, as well as in Italy, states in express terms that the Pelasgi spoke a barbarous language; and to leave the reader in no doubt as to the meaning of the phrase "barbarous language," he adds, "and if the whole Pelasgian race did speak a barbarous language, then the people of Attica, who are descended from them, must, at the time they changed into Hellenes, have altered their language," (Herod. 1, c. 57.) It may be asked what grounds Herodotus had to suppose that the Pelasgic was a barbarous tongue? Let us hear the historian himself assign the reasons for his opinion. "What language the Pelasgi used I cannot certainly affirm; but if I may form a conjecture from those Pelasgi who now exist, and who are settled at Crestona (this should be Cortona, as Dionysius of Halicarnassus cites the passage) beyond the Tyrrhenians, but were formerly neighbours to those called at this day Dorians, and at that time occupied the country called Thessalotis; and if I may conjecture from those Pelasgi who founded Placia and Scylace in the Hellespont, and once dwelt with the Athenians, and whatever other cities, which, though really Pelasgian, have changed their name; if, I say, I may be permitted to give my opinion, the Pelasgi spoke a barbarous language." ib. And a little while after he adds, "for neither do the Crestonæans use the same language with any of their neighbours, nor yet do the people of Placia, but they both use the same language; by which it appears that they have taken care to preserve the character of the language they brought with them into those places. But the Hellenes, as I think, from the time they became a people, used the same language which they now speak." This not a mere supposition on the part of the historian, but his opinion is drawn evidently from an actual comparison of the two languages, and is merely stated in the language of modest caution, instead of that bold tone of expression which he was entitled to assume. Now, if the Pelasgi spoke a different language altogether from the early Hellenic or Grecian race, they must have been of different origin, and the theory above mentioned falls of course to the ground. According to the second theory, the Pelasgi were autochthones. This would make the Peloponnesus, and above all, Argolis, their original country. The partizans of this theory maintain, that in the most remote periods the stream of emigration was constantly directed from the southern to the northern parts of Greece, and that, prior to the epoch when the Hellenes began to grow powerful, there is no historical evidence of any colony of Pelasgi having entered the Peloponnesus. This theory is a weak one, as will appear from a consideration of the hypothesis of Mannert. This last mentioned writer acknowledges that the Pelasgi are mentioned in history as the first inhabitants of many countries, but adds that a careful examination of the subject will conclusively show that they every where met on their arrival with races of men less civilized than themselves, some still living in forests, others but just formed into civil societies. In Attica Ogyges had founded a kingdom which extended also over a part of Bœotia; he reigned over the Hectenes in the latter country, and over the Actæans in the former. An inundation, however, which covered the land, destroyed all the inhabitants except those who had fled for refuge to the mountains. Here their descendants lived for 190 years, until the appearance of the Pelasgi. The original inhabitants, being too weak to resist these strangers, assigned them a district at the foot of Mount Hymettus, from which, however, they were subsequently expelled. They retired, after their expulsion to the isle of Lemnos. The original inhabitants of Argolis were the Cynurians; it was among these that Inachus founded a Pelasgic state. The Arcadians (to call them by a less ancient name) were a race of Autochthones entirely uncivilized, until Pelasgus, a grandson of Inachus, brought among them the first elements of social life. The country where the Pelasgi first made their appearance, according to the Greek writers, was Epirus, whence they spread into Thessaly. The name Pelasgi was never assumed by them, but was given them by the Greeks. They called themselves Raseni, or rather Tyrsemi, (vid. Hetruria). The name Pelasgi (Πελασγοί, more anciently written Πελαργοί.) was applied to them in familiar language by the early Greeks, from the resemblance they bore to storks and other birds of passage, when they first became known to the Greeks; for it seems that, before they fixed themselves permanently in Greece, they would appear and disappear from the land at almost stated and regular intervals. Being chased eventually from Thessaly by the power of Deucalion, they retired to Epirus, and from thence betook themselves partly to Asia Minor and in part to Italy. Their subsequent movements and history are given in the remarks under the article Hetruria. All the Pelasgic colonies which established themselves among the early Greeks, brought with them the elements of civilization and the arts, and also the use of letters. Whence did they obtain them? "Profound night," observes Mannert, "rests upon this portion of history: a single gleam of light alone pierces the darkness which involves it. On one side of the Pelasgi, many tribes of Illyrians practised navigation, as, for example, the Phœaciens of the island of Scheria, afterwards Corcyra. At the head of the Adriatic there existed long-established commercial cities, and artificial canals were seen there at an early period. Every thing seems to indicate that at a period of remote antiquity the shores of the Adriatic were inhabited by civilized communities." Such is the theory of Mannert. As regards the origin of the Pelasgi, we will take the liberty to differ from him at the close of these remarks: in the mean time a few observations will be offered respecting the introduction of letters into Greece by this mysterious people. According to the common opinion, Cadmus the Phœnician was the first who made the Greeks acquainted with the art of writing, 1550 years before our era.

This opinion rests for support upon a passage of Herodotus, (5, c. 58,) who, however, expresses himself with an air of doubt, adding this restriction to his remark, ὡς ἐμοὶ δοκεῖ, "as appears to me." He is contradicted by Diodorus Siculus, (5, c. 57 and 74,) who states that many generations before Cadmus the Greeks were in possession of characters, and used them for public monuments; but that a deluge destroyed these elements of early civilization. An old tradition existed among the Greeks respecting the good fortune which the Pelasgi had of saving this early alphabet at the time of the deluge of Deucalion, (Eustath. in Odys. lib. 2, p. 358,) and it is probably in accordance with this same tradition that Æschylus makes Prometheus say, "I invented for them the array of letters and fixed the memory, the mother of knowledge and the soul of life." (Æsch. Prom. V. v. 469, 470, ed. Blomfield.) Pausanias (1, c. 43,) makes mention of an inscription which he had read at Megara on the most ancient monument in all Greece. The date of this monument was 1678 years before our era: the inscription upon it, therefore, was anterior to Cadmus, and consequently Pelasgic. But a serious difficulty arises at this stage of the enquiry. How came the alphabet, used in after ages by the Greek nation, to bear so close a resemblance both in the names, the order, and the very forms of the letters, to the alphabets of the nations that belonged to the Shemitic race, namely, to those of the Phœnicians, the Samaritans, the Jews; or, to speak more correctly, to that of the Phœnicians; for these and the Jews, until the time of Cyrus, used the same characters? One of two suppositions must be the true answer to this question. Either the Phœnicians introduced an alphabet into Greece, so far superior to the old Pelasgic as to be adopted in its stead, or the alphabet of Cadmus and that of the Pelasgi were identically the same. The first supposition will be found extremely difficult to support. It takes for granted, what few, if any, will be willing to allow, that there existed in those early ages a sufficient degree of mental activity and refinement on the part of the rude inhabitants of Greece, to induce them to discriminate between the comparative advantages of two rival systems of alphabetic writing; and that occasions sufficiently numerous presented themselves in those early days, for testing by actual use the respective claims to pre-eminence of the Pelasgic and Phœnician characters. The second of these suppositions is undoubtedly the true one; to establish which more fully we must go a little into detail. The Pelasgi are acknowledged by the concurrent voice of all antiquity to have brought with them into Greece a peculiar and distinct system of religion. They are acknowledged, moreover, to have been the founders of the theology of the Greeks. They established an oracle at Dodona, they instituted the mysteries of the Cabiri, and there is every reason to believe that those of Eleusis were of similar origin. In a word, every thing connected with them tends strongly to confirm the belief that they were a sacerdotal race, a caste of priests. To those who are acquainted with the learned speculations of Ritter, (Die Vorhalle Europäischer Voelkergeschichten vor Herodotus) it seems scarcely necessary to state how successfully he has established, from an examination of the scattered fragments of early history, the intimate connection which once subsisted between the east and west. The earliest monuments which the geography, the antiquities, the mythology, the architecture, and the religious systems of the most remote times afford, clearly indicate that in a very remote period colonies of priests from northern India, with the worship of Buddha, spread themselves over the countries along the Phasis, on the Euxine, in Thrace, along the Danube, over many parts of western Europe, and even through the whole of Greece. The Pelasgi evidently were a colony or race of this kind, and their very name, Raseni or Tyrsemi, especially the two last syllables Seni, connect them in a manner with the Sindi, or people of India. As regards the first part of the name Tyrsemi, namely, the syllable Tyr, it is curious to compare with it the remark of Ritter, who, after a long examination of the subject, arrives at the conclusion that the syllable Thyr among the nations near the Tanais and Palus Mæotis was a religious appellation. Such, for example, are the names of the Idanthyrsi, Thyrsagetæ, Thysagetæ, Thyrsi, &c. It affords a subject of inquiry equally curious to compare the remark of the author of the Etymol. Mag. under the word Πηλαγῆες, namely, that the Pelasgi were so called from the fine linen garments which they wore, (δια τὰς σινδῶνας ἢ φοροῦν.) with the learned arguments of Ritter in the work mentioned above, by which he proves conclusively that the term σινδῶν was applied in strictness by the Greeks to the fine linen of Colchis, and not to that of Egypt, and establishes the fact in the clearest manner that the people of Colchis were a colony from India. Indeed, the very name σινδῶν has an evident analogy with the Σινδοί or Ινδοί, i. e. the ancient inhabitants of India. Now, on the supposition that the Pelasgi were a colony from India, and brought with them into Greece the civilization and arts of the former country, the question respecting the Greek alphabet, to which we return, resolves itself into this, whether the people of India or Phœnicia are to be regarded as the inventors of alphabetic writing. The Phœnicians were a mere nation of merchants and traders. They had little, if any, occasion for literary pursuits, and they have left but little literature behind them. From a nation who had gone so far as to invent an alphabet we certainly would expect no small number of literary memorials. Again, Hug (Erfindung der Buchstabenschrift) shows clearly that the Phœnician letters are in fact only hieroglyphics, and even of Egyptian origin. As to the Phœnicians themselves, they were evidently of Arabian descent, and originally established along the shores of the Arabian gulf. They were the shepherd-race who founded the dynasty of the Hyccos in Egypt, and from that country they obtained their alphabet and the germs of civilization. We have now traced the Phœnician alphabet to Egypt: was it of Egyptian origin? No one will affirm this who is acquainted with the early history of Egypt. The Egyptians received their rudiments of the civilization from Meroë in Ethiopia, the seat of a sacerdotal caste or royal priesthood. Did Meroë then also civilize India, or India Meroë? For our own parts we should have no hesitation in assigning the priority to India, though the proofs for that opinion are too numerous to be here adduced, and too intimately connected with each other to admit of being given only in part. That there was a strong resemblance in many respects between the customs of Egypt and those of the more remote East no one who has made himself conversant with the pages of Herodotus will presume to deny. The description which that author gives of the mode of life, the rites and ceremonies, of the priests of Egypt, identify them with the Brahmins of India; the festival of lamps which was celebrated throughout Egypt, prevails at the present day through the whole of the vast empire of China; and it is stated on the best and most indubitable authority that the seapoys in the British over-land army from India, when they beheld in Egypt the ruins of Dendera, prostrated themselves before the remains of the ancient temples, and offered up adoration to them, declaring, upon being asked the reason of this strange conduct, that they saw sculptured before them the gods of their country. Ritter, moreover, proves conclusively the absolute identity of many parts of the Phœnician worship, with that of ancient India; and, to return to the point whence we digressed, it is conceded by one of the ablest oriental scholars of modern times, that there exists a direct and striking similarity between the Sanscrit and Phœnician characters, although he bends this remark towards the confirmation of an opposite theory from our own. (See Murray's History of European Languages, vol. 2, p. 392, seqq.) But what are we to think of the tradition respecting Cadmus? That he did come to Greece the authority of almost every ancient author testifies. The most ingenious mode of solving the difficulty is that adopted by some of the German scholars, namely, that Cadmus merely introduced into Greece more convenient and suitable materials for writing. The art of preparing skins to serve for the purposes of writing, was unknown to the early Greeks, for the διφθεγάρι, of which Herodotus speaks as having been in use before the invention of paper, seem to have been only skins rudely prepared in the manner still customary among barbarous nations in the time of the historian. Paper made of the papyrus of Egypt, was either not as yet invented, or there existed no communication at that time with Egypt by which it could be procured. The only materials for writing to the time of Cadmus, appears to have been stone and plates of metal. The palm tree grows so abundantly in Phœnicia, that from it the Greeks gave a name to the whole country (Φοινίκη, from Φοινίξ). According to Pliny (H. N. 13, c. 11,) the Egyptians used the palm-leaf for writing previous to the invention of paper or papyrus. If Cadmus then brought into Bœotia the use of writing on the palm-leaf, the Greeks, accustomed previously to trace their characters with great labour and difficulty on stone and metal, would readily abandon this mode of writing for the easier and more expeditious one introduced by the Phœnician stranger. Hence Cadmus might easily be regarded as the inventor of alphabetic writing, the difficulty of procuring proper materials having so much obstructed its use among the Greeks previous to this period. Hence, too, the letters which they now began to trace on the palm-leaf were termed γραμματα Φοινικία, not meaning that they were Phœnician, for they were in reality Pelasgic, (the letters of Cadmus and those of the Pelasgi being the same), but importing merely that they were letters traced upon the palm-leaf; and hence finally the Greeks out of gratitude would in time apply the name Phœnicia to a country whence they had obtained so valuable a gift as the palm-tree or Φοινίξ. As regards the general history of the Pelasgi, it remains but to add, that tradition assigns to them various monuments of architecture, and especially the ancient walls known by the name of Cyclopiàn. There are two kinds of these ancient walls, the first constructed of rude and irregular rocks of stone, joined together without mortar, the second formed of stones regularly cut and squared: the former are called Cyclopiàn, the latter Pelasgic. According to the ingenious hypothesis of Hirt, (Geschichte der Baukunst bey den Alten), the first species of walls were named Cyclopiàn because the Pelasgi constructed them by means of a caste of miners. When persons employed in mining enter the bowels of the earth, the lamp which they carry with them to light them on their way may be regarded as their only eye, and hence the fable of the single eye of the Cyclops. (See another explanation of the fable under the article Cyclopes.) Schoell, in his History of Grecian Literature, vol. 1, p. 8, quotes a passage of Agatharchidas, as preserved by Photius, in which the former describes the manner in which blocks of marble were drawn from the quarries of Egypt, and speaks of the workmen carrying a lamp attached to their foreheads to light them as they proceeded with their work beneath the surface of the earth.]

PELASGIA, or PELASGIOTIS, [an ancient name for Epirus, Thessaly, and also for the Peloponnesus. vid. Pelasgi.]

PELASGUS, a son of Terra, or, according to others, of Jupiter and Niobe, who reigned in

Sicyon, and gave his name to the ancient inhabitants of Peloponnesus. [vid. Pelasgi.]

PELĒTHRŌNI, an epithet given to the Lapithæ, because they inhabited the town of Pelethronium, at the foot of Mount Pelion in Thessaly: or because one of their number bore the name of Pelethronius. It is to them that mankind is indebted for the invention of the bit with which they tamed their horses with so much dexterity. Virg. G. 3, v. 115.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 452.—Lucan. 6, v. 387.

PELEUS, a king of Thessaly, son of Æacus and Endeis, the daughter of Chiron. He married Thetis, one of the Nereids, and was the only one among mortals who married an immortal. He was accessory to the death of his brother Phocus, and on that account he was obliged to leave his father's dominions. He retired to the court of Eurytus, the son of Actor, who reigned in Phthia, or, according to the less received opinion of Ovid, he fled to Ceyx, king of Trachinia. He was purified of his murder by Eurytus, with the usual ceremonies, and the monarch gave him his daughter Antigone in marriage. Some time after this Peleus and Eurytus went to the chase of the Calydonian boar, where the father-in-law was accidentally killed by an arrow which his son-in-law had aimed at the beast. This unfortunate event obliged him to banish himself from the court of Phthia, and he retired to Iolchos, where he was purified of the murder of Eurytus, by Acastus the king of the country. His residence at Iolchos was short; Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, became enamoured of him; and when she found him insensible to her passionate declaration, she accused him of attempts upon her virtue. The monarch partially believed the accusations of his wife, but not to violate the laws of hospitality by putting him instantly to death, he ordered his officers to conduct him to Mount Pelion, on pretence of hunting, and there to tie him to a tree, that he might become the prey of the wild beasts of the place. The orders of Acastus were faithfully obeyed; but Jupiter, who knew the innocence of his grandson Peleus, ordered Vulcan to set him at liberty. As soon as he had been delivered from danger, Peleus assembled his friends to punish the ill treatment which he had received from Acastus. He forcibly took Iolchos, drove the king from his possessions, and put to death the wicked Astydamia. After the death of Antigone, Peleus courted Thetis, of whose superior charms Jupiter himself became enamoured. His pretensions, however, were rejected, and as he was a mortal, the goddess fled from him with the greatest abhorrence; and the more effectually to evade his inquiries, she generally assumed the shape of a bird, or a tree, or of a tygress. Peleus became more animated from her refusal, he offered a sacrifice to the gods, and Proteus informed him, that to obtain Thetis he must surprise her while she was asleep in her grotto near the shores of Thessaly. This advice was immediately followed, and Thetis, unable to escape from the grasp of Peleus, at last consented to marry him. Their nuptials were celebrated with the greatest solemnity, and all the gods attended, and made them each the most valuable presents. The goddess of discord was the only one of the deities who was not present, and she punished this seeming neglect by throwing an apple into the midst of the assembly of the gods, with the inscription of detur pulchriori. [vid. Discordia.] From the marriage of Peleus and Thetis was born Achilles, whose education was early intrusted to the Centaur Chiron, and afterwards to Phoenix, the son of Amyntor. Achilles went to the Trojan war at the head of his father's troops, and Peleus gloried in having a son who was superior to all the Greeks in valour and intrepidity. The death of Achilles was the source of grief to Peleus; and Thetis, to comfort her husband, promised him immortality, and ordered him to retire into the grotto of the island of Leuce, where he would see and converse with the manes of his son. Peleus had a daughter, called Polydora, by Antigone. *Homer. Il. 9, v. 482.—Eurip. in Androm.—Catul. de Nupt. Pel. & Thet.—Ovid. PELIÀDES, the daughters of Pelias, vid. Pelias.

PELIAS, the twin brother of Peleus, was son of Neptune by Tyro, the daughter of Salmones. His birth was concealed from the world by his mother, who wished her father to be ignorant of her incontinence. He was exposed in the woods, but his life was preserved by shepherds, and he received the name of Pelias, from a spot of the colour of lead in his face. Some time after this adventure, Tyro married Cretheus, son of Æolus, king of Iolchos, and became mother of three children, of whom Æson was the eldest. Meantime Pelias visited his mother, and was received in her family, and after the death of Cretheus, he unjustly seized the kingdom which belonged to the children of Tyro, by the deceased monarch. To strengthen himself in his usurpation, Pelias consulted the oracle, and when he was told to beware of one of the descendants of Æolus, who should come to his court with one foot shod, and the other bare, he privately removed the son of Æson, after he had publicly declared that he was dead. These precautions proved abortive. Jason, the son of Æson, who had been educated by Chiron, returned to Iolchos, when arrived to years of maturity, and as he had lost one of his shoes in crossing the river Anaurus, or the Evenus, Pelias immediately perceived that this was the person whom he was advised so much to dread. His unpopularity prevented him from acting with violence against a stranger, whose uncommon dress and commanding aspect had raised admiration in his subjects. But his astonishment was excited when he saw Jason arrive at his palace, with his friends and his relations, and boldly demand the kingdom which he usurped. Pelias was conscious that his complaints were well founded, and therefore, to divert his attention, he told him that he would voluntarily resign the crown to him, if he went to Colchis to avenge the death of Phryxus, the son of Athamas, whom Æetes had cruelly murdered. He further observed, that the expedition would be attended with the greatest glory, and that nothing but the infirmities of old age had prevented him himself from vindicating the honour of his country and the injuries of his family by punishing the assassin. This so warmly recommended, was as warmly accepted by the young hero, and his intended expedition was made known all over Greece. [vid. Jason.] During the absence of Jason in the Argonautic expedition, Pelias murdered Æson and all his family; but, according to the more received opinion of Ovid, Æson was still living when the Argonauts returned, and he was restored to the vigour of youth by the magic of Medea. This sudden change in the vigour and the constitution of Æson, astonished all the inhabitants of Iolchos, and the daughters of Pelias, who had received the patronymic of Peliades, expressed their desire to see their father's infirmities vanish by the same powerful arts. Medea, who wished to avenge the injuries which her husband Jason had received from Pelias, raised the desires of the Peliades, by cutting an old ram to pieces and boiling the flesh in a caldron, and afterwards turning it into a fine young lamb. After they had seen this successful experiment, the Peliades cut their father's body to pieces, after they had drawn all the blood from his veins, on the assurance that Medea would replenish them by her incantations. The limbs were immediately put into a caldron of boiling water, but Medea suffered the flesh to be totally consumed, and refused to give the Peliades the promised assistance, and the bones of Pelias did not even receive a burial. The Peliades were four in number, Alcaste, Pisidice, Pelopea, and Hippothoe, to whom Hyginus adds Medusa. Their mother's name was Anaxibia, the daughter of Bias, or Philomache, the daughter of Amphion. After this parricide, the Peliades fled to the court of Admetus, where Acastus, the son-in-law of Pelias, pursued them, and took their protector prisoner. The Peliades died and were buried in Arcadia. *Hygin. fab. 12, 13 and 14.—Ovid. Met. 7, fab. 3 and 4.—Heroid. 12, v. 129.—Paus. 8, c. 11.—Apollod. 1, c. 9.—Seneca in Med.—Apollon. Arg. 1.—Pindar. bines. As they inhabited the high mountains which formed a part of the Appenines, it is probable that they derived their name from the primitive term pal, signifying elevated. They are said to have constructed a temple to Jupiter Palenus.] Liv. 8, c. 6 and 29, l. 9, c. 41.—Ovid. ex Pont. 1, el. 8, v. 42.—Strab. 5.—Horat. 3, od. 19, v. 3.

The celebrated spear of Achilles, which none but the hero could wield, had been cut on this mountain, and was thence called Pelias. It was a present from his preceptor Chiron, who, like the other Centaurs, had fixed his residence here. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 155, l. 13, v. 199.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 9.—*Virg. PELLA, [a city of Macedonia, near the top of the Sinus Thermaicus, on the confines of Emathia. It became the capital of the kingdom when Edessa was annihilated, according to Ptolemy, and owed its grandeur to Philip, and to his son Alexander, who was born there, and who was hence styled Pellæus Juvenis by the Roman poets. Livy describes it as situate on a hill which faced the south-west, and surrounded with morasses formed by stagnant waters from the adjacent lakes, so deep as to be impassable either in winter or in summer. In the morass nearest the city the citadel rose up like an island, being built on a mound of earth formed with immense labour, so as to be capable of supporting the wall, and secure against any injury from the surrounding moisture. At a distance it seemed to join the city rampart, but it was divided from it by a river, which ran between, and over which was a bridge of communication. This river was called Ludias, Lædias, and Lydius: Pella became a Roman colony.] The tomb of the poet Euripides was in the neighbourhood. The epithet Pellæus is often applied to Egypt or Alexandria, because the Ptolemies, kings of the country, were of Macedonian origin. Martial. 13, ep. 85.—Lucan. 5, v. 60, l. 8, v. 475 and 607, l. 9, v. 1016 and 1073, l. 10, v. 55.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 7.—Liv. 42, c. 41.

PELLÈNE, a town of Achaia, in the Peloponnesus, at the south-west of Sicyon, famous for its wool. It was built by the giant Pallas, or, according to others, by Pellen of Argos, son of Phorbas, and was the country of Proteus the sea god. [It was built round a mountain, and formed a beautiful amphitheatre.] Strab. 8.—Paus. 7, c. 26.—Liv. 33, c. 14.

PĒLŌPĒA, or PELŌPIA, a daughter of Thy-estes the brother of Atreus. She had a son by her father, who had offered her violence in a wood without knowing that she was his own daughter. Some suppose that Thyestes purposely committed this incest, as the oracle had informed him that his wrongs should be avenged, and his brother destroyed, by a son who should be born from him and his daughter. This proved too true. Pelopæa afterwards married her uncle Atreus, who kindly received in his house his wife's illegitimate child, called Ægysthus, because preserved by goats (αἴγες) when exposed in the mountains. Ægysthus became his uncle's murderer. [vid. Ægysthus.] Hygin. fab. 87, &c.—Ælian. V. H. 12.—Ovid. in ib. v. 359.—Seneca in Agam.

PĒLŌPĒIA, a festival observed by the people of Elis in honour of Pelops. It was kept in imitation of Hercules who sacrificed to Pelops in a trench, as it was usual when the manes and the infernal gods were the objects of worship.

PELOPĪDAS, a celebrated general of Thebes, son of Hippoclus. He was descended of an illustrious family, and was remarkable for his immense possessions, which he bestowed with great liberality on the poor and necessitous. Many were the objects of his generosity; but when Epaminondas had refused to accept his presents, Pelopidas disregarded all his wealth, and preferred before it the enjoyment of his friend's conversation and of his poverty. From their friendship and intercourse the Thebans derived the most considerable advantages. No sooner had the interest of Sparta prevailed at Thebes, and the friends of liberty and national independence been banished from the city, than Pelopidas, who was in the number of the exiles, resolved to free his country from foreign slavery. His plan was bold and animated, and his deliberations were slow. Meanwhile Epaminondas, who had been left by the tyrants at Thebes, as being in appearance a worthless and insignificant philosopher, animated the youths of the city, and at last Pelopidas, with eleven of his associates, entered Thebes, and easily massacred the friends of the tyranny, and freed the country from foreign masters. After this successful enterprise, Pelopidas was unanimously placed at the head of the government; and so confident were the Thebans of his abilities as a general and a magistrate, that they successively re-elected him 13 times to fill the honourable office of governor of Bœotia. Epaminondas shared with him the sovereign power, and it was to their valour and prudence that the Thebans were indebted for a celebrated victory at the battle of Leuctra. In a war which Thebes carried on against Alexander, tyrant of Pheræ, Pelopidas was appointed commander; but his imprudence in trusting himself unarmed into the enemy's camp nearly proved fatal to him. He was taken prisoner, but Epaminondas restored him to liberty. The perfidy of Alexander irritated him, and he was killed bravely fighting in a celebrated battle in which his troops obtained the victory, B. C. 364 years. He received an honourable burial, the Thebans showed their sense for his merit by their lamentations, they sent a powerful army to revenge his death in the destruction of the tyrant of Phææ and his relations, and his children were presented with immense donations by the cities of Thesaly. Pelopidas is admired for his valour, as he never engaged an enemy without obtaining the advantage. The impoverished state of Thebes before his birth, and after his fall, plainly demonstrates the superiority of his genius and of his abilities, and it has been justly observed that with Pelopidas and Epaminondas the glory and the independence of the Thebans rose and set. *Plut. & C. PELOPONNESIACUM BELLUM, a celebrated war which continued for 27 years between the Athenians and the inhabitants of Peloponnesus with their respective allies. It is the most famous and the most interesting of all the wars which happened between the inhabitants of Greece; and for the minute and circumstantial description which we have of the events and revolutions which mutual animosity produced, we are indebted more particularly to the correct and authentic writings of Thucydides and of Xenophon. The circumstances which gave birth to this memorable war are these. The power of Athens, under the prudent and vigorous administration of Pericles, was already extended over Greece, and it had procured itself many admirers and more enemies, when the Corcyreans, who had been planted by a Corinthian colony, refused to pay to their founders those marks of respect and reverence which among the Greeks every colony was obliged to pay to its mother country. The Corinthians wished to punish that infidelity; and when the people of Epidamnus, a considerable town on the Adriatic, had been invaded by some of the barbarians of Illyricum, the people of Corinth gladly granted to the Epidamnians that assistance which had in vain been solicited from the Corcyreans, their founders and their patrons. The Corcyreans were offended at the interference of Corinth in the affairs of their colony; they manned a fleet, and obtained a victory over the Corinthian vessels which had assisted the Epidamnians. The subsequent conduct of the Corcyreans, and their insolence to some of the Elians who had furnished a few ships to the Corinthians, provoked the Peloponnesians, and the discontent became general. Ambassadors were sent by both parties to Athens, to claim its protection and to justify these violent proceedings. The greatest part of the Athenians heard their various reasons with moderation and with compassion, but the enterprising ambition of Pericles prevailed, and when the Corcyreans had reminded the people of Athens, that in all the states of Peloponnesus they had to dread the most malevolent enemies, and the most insidious of rivals, they were listened to with attention and were promised support. This step was no sooner taken than the Corinthians appealed to the other Grecian states, and particularly to the Lacedæmonians. Their complaints were accompanied by those of the people of Megara and of Ægina, who bitterly inveighed against the cruelty, injustice, and insolence of the Athenians. This had due weight with the Lacedæmonians, who had long beheld with concern and with jealousy the ambitious power of the Athenians, and they determined to support the cause of the Corinthians. However, before they proceeded to hostilities, an embassy was sent to Athens to represent the danger of entering into a war with the most powerful and flourishing of all the Grecian states. This alarmed the Athenians, but when Pericles had eloquently spoken of the resources and the actual strength of the republic, and of the weakness of the allies, the clamours of his enemies were silenced, and the answer which was returned to the Spartans was taken as a declaration of war. The Spartans were supported by all the republics of the Peloponnesus, except Argos and part of Achaia, besides by the people of Megara, Bœotia, Phocis, Locris, Leucas, Ambracia, and Anactorium. The Plataeans, the Lesbians, Carians, Chians, Messenians, Acarnanians, Zacynthians, Corcyreans, Dorians, and Thracians, were the friends of the Athenians, with all the islands except Eubœa, Samos, Melos, and Thera. The first blow had already been struck, May 7, B. C. 431, by an attempt of the Bœotians to surprise Plataea; and therefore Archidamus, king of Sparta, who had in vain recommended moderation to the allies, entered Attica at the head of an army of 60,000 men, and laid waste the country by fire and sword. Pericles, who was at the head of the government, did not attempt to oppose them in the field; but a fleet of a hundred and fifty ships set sail without delay to ravage the coasts of the Peloponnesus. Megara was also depopulated by an army of 20,000 men, and the campaign of the first year of the war was concluded in celebrating, with the most solemn pomp, the funerals of such as had nobly fallen in battle. The following year was remarkable for a pestilence which raged in Athens, and which destroyed the greatest part of the inhabitants. The public calamity was still heightened by the approach of the Peloponnesian army on the borders of Attica, and by the unsuccessful expedition of the Athenians against Epidaurus, and in Thrace. The pestilence which had carried away so many of the Athenians proved also fatal to Pericles, and he died about two years and six months after the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. The following years did not give rise to decisive events; but the revolt of Lesbos from the alliance of the Athenians was productive of fresh troubles. Mitylene, the capital of the island, was recovered, and the inhabitants treated with the greatest cruelty. The island of Corcyra became also the seat of new seditions, and those citizens who had been carried away prisoners by the Corinthians, and for political reasons treated with lenity, and taught to despise the alliance of Athens, were no sooner returned home than they raised commotions, and endeavoured to persuade their countrymen to join the Peloponnesian confederates. This was strongly opposed; but both parties obtained by turns the superiority, and massacred, with the greatest barbarity, all those who obstructed their views. Some time after, Demosthenes, the Athenian general, invaded Ætolia, where his arms were attended with the greatest success. He also fortified Pylos in the Peloponnesus, and gained so many advantages over the confederates, that they sued for peace, which the insolence of Athens refused. The fortune of the war soon after changed, and the Lacedæmonians, under the prudent conduct of Brasidas, made themselves masters of many valuable places in Thrace. But this victorious progress was soon stopped by the death of their general, and that of Cleon the Athenian commander; and the pacific disposition of Nicias, who was now at the head of Athens, made overtures of peace and universal tranquillity. Plistoanax, the king of the Spartans, wished them to be accepted; but the intrigues of the Corinthians prevented the discontinuance of the war, and therefore hostilities began anew. But while war was carried on with various success in different parts of Greece, the Athenians engaged in a new expedition; they yielded to the persuasive eloquence of Gorgias of Leontium, and the ambitious views of Alcibiades, and sent a fleet of 20 ships to assist the Sicilian states against the tyrannical power of Syracuse, B. C. 416. This was warmly opposed by Nicias; but the eloquence of Alcibiades prevailed, and a powerful fleet was sent against the capital of Sicily. These vigorous, though impolitic measures of the Athenians, were not viewed with indifference by the confederates. Syracuse, in her distress, implored the assistance of Corinth, and Gylippus was sent to direct her operations, and to defend her against the power of her enemies. The events of battles were dubious, and though the Athenian army was animated by the prudence and intrepidity of Nicias, and the more hasty courage of Demosthenes, yet the good fortune of Syracuse prevailed; and, after a campaign of two years of bloodshed, the fleets of Athens were totally ruined, and the few soldiers that survived the destructive siege made prisoners of war. So fatal a blow threw the people of Attica into consternation and despair, and while they sought for resources at home, they severely felt themselves deprived of support abroad; their allies were alienated by the intrigues of the enemy, and rebellion was fomented in their dependant states and colonies on the Asiatic coast. The threatened ruin, however, was timely averted, and Alcibiades, who had been treated with cruelty by his countrymen, and who had for some time resided in Sparta and directed her military operations, now exerted himself to defeat the designs of the confederates, by inducing the Persians to espouse the cause of his country. But a short time after, the internal tranquillity of Athens was disturbed, and Alcibiades, by wishing to abolish the democracy, called away the attention of his fellow-citizens from the prosecution of a war which had already cost them so much blood. This, however, was but momentary; the Athenians soon after obtained a naval victory, and the Peloponnesian fleet was defeated by Alcibiades. The Athenians beheld with rapture the success of their arms; but when their fleet, in the absence of Alcibiades, had been defeated and destroyed near Andros by Lysander the Lacedæmonian admiral, they showed their discontent and mortification by eagerly listening to the accusations which were brought against their naval leader, to whom they gratefully had acknowledged themselves indebted for their former victories. Alcibiades was disgraced in the public assembly, and ten commanders were appointed to succeed him in the management of the republic. This change of admirals, and the appointment of Callicratidas to succeed Lysander, whose office had expired with the revolving year, produced new operations. The Athenians fitted out a fleet and the two nations decided their superiority near Arginusæ in a naval battle. Callicratidas was killed, and the Lacedæmonians conquered; but the rejoicings which the intelligence of this victory occasioned were soon stopped, when it was known that the wrecks of some of the disabled ships of the Athenians, and the bodies of the slain, had not been saved from the sea. The admirals were accused in the tumultuous assembly, and immediately condemned. Their successors in office were not so prudent, but they were more unfortunate in their operations. Lysander was again placed at the head of the Peloponnesian forces, instead of Eteonicus, who had succeeded to the command at the death of Callicratidas. The age and the experience of this general seemed to promise something decisive, and indeed an opportunity was not long wanting for the display of his military character. The superiority of the Athenians over that of the Peloponnesians rendered the former insolent, proud, and negligent; and, when they had imprudently forsaken their ships to indulge their idleness or pursue their amusements on the sea-shore at Ægospotamos, Lysander attacked their fleet, and his victory was complete. Of one hundred and eighty sail, only nine escaped, eight of which fled, under the command of Conon, to the island of Cyprus, and the other carried to Athens the melancholy news of the defeat. The Athenian prisoners were all massacred; and when the Peloponnesian conquerors had extended their dominion over the states and communities of Europe and Asia which formerly acknowledged the power of Athens, they returned home to finish the war by the reduction of the capital of Attica. The siege was carried on with vigour and supported with firmness, and the first Athenian who mentioned capitulation to his countrymen was instantly sacrificed to the fury and the indignation of the populace, and all the citizens unanimously declared, that the same moment would terminate their independence and their lives. This animated language, however, was not long continued; the spirit of faction was not yet extinguished at Athens, and it proved, perhaps, more destructive to the public liberty than the operations and assaults of the Peloponnesian besiegers. During four months, negotiations were carried on with the Spartans by the aristocratical part of the Athenians, and at last it was agreed that, to establish the peace, the fortifications of the Athenian harbours must be demolished, together with the long walls which joined them to the city; all their ships, except 12, were to be surrendered to the enemy: they were to resign every pretension to their ancient dominions abroad; to recall from banishment all the members of the late aristocracy; to follow the Spartans in war, and in the time of peace, to frame their constitution according to the will and the prescriptions of their Peloponnesian conquerors. The terms were accepted, and the enemy entered the harbour, and took possession of the city that very day on which the Athenians had been accustomed to celebrate the anniversary of the immortal victory which their ancestors had obtained over the Persians about 76 years before, near the island of Salamis. The walls and fortifications were instantly levelled with the ground; and the conquerors observed, that in the demolition of Athens, succeeding ages would fix the era of Grecian freedom. The day was concluded with a festival, and the recitation of one of the tragedies of Euripides, in which the misfortunes of the daughter of Agamemnon, who was reduced to misery, and banished from her father's kingdom, excited a kindred sympathy in the bosom of the audience, who melted into tears at the recollection that one moment had likewise reduced to misery and servitude the capital of Attica, which was once called the common patroness of Greece and the scourge of Persia. This memorable event happened about 404 years before the Christian era, and 30 tyrants were appointed by Lysander over the government of the city. *Xen. Græc. Hist.—Plut. in Lys. Per. Alcib. PELOPONNESUS, a celebrated peninsula which comprehends the most southern parts of Greece. [It was called Peloponnesus from Πελοπος νησος, the island of Pelops who settled there, and it would be an island were it not for the isthmus of Corinth which connects it with Græcia Propria. It was most anciently called Ægialea, from Ægialeus, Apia from Apis, Pelasgia from the Pelasgi. vid. Pelasgi.] In its form, it has been observed by the moderns highly to resemble the leaf of the plane-tree. Its present name is Morea, which seems to be derived either from the Greek word μορεα, or the Latin morus, which signifies a mulberry tree, which is found there in great abundance, [and which trees were introduced for the purpose of supplying the silk-worms with food.] The ancient Peloponnesus was divided into six different provinces, Messenia, Laconia, Elis, Arcadia, Achaia Propria, and Argolis, to which some add Sicyon. These provinces all bordered on the sea-shore, except Arcadia. The Peloponnesus was conquered, some time after the Trojan war, by the Heraclidæ or descendants of Hercules, who had been forcibly expelled from it. The inhabitants of this peninsula rendered themselves illustrious, like the rest of the Greeks, by their genius, their fondness for the fine arts, the cultivation of learning, and the profession of arms, but in nothing more than by a celebrated war which they carried on against Athens and her allies for 27 years, and which from them received the name of the Peloponnesian war. [vid. Peloponnesiacum bellum.] The Peloponnesus scarce extended 200 miles in length and 140 in breadth, and about 563 miles in circumference. It was separated from Greece by the narrow isthmus of Corinth, which, as being only five miles broad, Demetrius, Cæsar, Nero, and some others attempted in vain to cut, to make a communication between the bay of Corinth and the Saronicus Sinus. PELOPÆA MÆNIA, is applied to the cities of Greece, but more particularly to Mycenæ and Argos, where the descendants of Pelops reigned. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 193.

PELOPS, a celebrated prince, son of Tantalus king of Phrygia. His mother's name was Euryanassa, or, according to others, Euprytone, or Eurystemista, or Dione. He was murdered by his father, who wished to try the divinity of the gods who had visited Phrygia, by placing on their tables the limbs of his son. The gods perceived his perfidious cruelty, and they refused to touch the meat, except Ceres, whom the recent loss of her daughter had rendered melancholy and inattentive. She ate one of the shoulders of Pelops, and therefore, when Jupiter had compassion on his fate, and restored him to life, he placed a shoulder of ivory instead of that which Ceres had devoured. This shoulder had an uncommon power, and it could heal by its very touch, every complaint, and remove every disorder. Some time after, the kingdom of Tantalus was invaded by Tros, king of Troy, on pretence that he had carried away his son Ganymedes. [vid. Ganymedes, and the remarks under that article.] This rape had been committed by Jupiter himself; the war, nevertheless, was carried on, and Tantalus, defeated and ruined, was obliged to fly with his son Pelops, and to seek a shelter in Greece. [vid. Troja, and the remarks under that article, as to the true cause of the Trojan war.] Pelops came to Piseo, where he became one of the suitors of Hippodamia, the daughter of king Enomaus.

and he entered the lists against the father, who promised his daughter only to him who could outrun him in a chariot race. Pelops was not terrified at the fate of the 13 lovers, who before him had entered the course against Œnomaus, and had, according to the conditions proposed, been put to death when conquered. He previously bribed Myrtilus, the charioteer of Œnomaus, and therefore he easily obtained the victory. [vid. Œnomaus.] He married Hippodamia, and threw headlong into the sea Myrtilus, when he claimed the reward of his perfidy. According to some authors, Pelops had received some winged horses from Neptune, with which he was enabled to outrun Œnomaus. When he had established himself on the throne of Pisa, Hippodamia's possession, he extended his conquests over the neighbouring countries, and from him the peninsula, of which he was one of the monarchs, received the name of Peloponnesus. Pelops, after death, received divine honours, and he was as much revered above all the other heroes of Greece as Jupiter was above the rest of the gods. He had a temple at Olympia, near that of Jupiter, where Hercules consecrated to him a small portion of land, and offered to him a sacrifice. The place where this sacrifice had been offered, was religiously observed, and the magistrates of the country yearly, on coming into office, made there an offering of a black ram. During the sacrifice, the soothsayer was not allowed, as at other times, to have a share of the victim, but he alone who furnished the wood, was permitted to take the neck. The wood for sacrifices, it may be observed, was always furnished by some of the priests, to all such as offered victims, and they received a price equivalent to what they gave. The white poplar was generally used in the sacrifices made to Jupiter and to Pelops. The children of Pelops by Hippodamia were, Pitheus, Trœzene, Atreus, Thyestes, &c. besides some by concubines. The time of his death is unknown, though it is universally agreed, that he survived some time Hippodamia. Some suppose that the Palladium of the Trojans was made with the bones of Pelops. His descendants were called Pelopidae. Pindar, who in his first Olympic speaks of Pelops, confutes the traditions of his ivory shoulder, and says that Neptune took him up to heaven to become the cup-bearer to the gods, from which he was expelled, when the impiety of Tantalus wished to make mankind partake of the nectar and the entertainments of the gods. Some suppose that Pelops first instituted the Olympic games in honour of Jupiter, and to commemorate the victory which he had obtained over Œnomaus. Paus. 5, c. 1, &c.—Apolod. 2, c. 5.—Eurip. in Iphig.—Diod. 3.—Strab. 8.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—*Pindar. PELORIA, a festival observed by the Thesalians, in commemoration of the news which they received by one Pelorius, that the mountains of Tempe had been separated by an earthquake, and that the waters of the lake which lay there stagnated, had found a passage into the Alpheus, and left behind a vast, pleasant, and most delightful plain, &c. Athen. 3.

PELŌRUS, (v. is-dis, v. ias-iados), now Cape Faro, one of the three great promontories of Sicily, on whose top was erected a tower to direct the sailor on his voyage. It lies near the coast of Italy, and received its name from Pelorus, the pilot of the ship which carried away Annibal from Italy. This celebrated general, as it is reported, was carried by the tides into the straits of Charybdis; and as he was ignorant of the coast, he asked the pilot of his ship the name of the promontory which appeared at a distance. The pilot told him it was one of the capes of Sicily, but Annibal gave no credit to his information, and murdered him on the spot on the apprehension that he would betray him into the hands of the Romans. He was, however, soon convinced of his error, and found that the pilot had spoken with great fidelity; and, therefore, to pay honour to his memory, and to atone for his cruelty, he gave him a magnificent funeral, and ordered that the promontory should bear his name, and from that time it was called Pelorum. Some suppose that this account is false, and they observe, that it bore that name before the age of Annibal. Val. Max. 9, c. 8.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 411 and 687.—*Ovid. PELTÆ, a town of Phrygia, [south-east of Cotyæum.]

PELŪSIUM, now Tineh, a town of Egypt, situate at the entrance of one of the mouths of the Nile, called from it Pelusian. It is about 20 stadia from the sea, and it has received the name of Pelusium from the lakes and marshes which are in its neighbourhood. [Its name is derived from the Greek term πηλος, mud. Its Hebrew name Sin, by which the prophet Ezekiel denominates it, as well as its Arabian name Thinah, have the same import as the Greek.] It was the key of Egypt on the side of Phœnicia, as it was impossible to enter the Egyptian territories without passing by Pelusium, and therefore, on that account it was always well fortified and garrisoned, as it was of such importance for the security of the country. It produced lentils, and was celebrated for the linen stuffs made there. It is now in ruins. Mela, 2, c. 9.—Colum. 5, c. 10.—*Sil. PENĀTES, certain inferior deities among the Romans, who presided over houses and the domestic affairs of families. They were called Penates, because they were generally placed in the innermost and most secret parts of the house, in penatissimâ ædium parte, quod, as Cicero says, penitus insident. The place where they stood was afterwards called penetralia, and they themselves received the name of Penetrales. It was in the option of every master of a family to choose his Penates, and therefore Jupiter and some of the superior gods are often invoked as patrons of domestic affairs. According to some, the gods Penates were divided into four classes; the first comprehended all the celestial, the second the sea gods, the third the gods of hell, and the last all such heroes as had received divine honours after death. The statues of the Penates were generally made with wax, ivory, silver, or earth, according to the affluence of the worshipper, and the only offerings they received were wine, incense, fruits, and sometimes the sacrifice of lambs, sheep, goats, &c. In the early ages of Rome, human sacrifices were offered to them; but Brutus, who expelled the Tarquins, abolished this unnatural custom. When offerings were made to them, their statues were crowned with garlands, poppies, or garlic, and besides the monthly day that was set apart for their worship, their festivals were celebrated during the Saturnalia. Some have confounded the Lares and the Penates, but they were different. [The Penates were of divine origin, the Lares of human. Certain persons were admitted to the worship of the Lares who were not to that of the Penates. The Penates were worshipped only in the innermost parts of the house, the Lares also in the public roads, in the camp, and on sea.] Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 27, Ver. 2.—Dionys. 1.

PENÉLOPE, a celebrated princess of Greece, daughter of Icarus, and wife of Ulysses, king of Ithaca. Her marriage with Ulysses was celebrated about the same time that Menelaus married Helen, and she retired with her husband to Ithaca, against the inclination of her father, who wished to detain her at Sparta, her native country. She soon after became mother of Telemachus, and was obliged to part with great reluctance from her husband, whom the Greeks obliged to go to the Trojan war. [vid. Palamedes.] The continuation of hostilities for ten years made her sad and melancholy; but when Ulysses did not return like the other princes of Greece, at the conclusion of the war, her fears and her anxieties were increased. As she received no intelligence of his situation, she was soon beset by a number of importuning suitors, who wished her to believe that her husband was shipwrecked, and that therefore she ought not longer to expect his return, but forget his loss, and fix her choice and affections on one of her numerous admirers. She received their addresses with coldness and disdain; but as she was destitute of power, and a prisoner as it were in their hands, she yet flattered them with hopes and promises, and declared that she would make choice of one of them, as soon as she had finished a piece of tapestry on which she was employed. The work was done in a dilatory manner, and she baffled their eager expectations, by undoing in the night what she had done in the day-time. This artifice of Penelope has given rise to the proverb of Penelope's web, which is applied to whatever labour can never be ended. The return of Ulysses, after an absence of twenty years, however, delivered her from fears and from her dangerous suitors. Penelope is described by Homer as a model of female virtue and chastity, but some more modern writers dispute her claims to modesty and continence, and they represent her as the most debauched and voluptuous of her sex. According to their opinions, therefore, she liberally gratified the desires of her suitors, in the absence of her husband, and had a son whom she called Pan, as it to show that he was the offspring of all her admirers. Some, however, suppose that Pan was son of Penelope by Mercury, and that he was born before his mother's marriage with Ulysses. The god, as it is said, deceived Penelope, under the form of a beautiful goat, as she was tending her father's flocks on one of the mountains of Arcadia. After the return of Ulysses, Penelope had a daughter, who was called Ptoliporthé; but if we believe the traditions that were long preserved at Mantinea, Ulysses repudiated his wife for her incontinence during his absence, and Penelope fled to Sparta, and afterwards to Mantinea, where she died and was buried. After the death of Ulysses, according to Hyginus, she married Telegonus, her husband's son by Circe, by order of the goddess Minerva. Some say that her original name was Arnea, or Amirace, and that she was called Penelope, when some river birds, called Penelopes, had saved her from the waves of the sea when her father had exposed her. Icarus had attempted to destroy her, because the oracles had told him that his daughter by Peribœa would be the most dissolute of her sex and a disgrace to his family. Apollod. 3, c. 10.—Paus. 3, c. 12.—*Homer. PENEUS, a river of Thessaly, rising on Mount Pindus, and falling into the Thermean gulf, after a wandering course between Mount Ossa and Olympus, through the plains of Tempe. It received its name from Peneus, a son of Oceanus and Tethys. The Peneus anciently inundated the plains of Thessaly, till an earthquake separated the mountains Ossa and Olympus, and formed the beautiful vale of Tempe, where the waters formerly stagnated. From this circumstance, therefore, it obtained the name of Araxes, ἀραξου, σκινδο. [vid. Deucalion.] Daphne, the daughter of the Peneus, according to the fables of the mythologists, was changed into a laurel on the banks of this river. This tradition arises from the quantity of laurels which grew near the Peneus. [The Peneus is now called the Salampria. This name is evidently of ancient origin, since, according to Eustathius, the river was in his time called Salimprias, a name of Greek origin, as, according to Hesychius, σαλαμειν signifies an opening of gates.] *Ovid. PENNINÆ ALPES, a certain part of the Alps, [now Great St. Bernard. The name is derived from Pen, a summit. vid. Alpes.] Liv. 21, c. 28.

PENTAPOLIS, a town of India, [placed by Mannert in the north-eastern angle of the Sinus Gangeticus, or Bay of Bengal.]—[A name given to Cyrenaica in Africa, from its five cities.] Plin. 5, c. 5.—Also a part of Palestine, containing the five cities of Gaza, Gath, Ascalon, Azotus, and Ekron.—[Also a name applied to Doris in Asia Minor, after Halicarnassus had been excluded from the Doric confederacy. vid. Doris.]

PENTELICUS, [a mountain of Attica, where were found quarries of beautiful marble. "Mount Pentelicus," observes Hobhouse, "at this day called Pendele, and sometimes Mendele, must be, I should think, one third higher than Hymettus, and its height is the more apparent, as it rises with a peaked summit into the clouds. The range of Pentelicus runs from about north-west to south-east, at no great distance from the eastern shore of Attica, overhanging the plain of Marathon, and mixing imperceptibly, at its northern extremity, with the hills of Brilessus, now called, as well as part of Mount Parnes, Ozea." The same writer then proceeds to relate an interesting visit to the quarries of Pentelicus. vid. Hobhouse's Journey, vol. 1, p. 325-7.] Strab. 9.—Paus. 1, c. 32.

PENTHESILĒA, a queen of the Amazons, daughter of Mars, by Otrera, or Orithya. She came to assist Priam in the last years of the Trojan war, and fought against Achilles, by whom she was slain. The hero was so struck with the beauty of Pentesilea, when he stripped her of her arms, that he even shed tears for having too violently sacrificed her to his fury. Thersites laughed at the partiality of the hero, for which ridicule he was instantly killed. Lycophron says, that Achilles slew Thersites because he had put out the eyes of Pentesilea when she was yet alive. The scholiast of Lycophron differs from that opinion, and declares, that it was commonly believed that Achilles offered violence to the body of Pentesilea when she was dead, and that Thersites was killed because he had reproached the hero for this infamous action in the presence of all the Greeks. The death of Thersites so offended Diomedes that he dragged the body of Pentesilea out of the camp, and threw it into the Scamander. It is generally supposed that Achilles was enamoured of the Amazon before he fought with her, and that she had by him a son called Cayster. Dictys. Cret. 3 and 4.—Paus. 10, c. 31.—*Q. PENTHEUS, son of Echion and Agave, was king of Thebes in Bœotia. His refusal to acknowledge the divinity of Bacchus was attended with the most fatal consequences. He for-bad his subjects to pay adoration to this new god; and when the Theban women had gone out of the city to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus, Pentheus, apprised of the debauchery which attended the solemnity, ordered the god himself, who conducted the religious multitude, to be seized. His orders were obeyed with reluctance, but when the doors of the prison in which Bacchus had been confined, opened of their own accord, Pentheus became more irritated, and commanded his soldiers to destroy the whole band of the bacchanals. This, however, was not executed, for Bacchus inspired the monarch with the ardent desire of seeing the celebration of the orgies. Accordingly he hid himself in a wood on Mount Citharon, from whence he could see all the ceremonies unperceived. But here his curiosity soon proved fatal, he was descried by the bacchanals, and they all rushed upon him. His mother was the first who attacked him, and her example was instantly followed by her two sisters, Ino and Autonoe, and his body was torn to pieces. Euripides introduces Bacchus among his priestesses, when Pentheus was put to death; but Ovid, who relates the whole in the same manner, differs from the Greek poet only in saying, that not Bacchus himself, but one of his priests, was present. The tree on which the bacchanals found Pentheus was cut down by the Corinthians, by order of the oracle, and with it two statues of the god of wine were made, and placed in the forum. Hygin. fab. 184.—Theocrit. 26.—*Ovid. PENTHÛLUS, a prince of Paphos, who assisted Xerxes with 12 ships. He was seized by the Greeks, to whom he communicated many important things concerning the situation of the Persians, &c. Herodot. 7, c. 195.

PEPĀRĒTHOS, a small island of the Ægean Sea, on the coast of Macedonia, about 20 miles in circumference. It abounded in olives, and its wines have always been reckoned excellent. They were not, however, palatable before they were seven years old. Plin. 4, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 470.—Liv. 28, c. 5, l. 31, c. 23.

PERĒA, [a name given by the Greeks to that part of Judea which lay east of Jordan, and between the two lakes. The term is thought to be derived from περὰν, "beyond."] Plin. 5, c. 14.—A part of Caria, opposite to Rhodes. Liv. 32, c. 33.

PERCÔPE, a city which assisted Priam during the Trojan war. vid. Percote.

PERCÔTE, a town on the Hellespont, between Abydos and Lampascus, near the seashore. Artaxerxes gave it to Themistocles, to maintain his wardrobe. It is sometimes called Percope. Herodot. 1, c. 117.—Hom.

PERDICCAS, the fourth king of Macedonia, B. C. 729, was descended from Temenus. He increased his dominions by conquest, and in the latter part of his life, he showed his son Argeus where he wished to be buried, and told him that as long as the bones of his descendants and successors on the throne of Macedonia were laid in the same grave, so long would the crown remain in their family. These injunctions were observed till the time of Alexander, who was buried out of Macedonia. Herodot. 7 and 8.—Justin. 7, c. 2.—Another, king of Macedonia, son of Alexander. He reigned during the Peloponnesian war, and assisted the Lacedæmonians against Athens. He behaved with great courage on the throne, and died B. C. 413, after a long reign of glory and independence, during which he had subdued some of his barbarian neighbours.—Another, king of Macedonia, who was supported on his throne by Iphicrates the Athenian, against the intrusions of Pausanias. He was killed in a war against the Illyrians, B. C. 360. Justin. 7, &c.—One of the friends and favourites of Alexander the Great. At the king's death he wished to make himself absolute; and the ring which he had received from the hand of the dying Alexander, seemed in some measure to favour his pretensions. The better to support his claims to the throne, he married Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander, and strengthened himself by making a league with Eumenes. His ambitious views were easily discovered by Antigonus and the rest of the generals of Alexander, who all wished, like Perdiccas, to succeed to the kingdom and honours of the deceased monarch. Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy, leagued with Antigonus against him, and after much bloodshed on both sides, Perdiccas was totally ruined, and at last assassinated in his tent in Egypt by his own officers, about 321 years before the Christian era. Perdiccas had not the prudence and the address which were necessary to conciliate the esteem and gain the attachment of his fellow-soldiers: and this impropriety of his conduct alienated the hearts of his friends, and at last proved his destruction. Plut. in Alex.—Diod. 17 and 18.—Curt. 10.—*C. PERDIX, a young Athenian, son of the sister of Dædalus. He invented the saw, and seemed to promise to become a greater artist than had ever been known. His uncle was jealous of his rising fame, and he threw him down from the top of a tower, and put him to death. Perdix was changed into a bird which bears his name. Hygin. fab. 39 and 274.—Apollod. 3, c. 15.—Ovid. Met. 8, v. 220, &c.

PERENNA. vid. Anna.

PERENNIS, a favourite of the emperor Commodus. He is described by some as a virtuous and impartial magistrate, while others paint him as a cruel, violent, and oppressive tyrant who committed the greatest barbarities to enrich himself. He was put to death for aspiring to the empire. Herodian.

PERGA, a town of Pamphylia. vid. Perge. Liv. 38, c. 57.

PERGĀMUS, Pergamæ, (plur.) the citadel of the city of Troy. The word is often used for Troy. It was situated in the most elevated part of the town, on the shores of the river Scamander. Xerxes mounted to the top of this citadel when he reviewed his troops as he marched to invade Greece. [vid. Troja.] Herodot. 7, c. 43.—Virg. Æn. 1, v. 466, &c.

PERGĀMUS, now Bergamo, a town of Mysia, on the banks of the Caycus. It was the capital of a celebrated empire called the kingdom of Pergamus, which was founded by Philæterus, an eunuch, whom Lysimachus, after the battle of Ipsus, had intrusted with the treasures which he had obtained in the war. Philæterus made himself master of the treasures and of Pergamus in which they were deposited, B. C. 263, and laid the foundations of an empire, over which he himself presided for 20 years. His successors began to reign in the following order: His nephew Eumenes ascended the throne 263 B. C.; Attalus 241; Eumenes the second, 197; Attalus Philadelphus, 159; Attalus Philomater, 138, who, B. C. 133, left the Roman people heirs to his kingdom as he had no children. The right of the Romans, however, was disputed by an usurper, who claimed the empire as his own; and Aquilius, the Roman general, was obliged to conquer the different cities one by one, and to gain their submission by poisoning the waters which were conveyed to their houses, till the whole was reduced into the form of a dependent province. The capital of the kingdom of Pergamus was famous for a library of 200,000 volumes, which had been collected by the different monarchs who had reigned there. This noble collection was afterwards transported to Egypt by Cleopatra, with the permission of Antony, and it adorned and enriched the Alexandrian library till it was most fatally destroyed by the Saracens, A. D. 642. Parchment was first invented and made use of at Pergamus, to transcribe books, as Ptolemy king of Egypt had forbidden the exportation of papyrus from his kingdom, in order to prevent Eumenes from making a library as valuable and as choice as that of Alexandria. From this circumstance parchment has been called charta pergamena. Galenus the physician, and Apollodorus the mythologist were born there. Æsculapius was the chief deity of the country. Plin. 5 and 15.—Isid. 6, c. 11.—Strab. 13.—Liv. 29, c. 11, l. 31, c. 46.—Plin. 10, c. 21, l. 13, c. 11.—A son of Neoptolemus and Andromache, who, as some suppose, founded Pergamus in Asia. Paus. 1, c. 11.

PERGE, a town of Pamphylia, [on the river Cestrus, near its mouth,] where Diana had a magnificent temple, whence her surname of Pergæa. Apollonius, the geometrician, was born there. [It is now called Karahisar, or the Black Castle.] Mela, 1, c. 14.—Strab. 14.

PERGUS, a lake of Sicily near Enna, where Proserpine was carried away by Pluto. Ovid. 5, v. 386.

PERIANDER, a tyrant of Corinth, son of Cypselus. The first years of his government were mild and popular, but he soon learnt to become oppressive when he had consulted the tyrant of Sicily about the surest way of reigning. He received no other answer but whatever explanation he wished to take place on the Sicilian tyrant's having, in the presence of his messenger, plucked in a field all the ears of corn which seemed to tower above the rest. Periander understood the meaning of this answer. He immediately surrounded himself with a numerous guard, and put to death the richest and most powerful citizens of Corinth. He was not only cruel to his subjects, but his family also were objects of his vengeance. He committed incest with his mother, and put to death his wife Melissa, upon false accusation. He also banished his son Lycophron to the island of Corcyra, because the youth pitied and wept at the miserable end of his mother, and detested the barbarities of his father. Periander died about 585 years before the Christian era, in his 80th year, and by the meanness of his flatterers he was reckoned one of the seven wise men of Greece. Though he was tyrannical, yet he patronized the fine arts; he was fond of peace, and he showed himself the friend and protector of genius and of learning. He used to say, that a man ought solemnly to keep his word, but not to hesitate to break it if ever it clashed with his interest. He said also that not only crimes ought to be punished, but also every wicked and corrupted thought. *Diog. in vitâ.—Arist. 5, Polit.—Paus. 2.—*A tyrant of Ambracia, whom some rank with the seven wise men of Greece, and not the tyrant of Corinth.

PERIBŒA, a daughter of Alcæthous, sold by her father on suspicion that she was courted by Telamon, son of Æacus, king of Ægina. She was carried to Cyprus, where Telamon the founder of Salamis married her, and she became mother of Ajax. She also married Theseus, according to some. She is also called Eribœa. *Paus. 1, c. 17 and 42.—Hygin. 97.—*The wife of Polybus, king of Corinth, who educated Œdipus as her own child.

PERICLES, an Athenian of a noble family, son of Xanthippus and Agariste. He was naturally endowed with great powers, which he improved by attending the lectures of Damon, of Zeno, and of Anaxagoras. Under these celebrated masters he became a commander, a statesman, and an orator, and gained the affections of the people by his uncommon address and well directed liberality. When he took a share in the administration of public affairs, he rendered himself popular by opposing Cimon, who was the favourite of the nobility, and to remove every obstacle which stood in the way of his ambition, he lessened the dignity and the power of the court of the Areopagus, which the people had been taught for ages to respect and to venerate. He also attacked Cimon, and caused him to be banished by the ostracism. Thucydides also, who had succeeded Cimon on his banishment, shared the same fate, and

Pericles remained for 15 years the sole minister, and, as it may be said, the absolute sovereign of a republic which always showed itself so jealous of its liberties, and which distrusted so much the honesty of her magistrates. In his ministerial capacity Pericles did not enrich himself, but the prosperity of Athens was the object of his administration. He made war against the Lacedæmonians, and restored the temple of Delphi to the care of the Phocians, who had been illegally deprived of that honourable trust. He obtained a victory over the Sicyonians near Nemæa, and waged a deceitful war against the inhabitants of Samos at the request of his favourite mistress Aspasia. The Peloponnesian war was fomented by his ambitious views. (vid. Peloponnesiacum bellum.) and when he had warmly represented the flourishing state, the opulence, and actual power of his country, the Athenians did not hesitate a moment to undertake a war against the most powerful republics of Greece, a war which continued for 27 years, and which was concluded by the destruction of their empire and the demolition of their walls. The arms of the Athenians were for some time crowned with success; but an unfortunate expedition raised clamours against Pericles, and the enraged populace attributed all their losses to him, and to make atonement for their ill success, they condemned him to pay 50 talents. This loss of popular favour by republican caprice did not so much affect Pericles as the recent death of all his children; and, when the tide of unpopularity was passed by, he condescended to come into the public assembly, and to view with secret pride the contrition of his fellow-citizens, who universally begged his forgiveness for the violence which they had offered to his ministerial character. He was again restored to all his honours, and, if possible, invested with more power and more authority than before; but the dreadful pestilence which had diminished the number of his family proved fatal to him, and about 429 years before Christ, in his 70th year, he fell a sacrifice to that terrible malady which robbed Athens of so many of her citizens. Pericles was for 40 years at the head of the administration, 25 years with others, and 15 alone, and the flourishing state of the empire during his government gave occasion to the Athenians publicly to lament his loss, and venerate his memory. As he was expiring, and seemingly senseless, his friends that stood around his bed expatiated with warmth on the most glorious actions of his life, and the victories which he had won, when he suddenly interrupted their tears and conversation, by saying, that in mentioning the exploits that he had achieved, and which were common to him with all generals, they had forgot to mention a circumstance which reflected far greater glory upon him as a minister, a general, and above all, as a man. It is, says he, that not a citizen in Athens has been obliged to put on mourning on my account. The Athenians were so pleased with his eloquence that they compared it to thunder and lightning, and, as to another father of the gods, they gave him the surname of Olympian. The poets, his flatterers, said that the goddess of persuasion, with all her charms and attractions, dwelt upon his tongue. When he marched at the head of the Athenian armies, Pericles observed that he had the command of a free nation that were Greeks and citizens of Athens. He also declared that not only the hand of a magistrate, but also his eyes and his tongue should be pure and undefiled. Yet great and venerable as this character may appear, we must not forget the follies of Pericles. His vicious partiality for the celebrated courtesan Aspasia, subjected him to the ridicule and the censure of his fellow-citizens; but if he triumphed over satire and malevolent remarks, the Athenians had occasion to execrate the memory of a man who by his example corrupted the purity and innocence of their morals, and who made licentiousness respectable, and the indulgence of every impure desire the qualification of the soldier as well as of the senator. Pericles lost all his legitimate children by the pestilence, and to call a natural son by his own name, he was obliged to repeal a law which he had made against spurious children, and which he had enforced with great severity. This son, called Pericles, became one of the ten generals who succeeded Alcibiades in the administration of affairs, and, like his colleagues, he was condemned to death by the Athenians, after the unfortunate battle of Arginusæ. Paus. 1, c. 25.—Plut. in vitâ.—Quintil. 12, c. 9.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—Ælian. V. PERICLYMÉNUS, one of the twelve sons of Neleus, brother to Nestor, killed by Hercules. He was one of the Argonauts, and had received from Neptune his grandfather the power of changing himself into whatever shape he pleased. Apollod.—Ovid. Met. 12, v. 557.

PERIEGÈTES DIONYSIUS, a poet. [vid. Dionysius.]

PERILLA, a daughter of Ovid the poet. She was extremely fond of poetry and literature. Ovid. Fast. 5, el. 7, v. 1.

PERILLUS, an ingenious artist at Athens who made a brazen bull for Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum. This machine was fabricated to put criminals to death by burning them alive, and it was such that their cries were like the roaring of a bull. When Perillus gave it Phalaris, the tyrant made the first experiment upon the donor, and cruelly put him to death by lighting a slow fire under the belly of the bull. Plin. 34, c. 8.—Ovid. in Art. Am. 1, v. 653, in Ib. 439.

PERIMÉLA, c. daughter of Hippodamas, thrown into the sea for receiving the addresses of the Achelous. She was changed into an island in the Ionian Sea, and became one of the Echinades. Ovid. Met. 9, v. 790.

PERINTHUS, a town of Thrace, on the Propontis, anciently surnamed Mygdonica. It was afterwards called Heraclea, in honour of Hercules, and now Erekli. [From this city a wall, called Μακρον τευχος, was built across to the Euxine by the emperor Anastasius.] Mela, 2, c. 2.—Paus. 1, c. 29.—Plin. 4, c. 11.—Liv. 33, c. 30.

PERIPATETICI, a sect of philosophers at Athens, disciples of Aristotle. They received this name from the place where they were taught, called Peripaton, in the Lyceum, or because they received the philosopher's lectures as they walked (περιπατουντες). [Cicero tells us that Plato left two excellent disciples, Xenocrates and Aristotle, who founded two sects which only differed in name, the former taking the appellation of Academics, who were those that continued to hold their conferences in the Academy as Plato had done before; the others, followers of Aristotle.] The Peripatetics acknowledged the dignity of human nature, and placed their summum bonum, not in the pleasures of passive sensation, but in the due exercise of the moral and intellectual faculties. The habit of this exercise, when guided by reason, constituted the highest excellence of man. The philosopher contended that our own happiness chiefly depends upon ourselves, and though he did not require in his followers that self-command to which others pretended, yet he allowed a moderate degree of perturbation, as becoming human nature, and he considered a certain sensibility of passion totally necessary, as by resentment we are enabled to repel injuries, and the smart which past calamities have inflicted renders us careful to avoid the repetition. [Aristotle is said to have borrowed the greatest and best part of his philosophy from his master Plato. Serranus affirms confidently, and says he is able to demonstrate, that there is nothing exquisite in any part of Aristotle's philosophy, dialectics, ethics, politics, physics, or metaphysics, but what is found in Plato; and of this opinion are many ancient authors, Clemens, Alexandrinus, &c.] Cic. Acad. 2, &c.

PERMESSUS, a river of Bœotia, rising in Mount Helicon, and flowing all round it. It received its name from Permessus, the father of a nymph called Aganippe, who also gave her name to one of the fountains of Helicon. The river Permessus, as well as the fountain Aganippe, were sacred to the muses. Strab. 8.—Propert. 2, el. 8.

PERO, or PERONE, a daughter of Neleus, king of Pylos, by Chloris. Her beauty drew many admirers, but she married Bias, son of Amythaon, because he had, by the assistance of his brother Melampus, [vid. Melampus.] and according to her father's desire, recovered some oxen which Hercules had stolen away, and she became mother of Talauus. Homer. Od. 11, v. 284.—Propert. 2, el. 2, v. 17.—Paus. 4, c. 36.—A daughter of Cimon, remarkable for her filial affection. When her father had been sent to prison, where his judges had condemned him to starve, she supported his life by giving him the milk of her breasts as her own child. Val. Max. 5, c. 4.

PERÔE, a fountain of Bœotia called after

Perce, a daughter of the Asopus. Paus. 9, c. 4.

PERPENNA, M. a Roman who conquered Aristonicus in Asia, and took him prisoner. He died B. C. 130.—Another, who joined the rebellion of Sertorius, and opposed Pompey. He was defeated by Metellus, and some time after he had the meanness to assassinate Sertorius, whom he had invited to his house. He fell into the hands of Pompey who ordered him to be put to death. Plut. in Sert.—Paterc. 2, c. 30.

PERPERENE, a place of Phrygia, where, as some suppose, Paris adjudged the prize of beauty to Venus. Strab. 5.

PERRHÆBIA, a part of Thessaly situate north of the Peneus. The inhabitants were driven from their possessions by the Lapithæ, and retired into Ætolia, where part of the country received the name of Perrhæbia. Propert. 2, el. 5, v. 33.—Strab. 9.—Liv. 33, c. 24, l. 39, c. 34.

PERSÆ, the inhabitants of Persia. vid. Persia.

PERSÆUS, a philosopher intimate with Antigonus, by whom he was appointed over the Acrocorinth. He flourished B. C. 274. Diog.—Laert. in Zenon.

PERSËPHONE, a daughter of Jupiter and Ceres, called also Proserpina. [vid. Proserpina.]

PERSËPÔLIS, a celebrated city, the capital of the Persian empire. It was laid in ruins by Alexander after the conquest of Darius. The reason of this is unknown. Diodorus says that the sight of about 800 Greeks, whom the Persians had shamefully mutilated, so irritated Alexander, that he resolved to punish the barbarity of the inhabitants of Persepolis and of the neighbouring country, by permitting his soldiers to plunder their capital. Others suppose that Alexander set it on fire at the instigation of Thais, one of his courtezans, when he had passed the day in drinking, and in riot and debauchery. The ruins of Persepolis, now Estaker, or Shehel-Minar, still astonish the modern traveller by their grandeur and magnificence. [Persepolis, according to the best authorities, was not destroyed by Alexander, for he put a stop to the work of destruction almost the very instant after it had commenced. This is also proved by the fact of Peucestes, the satrap of Persis, having given in this very city, only a few years after, a splendid feast to the whole army. Persepolis is mentioned also by subsequent writers, and even under the dynasty of Mahometan princes this city, with its name changed to Istakhar, was their usual place of residence. Its destruction was owing to the fanatic Arabs, as is shown by M. Langlès, in a memoir contained in his Collection of Travels, vol. 3, p. 199. The fullest account of the ruins of Persepolis is to be found in the Travels of Sir Robert Ker Porter. The most remarkable part of these ruins is the Shehel-Minar, or "Forty Columns." The general impression produced by this part of the ruins, is said to be the strong resemblance which they bear to the architectural taste of Egypt. This has already been alluded to in the remarks under the article Memnonium, and may farther be accounted for by the early hostile intercourse between the two countries, and their interchange of inhabitants by captivity. Hence the efforts of Egyptian workmen would be employed in embellishing Persepolis and other cities of the east.] Curt. 5, c. 7.—Diod. 17, &c.—Arrian.—Plut. in Alex.—Justin. 11, c. 14.

PERSES, a son of Perseus and Andromeda. From him the Persians, who were originally called *Cephene*s, received their name. Herodot. 7, c. 61.—A king of Macedonia. vid. Perseus.

PERSEUS, a son of Jupiter and Danae, the daughter of Acrisius. As Acrisius had confined his daughter in a brazen tower to prevent her becoming a mother, because he was to perish, according to the words of an oracle, by the hands of his daughter's son, Perseus was no sooner born, [vid. Danae,] than he was thrown into the sea with his mother Danae. The hopes of Acrisius were frustrated; the slender boat which carried Danae and her son was driven by the winds upon the coasts of the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where they were found by a fisherman called Dictys, and carried to Polydectes, the king of the place. They were treated with great humanity, and Perseus was intrusted to the care of the priests of Minerva's temple. His rising genius and manly courage, however, soon displeased Polydectes, and the monarch, who wished to offer violence to Danae, feared the resentment of her son. Yet Polydectes resolved to remove every obstacle. He invited all his friends to a sumptuous entertainment, and it was requisite that all such as came should present the monarch with a beautiful horse. Perseus was in the number of the invited, and more particularly so, as Polydectes knew that he could not receive from him the present which he expected from all the rest. Nevertheless, Perseus, who wished not to appear inferior to the others in magnificence, told the king that as he could not give him a horse, he would bring him the head of Medusa, the only one of the Gorgons who was subject to mortality. The offer was doubly agreeable to Polydectes, as it would remove Perseus from Seriphos, and, on account of its seeming impossibility, the attempt might perhaps end in his ruin. But the innocence of Perseus was patronized by the gods. Pluto lent him his helmet, which had the wonderful power of making its bearer invisible; Minerva gave him her buckler, which was as resplendent as glass; and he received from Mercury wings and the talaria, with a short dagger made of diamonds, and called herpe. According to some, it was from Vulcan, and not from Mercury, that he received the herpe, which was in form like a scythe. With these arms Perseus began his expedition, and traversed the air, conducted by the goddess Minerva. He went to the Graiæ, the sisters of the Gorgons, who, according to the poets, had wings like the Gorgons, but only one eye and one tooth between them all, of which they made use each in her turn. They were three in number, according to Æschylus and Apollodorus; or only two, according to Ovid and Hesiod. With Pluto's helmet, which rendered him invisible, Perseus was enabled to steal their eye and their tooth while they were asleep, and he returned them only when they had informed him where their sisters the Gorgons resided. When he had received every necessary information, Perseus flew to the habitation of the Gorgons, which was situate beyond the western ocean, according to Hesiod and Apollodorus; or in Libya, according to Ovid and Lucan, or in the deserts of Asiatic Scythia, according to Æschylus. He found these monsters asleep, and as he knew that if he fixed his eyes upon them he should be instantly changed into a stone, he continually looked on his shield, which reflected all the objects as clearly as the best of glasses. He approached them, and with a courage which the goddess Minerva supported, he cut off Medusa's head with one blow. The noise awoke the two immortal sisters, but Pluto's helmet rendered Perseus invisible, and the attempts of the Gorgons to revenge Medusa's death proved fruitless, the conqueror made his way through the air, and from the blood which dropped from Medusa's head, sprang all those innumerable serpents which have ever since infested the sandy deserts of Libya. Chrysaor also, with his golden sword, sprung from these drops of blood, as well as the horse Pegasus, which immediately flew through the air and stopped on Mount Helicon, where he became the favourite of the muses. [vid. Gorgones and Pegasus, where an explanation of the fable is given.] Meantime Perseus had continued his journey across the deserts of Libya, but the approach of night obliged him to alight in the territories of Atlas, king of Mauritania. He went to the monarch's palace, where he hoped to find a kind reception, by announcing himself as the son of Jupiter, but in this he was disappointed. Atlas recollected that, according to an ancient oracle, his gardens were to be robbed of their fruit by one of the sons of Jupiter, and therefore he not only refused Perseus the hospitality he demanded, but he even offered violence to his person. Perseus, finding himself inferior to his powerful enemy, showed him Medusa's head, and instantly Atlas was changed into a large mountain which bore the same name in the deserts of Africa. On the morrow Perseus continued his flight, and as he passed across the territories of Libya, he discovered, on the coasts of Æthiopia, the naked Andromeda exposed to a sea-monster. He was struck at the sight, and offered her father Cepheus to deliver her from instant death if he obtained her in marriage as a reward of his labours. Cepheus consented, and immediately Perseus, raising himself in the air, flew towards the monster, which was advancing to devour Andromeda, and he plunged his dagger in his right shoulder, and destroyed it. This happy event was attended with the greatest rejoicings. Perseus raised three altars to Mercury, Jupiter, and Pallas, and after he had offered the sacrifice of a calf, a bullock, and a heifer, the nuptials were celebrated with the greatest festivity. The universal joy, however, was soon disturbed. Phineus, Andromeda's uncle, entered the palace with a number of armed men, and attempted to carry away the bride whom he had courted and admired long before the arrival of Perseus. The father and mother of Andromeda interfered, but in vain; a bloody battle ensued, and Perseus must have fallen a victim to the rage of Phineus, had not he defended himself at last with the same arms which proved fatal to Atlas. He showed the Gorgon's head to his adversaries, and they were instantly turned to stone, each in the posture and attitude in which he then stood. The friends of Cepheus, and such as supported Perseus, shared not the fate of Phineus, as the hero had previously warned them of the power of Medusa's head, and of the services which he received from it. Soon after this memorable adventure Perseus retired to Seriphos, at the very moment that his mother Danae fled to the altar of Minerva to avoid the pursuit of Polydectes, who attempted to offer her violence. Dictys, who had saved her from the sea, and who, as some say, was the brother of Polydectes, defended her against the attempts of her enemies, and therefore Perseus, sensible of his merit and of his humanity, placed him on the throne of Seriphos, after he had with Medusa's head turned into stones the wicked Polydectes and the officers who were the associates of his guilt. He afterwards restored to Mercury his talaria and his wings, to Pluto his helmet, to Vulcan his sword, and to Minerva her shield; but as he was more particularly indebted to the goddess of wisdom for her assistance and protection, he placed the Gorgon's head on her shield, or rather, according to the more received opinion, on her ægis. After he had finished these celebrated exploits, Perseus expressed a wish to return to his native country, and accordingly he embarked for the Peloponnesus with his mother and Andromeda. When he reached the Peloponnesian coasts he was informed that Teutamias, king of Larissa, was then celebrating funeral games in honour of his father. This intelligence drew him to Larissa to signalize himself in throwing the quoit, of which, according to some, he was the inventor. But here he was attended by an evil fate, and had the misfortune to kill a man with a quoit which he had thrown in the air. This was no other than his grandfather Acrisius, who, on the first intelligence that his grandson had reached the Peloponnesus, fled from his kingdom of Argos to the court of his friend and ally Teutamias, to prevent the fulfilling of the oracle which had obliged him to treat his daughter with so much barbarity. Some suppose with Pausanias, that Acrisius had gone to Larissa to be reconciled to his grandson, whose fame had been spread in every city of Greece; and Ovid maintains that the grandfather was under the strongest obligations to his son-in-law, as through him he had received his kingdom, from which he had been forcibly driven by the sons of his brother Prætus. This unfortunate murder greatly depressed the spirits of Perseus; by the death of Acrisius he was entitled to the throne of Argos, but he refused to reign there; and to remove himself from a place which reminded him of the parricide he had unfortunately committed, he exchanged his kingdom for that of Tirynthus, and the maritime coast of Argolis, where Megapenthes, the son of Prætus, then reigned. When he had finally settled in this part of the Peloponnesus, he determined to lay the foundations of a new city, which he made the capital of his dominions, and which he called Mycenæ, because the pommel of his sword, called by the Greeks myces, had fallen there. The time of his death is unknown, yet it is universally agreed that he received divine honours like the rest of the ancient heroes. He had statues at Mycenæ and in the island of Seriphos, and the Athenians raised him a temple in which they consecrated an altar in honour of Dictys, who had treated Danae and her infant son with so much paternal tenderness. The Egyptians also paid particular honour to his memory, and asserted that he often appeared among them wearing shoes two cubits long, which was always interpreted as a sign of fertility. Perseus had by Andromeda Alceus, Sthenelus, Nestor, Electryon, and Gorgophone, and after death, according to some mythologists, he became a constellation in the heavens. Herodot. 2, c. 91.—Apollod. 2, c. 4, &c.—Paus. 2, c. 16 and 18, l. 3, c. 17, &c.—*Apollon. PERSEUS, or PERSES, a son of Philip king of Macedonia. He distinguished himself like his father, by his enmity to the Romans, and when he had made sufficient preparations, he declared war against them. His operations, however, were slow and injudicious; he wanted courage and resolution, and though he at first obtained some advantages over the Roman armies, yet his avarice and his timidity proved destructive to his cause. When Paulus was appointed to the command of the Roman armies in Macedonia, Perseus showed his inferiority by his imprudent encampments, and when he had at last yielded to the advice of his officers, who recommended a general engagement, and drawn up his forces near the walls of Pydna, B. C. 168, he was the first who ruined his own cause, and, by flying as soon as the battle was begun, he left the enemy masters of the field. From Pydna, Perseus fled to Samothrace, but he was soon discovered in his obscure retreat, and brought into the presence of the Roman conqueror, where the meanness of his behaviour exposed him to ridicule and not to mercy. He was carried to Rome, and dragged along the streets of the city to adorn the triumph of the conqueror. His family were also exposed to the sight of the Roman populace, who shed tears on viewing in their streets, dragged like a slave, a monarch who had once defeated their armies, and spread alarm all over Italy by the greatness of his military preparations, and by his bold undertakings. Perseus died in prison, or, according to some, he was put to a shameful death the first year of his captivity. He had two sons, Philip and Alexander, and one daughter, whose name is not known. Alexander, the younger of these, was hired to a Roman carpenter, and led the greatest part of his life in obscurity till his ingenuity raised him to notice. He was afterwards made secretary to the senate. Liv. 40, &c.—Justin. 33, c. 1, &c.—Plut. in Paulo.—Flor. 2, c. 12.—Propert. 4, el. 12, v. 39.

PERSIA, a celebrated kingdom of Asia, which in its ancient state extended from the Hellespont to the Indus, above 2800 miles, and from Pontus to the shores of Arabia above 2000 miles. [The ancient name of Persia was Elam or Elymais, and its inhabitants were denominated Elamites, as the descendants of Elam the son of Shem, and under this appellation they formed about the time of Abraham in the 18th or 19th century B. C. a powerful state. The name of Persia is derived from the oriental term Pares, and, originating with the province Pars or Fars, it at length comprehended the whole mighty empire. The province of Persis or Persia Proper is now Fars.] As a province, Persia was but small; and, according to the description of Plotemy, it was bounded on the north by Media, west by Susiana, south by the Persian Gulf, and east by Carmania. The empire of Persia, or the Persian monarchy, was first founded by Cyrus the Great, about 559 years before the Christian era, and under the succeeding monarchs it became one of the most considerable and powerful kingdoms of the earth. The kings of Persia began to reign in the following order: Cyrus, B. C. 559; Cambyses, 529; and after the usurpation of Smerdis for 7 months, Darius 521; Xerxes the Great 485; Artabanus 7 months, and Artaxerxes Longimanus 464; Xerxes II. 425; Sogdianus 7 months, 424; Darius II. or Nothus 423; Artaxerxes II. or Memnon 404; Artaxerxes III. or Ochus 358; Arses or Arogus 337, and Darius III. or Codomanus, 335, who was conquered by Alexander the Great 331. The destruction of the Persian monarchy by the Macedonians was easily effected, and from that time Persia became tributary to the Greeks. After the death of Alexander, when the Macedonian empire was divided among the officers of the deceased conqueror, Seleucus Nicator made himself master of the Persian provinces, till the revolt of the Parthians introduced new revolutions in the east. Persia was partly re-conquered from the Greeks, and remained tributary to the Parthians for near 500 years. After this the sovereignty was again placed into the hands of the Persians by the revolt of Artaxerxes, a common soldier, A. D. 229, who became the founder of the second Persian monarchy, which proved so inimical to the power of the Roman emperors. In their national character the Persians were warlike, they were early taught to ride, and to handle the bow, and by the manly exercises of hunting, they were inured to bear the toils and fatigues of a military life. Their national valour, however, soon degenerated, and their want of employment at home soon rendered them unfit for war. In the reign of Xerxes, when the empire of Persia was in its most flourishing state, a small number of Greeks were enabled repeatedly to repel, for three successive days, an almost innumerable army. This celebrated action, which happened at Thermopylæ, shows in a strong light the superiority of the Grecian soldiers over the Persians; and the battles that before, and a short time after, were fought between the two nations at Marathon, Salamis, Plataea, and Mycale, are again an incontestible proof that these Asiatics had more reliance upon their numbers and upon the splendour and richness of their arms, than upon the valour and discipline of their troops. Their custom, too prevalent among eastern nations, of introducing luxury into the camp, proved also in some measure destructive to their military reputation; and the view which the ancients give us of the army of Xerxes, of his cooks, stage-dancers, concubines, musicians, and perfumers, is no very favourable sign of the sagacity of a monarch, who by his nod could command millions of men to flock to his standard. In their religion the Persians were very superstitious; they paid the greatest veneration to the sun, the moon, and the stars, and they offered sacrifices to fire, but the supreme deity was never represented by statues among them. They permitted polygamy, and it was no incest among them to marry a sister or a mother. In their punishments they were extremely severe, even to barbarity. The monarch always appeared with the greatest pomp and dignity; his person was attended by a guard of 15,000 men, and he had, besides, a body of 10,000 chosen horsemen, called immortal. He styled himself, like the rest of the eastern monarchs, the king of kings, as expressive of his greatness and his power. The Persians were formerly called Cephenes, Achæmenians, and Artæi, and they are often confounded with the Parthians by the ancient poets. They received the name of Persians from Perses the son of Perseus and Andromeda, who is supposed to have settled among them. Persepolis was the capital of the country. Curt. 4, c. 14, l. 5, c. 3.—Plut. in Artax. Alex. &c.—Mela, 1, &c.—Strab. 2, PERSIS, a province of Persia, bounded by Media, Carmania, Susiana, and the Persian gulf. It is often taken for Persia itself. [It is what geographers usually term Persia Proper, and is supposed to have been the original seat of the Persians.]

AULUS PERSIUS FLACCUS, a Latin poet of Volaterræ. He was of an equestrian family, and he made himself known by his intimacy with the most illustrious Romans of the age. The early part of his life was spent in his native town, and at the age of twelve he was removed to Rome, where he studied philosophy under Cornutus, the celebrated stoic. He also received the instructions of Palæmon the grammarian, and Virginius the rhetorician. Naturally of a mild disposition, his character was unimpeached, his modesty remarkable, and his benevolence universally admired. He distinguished himself by his satirical humour, and made the faults of the orators and poets of his age the subjects of his poems. He did not even spare Nero, and the more effectually to expose the emperor to ridicule, he introduced into his satires some of his verses. The torva mimalloneis impleverunt cornua bombis, with the three following verses, are Nero's, according to some. But though he was so severe upon the vicious and ignorant, he did not forget his friendship for Cornutus, and he showed his regard for his character and abilities by making mention of his name with great propriety in his satires. It was by the advice of his learned preceptor that he corrected one of his poems, in which he had compared Nero to Midas, and at his representation he altered the words Auriculas asini Mida rex habet, into Auriculas asini quis non habet? Persius died in the 30th year of his age, A. D. 62, and left all his books, which consisted of seven hundred volumes, and a large sum of money, to his preceptor; but Cornutus only accepted the books, and returned the money to the sisters and friends of the deceased. [Cornutus, careful for the reputation of his pupil, advised the mother of the poet to destroy all the productions of his youth, except the Satires, which were in consequence published by Cæsius Bassus. They appeared originally as a single work and undivided into parts. The grammarians, however, of a later age, separated the Satire into five or six detached portions. The latter division has been adopted also by modern editors. These Satires are preceded by a preface of fourteen verses. The chief defect of Persius is an affected obscurity of style, which is so great and so general that there are few scholars who read these performances for the first time, whose progress is not arrested at almost every line, by some difficulty that presents itself. From the instance afforded in the line quoted above, Auriculas asini, &c. it has been conjectured, and not without some show of reason, that one of the causes of the great obscurity of Persius is the caution with which he constantly conceals his attacks upon Nero. The scholiast moreover expressly states, with regard to several verses of the poet, that they were intended for the emperor. This may be a sufficient apology for Persius, as far as Nero is concerned, but why allow the same obscurity to pervade the rest of his poems? The Satires of Persius would, in fact, be absolutely unintelligible for us, if we had not the labours of an ancient scholiast, or rather a collection of extracts from several scholiasts, to guide us; and even with this aid we are frequently unable to comprehend the meaning of the satirist. The conclusion seems irresistible, that much of this obscurity is owing to the peculiar character of the poet's mind, to his affected conciseness, and to the show of erudition which he is so fond of exhibiting. Some critics, who condemn the negligent style of Horace, give the preference to Persius as a satirist, on account of the greater harmony of his hexameters. Melody of diction, however, cannot compensate for the want of perspicuity; besides, the style of Horace, in his satires, is purposely made to approximate to that of familiar life. It must appear surprising, that Persius is so reserved respecting the gross vices and immorality of the age in which he lived. The best way of accounting for this, is to ascribe it to the retired life led by the youthful poet in the bosom of a virtuous family, and his consequent want of experience in the excesses of the day. The best edition of the Satires of Persius is that of Koenig, Götting. 1803, 8vo. They are most commonly, however, printed together with those of Juvenal.] Martial.—Quintil. 10, c. 1.—August. de Magist. 9.—Lactant.

PERTINAX, Publius Helvius, a Roman emperor after the death of Commodus. He was descended from an obscure family, and, like his father, who was either a slave, or the son of a manumitted slave, he for some time followed the mean employment of drying wood and making charcoal. His indigence, however, did not prevent him from receiving a liberal education, and indeed he was for some time employed in teaching a number of pupils the Greek and the Roman languages in Etruria. He left this laborious profession for a military life, and by his valour and intrepidity he gradually rose to offices of the highest trust in the army, and was made consul by M. Aurelius for his eminent services. He was afterwards intrusted with the government of Mœsia, and at last he presided over the city of Rome as governor. When Commodus was murdered, Pertinax was universally selected to succeed to the imperial throne, and his refusal, and the plea of old age and increasing infirmities, did not prevent his being saluted emperor and Augustus. He acquiesced with reluctance, but his mildness, his economy, and the popularity of his administration, convinced the senate and the people of the prudence and the justice of their choice. He forbad his name to be inscribed on such places or estates as were part of the imperial domain, and exclaimed that they belonged not to him but to the public. He melted all the silver statues which had been raised to his vicious predecessor, and he exposed to public sale all his concubines, his horses, his arms, and all the instruments of his pleasure and extravagance. With the money raised from these he enriched the empire, and was enabled to abolish all the taxes which Commodus had laid on the rivers, ports, and highways, through the empire. This patriotic administration gained him the affection of the worthiest and most discerning of his subjects, but the extravagant and luxurious raised their clamours against him; and when Pertinax attempted to introduce among the pretorian guards that discipline which was so necessary to preserve the peace and tranquillity of Rome, the flames of rebellion were kindled, and the minds of the soldiers totally alienated. Pertinax was apprised of this mutiny, but he refused to fly at the hour of danger. He scorned the advice of his friends who wished him to withdraw from the impending storm, and he unexpectedly appeared before the seditious pretorians, and without fear or concern, boldly asked them whether they, who were bound to defend the person of their prince and emperor, were come to betray him and to shed his blood. His undaunted assurance and his intrepidity would have had the desired effect, and the soldiers had already begun to retire, when one of the most seditious advanced and darted his javelin at the emperor's breast, exclaiming, the soldiers send you this. The rest immediately followed the example, and Pertinax, muffling up his head and calling upon Jupiter to avenge his death, remained unmoved, and was instantly dispatched. His head was cut off and carried upon the point of a spear as in triumph to the camp. This happened on the 28th of March, A. D. 193. Pertinax reigned only 87 days, and his death was the more universally lamented as it proceeded from a seditious tumult, and robbed the Roman empire of a wise, virtuous, and benevolent emperor. Dio.—Herodian.—Capitol.

The era of its foundation long preceded that of Rome, though the precise period cannot be ascertained with certainty. In conjunction with the other Etrurian states it long resisted the Roman arms, but when reduced became a powerful and wealthy ally. It defied the power of Annibal, and flourished in peace and opulence until the reign of Augustus, when it unfortunately engaged in the rebellion of L. Antonius, uncle of the triumvir. It was taken by Augustus, and reduced to ashes in consequence of one of the principal citizens communicating fire to his own house, which he designed as a funeral-pile for himself and family: the fire spread to the adjacent buildings, and the whole city was destroyed. Perusia was afterwards rebuilt, and became again flourishing and opulent. In the Gothic war, it stood a siege of seven years against the barbarians. PETRŌNIUS, a governor of Egypt, appointed to succeed Gallus. He behaved with great humanity to the Jews, and made war against Candace, queen of Ethiopia. Strab. 17.—Maximus, a Roman emperor. vid. Maximus.—Arbiter, a favourite of the emperor Nero, and one of the ministers and associates of all his pleasures and his debauchery. He was naturally fond of pleasure and effeminate, and he passed his whole nights in revels, and his days in sleep. He indulged himself in all the delights and gaieties of life, but though he was the most voluptuous of the age, yet he moderated his pleasures, and wished to appear curious and refined in luxury and extravagance. Whatever he did seemed to be performed with an air of unconcern and negligence, he was affable in his behaviour, and his witticisms and satirical remarks appeared artless and natural. He was appointed proconsul of Bithynia, and afterwards he was rewarded with the consulship; in both of which honourable employments he behaved with all the dignity which became one of the successors of a Brutus or a Scipio. With his office he laid down his artificial gravity, and gave himself up to the pursuit of pleasure, the emperor became more attached to him, and seemed fonder of his company, but he did not long enjoy the imperial favours. Tigellinus, likewise one of Nero's favourites, jealous of his fame, accused him of conspiring against the emperor's life. The accusation was credited, and Petronius immediately resolved to withdraw himself from Nero's punishment by a voluntary death. This was performed in a manner altogether unprecedented, A. D. 66. Petronius ordered his veins to be opened, but without the eagerness of terminating his agonies he had them closed at intervals. Some time after they were opened, and, as if he wished to die in the same careless and unconcerned manner as he had lived, he passed his time in discoursing with his friends upon trifles, and listened with the greatest avidity to love verses, amusing stories, or laughable epigrams. Sometimes he manumitted his slaves or punished them with stripes. In this ludicrous manner he spent his last moments, till nature was exhausted, and before he expired he wrote an epistle to the emperor, in which he described with a masterly hand his nocturnal extravagances, and the daily impurities of his actions. This letter was carefully sealed, and after he had conveyed it privately to the emperor, Petronius broke his signet, that it might not after his death become a snare to the innocent. Petronius distinguished himself by his writings as well as by his luxury and voluptuousness. He is the author of many elegant but obscene compositions still extant, among which is a poem on the civil wars of Pompey and Cæsar, superior in some respects to the Pharsalia of Lucan. There is also the feast of Trimalcion, in which he paints with too much licentiousness the pleasures and the debaucheries of a corrupted court and of an extravagant monarch—reflections on the instability of human life—a poem on the vanity of dreams—another on the education of the Roman youth—two treatises, &c. The best editions of Petronius are those of Burman, 4to. Utr. 1709, and Reinesius, 8vo. 1731.

PHÆA, a celebrated sow which infested the neighbourhood of Cromyon. It was destroyed by Theseus as he was travelling from Trœzene to Athens to make himself known to his father. Some supposed that the boar of Calydon sprang from this sow. Phæa, according to some authors, was no other than a woman who prostituted herself to strangers, whom she murdered and afterwards plundered. Plut. in Thes.—Strab. 8.

PHÆACIA, an island of the Ionian Sea, near the coast of Epirus, anciently called Scheria, and afterwards Corcyra. [*vid. PHÆDON, an Athenian put to death by the 30 tyrants. His daughters, to escape the oppressors and preserve their chastity, threw themselves together into a well.—A disciple of Socrates. He had been seized by pirates in his younger days, and the philosopher, who seemed to discover something uncommon and promising in his countenance, bought his liberty for a sum of money, and ever after esteemed him. Phædon, after the death of Socrates, returned to Elis, where he founded a sect of philosophers called Eliac. The name of Phædon is affixed to one of the dialogues of Plato. [*vid. PHÆDRA, a daughter of Minos and Pasiphaë, who married Theseus, by whom she became mother of Acamas and Demophoon. They had already lived for some time in conjugal felicity, when Venus, who hated all the descendants of Apollo, because that god had discovered her amours with Mars, inspired Phædra with an unconquerable passion for Hippolytus, the son of Theseus by the amazon Hippolyte. This shameful passion Phædra long attempted to stifle, but in vain; and therefore, in the absence of Theseus, she addressed Hippolytus with all the impatience of a desponding lover. Hippolytus rejected her with horror and disdain; but Phædra, incensed on account of the reception she had met, resolved to punish his coldness and refusal. At the return of Theseus she accused Hippolytus of attempts upon her virtue. The credulous father listened to the accusation, and without hearing the defence of Hippolytus, he banished him from his kingdom, and implored Neptune, who had promised to grant three of his requests, to punish him in some exemplary manner. As Hippolytus fled from Athens, his horses were suddenly terrified by a huge sea-monster which Neptune had sent on the shore. He was dragged through precipices and over rocks, and he was trampled under the feet of his horses, and crushed under the wheels of his chariot. When the tragical end of Hippolytus was known at Athens, Phædra confessed her crime, and hung herself in despair, unable to survive one whose death her wickedness and guilt had occasioned. The death of Hippolytus, and the infamous passion of Phædra, are the subject of one of the tragedies of Euripides and of Seneca. Phædra was buried at Træzene, where her tomb was still seen in the age of the geographer Pausanias, near the temple of Venus, which she had built to render the goddess favourable to her incestuous passion. There was near her tomb a myrtle, whose leaves were all full of small holes, and it was reported, that Phædra had done this with a hair pin, when the vehemence of her passion had rendered her melancholy and almost desperate. She was represented in a painting in Apollo's temple at Delphi as suspended by a cord, and balancing herself in the air, while her sister Ariadne stood near to her, and fixed her eyes upon her : a delicate idea, by which the genius of the artist intimated her melancholy end. *Plut. in Thes.—Paus. 1, c. 22. l. 2, c. 32.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 47 and 243.—Eurip. in Senec. & in Hippol.—Virg. PHÆDRUS, one of the disciples of Socrates. Cic. de Nat. D. 1.—An Epicurean philosopher.—A Thracian who became one of the freedmen of the emperor Augustus. He translated into iambic verses, the fables of Æsop, in the reign of the emperor Tiberius. They are divided into five books, valuable for their precision, purity, elegance, and simplicity. [The matter of these fables is generally borrowed from Æsop, but Phædrus occasionally intermixes stories or historical pieces of his own. This work appears to have been little known in his own time, for no extant writer of antiquity alludes to it. This circumstance, together with the assertion of Seneca, "that the Romans had not attempted fables or Æsopian compositions," might throw suspicion on the genuineness of the work, did not its style and manner refer it to the best age of Roman literature.] They remained long buried in oblivion, till they were discovered in the library of St. Remi at Rheims, and published by Peter Pithou, a Frenchman, at the end of the 16th century. [Two manuscripts of Phædrus are said to exist, both of which are not only imperfect, but, being transcribed from the same copy very carelessly, are full of errors ; hence, few ancient works have given more trouble and room for critical conjecture.] Phædrus was for some time persecuted by Sejanus, because this corrupt minister believed that he was satirized and abused in the encomiums which the poet every where pays to virtue. The best editions of Phædrus are those of Burman, 4to. Leyd.

PHÆTON, a son of the sun, or Phœbus, and Clymene, one of the Oceanides. [vid. remarks below.] He was son of Cephalus and Aurora, according to Hesiod and Pausanias, or of Tithonus and Aurora, according to Apollodorus. He is, however, more generally acknowledged to be the son of Phœbus and Clymene. Phæton was naturally of a lively disposition, and a handsome figure. Venus became enamoured of him, and intrusted him with the care of one of her temples. This distinguished favour of the goddess rendered him vain and aspiring ; and when Epaphus, the son of Io, had told him, to check his pride, that he was not the son of Phœbus, Phæton resolved to know his true origin, and, at the instigation of his mother, he visited the palace of the sun. He begged Phœbus, that if he really were his father, he would give him incontestible proofs of his paternal tenderness, and convince the world of his legitimacy. Phœbus swore by the Styx, that he would grant him whatever he required, and no sooner was the oath uttered, than Phæton demanded of him to drive his chariot for one day. Phœbus represented the impropriety of such a request and the dangers to which it would expose him, but in vain ; and, as the oath was inviolable, and Phæton unmoved, the father instructed his son how he was to proceed in his way through the regions of the air. His explicit directions were forgotten or little attended to ; and no sooner had Phæton received the reins from his father, than he betrayed his ignorance and incapacity to guide the chariot. The flying horses became sensible of the confusion of their driver, and immediately departed from the usual track. Phæton repented too late of his rashness, and already heaven and earth were threatened with an universal conflagration, when Jupiter, who had perceived the disorder of the horses of the sun, struck the rider with one of his thunderbolts, and hurled him headlong from heaven into the river Po. His body, consumed with fire, was found by the nymphs of the place, and honoured with a decent burial. His sisters mourned his unhappy end, and were changed into poplars by Jupiter. (vid. Phaetontides.) According to the poets, while Phaëton was unskillfully driving the chariot of his father, the blood of the Æthiopians was dried up, and their skins became black, a colour which is still preserved among the greatest part of the inhabitants of the torrid zone. The territories of Libya were also parched up, according to the same tradition, on account of their too great vicinity to the sun; and ever since, Africa, unable to recover her original verdure and fruitfulness, has exhibited a sandy country, and uncultivated waste. According to those who explain this poetical fable, Phaëton was a Ligurian prince, who studied astronomy, and in whose age the neighbourhood of the Po was visited with uncommon heats. The horses of the sun are called Phaetontis equi, either because they were guided by Phaëton, or from the Greek word (φαιτων), which expresses the splendour and lustre of that luminary. [The fable of Phaëton evidently alludes to some extraordinary heats which prevailed in a very remote period, and of which only a confused tradition descended to later times. Aristotle states, upon the authority of some of the ancient writers, that in the time of Phaëton, there fell from heaven flames that consumed several countries; and Eusebius places this deluge of fire in the same age with that of Deucalion. The name Phaëton itself, seems in some degree to confirm this assertion, since it, or rather what closely resembles it, φαειτων, is frequently applied by the ancient poets as an epithet of the sun, in the sense of bright, shining. The most curious circumstance connected with the story of Phaëton, is the fact that the name Eridanus, of the river into which he is said to have fallen, belongs properly to the Rodanus, a small stream in the north of Europe, running near Dantzic. (vid. Eridanus.) The poets fabled that the tears shed by Phaëton's sisters were converted into amber; and, what is very remarkable, there was no amber ever found in the vicinity of the Po; whereas the Phœnicians drew their main supply from the shores of the Baltic, and from the immediate vicinity of the true Eridanus itself. Was the scene then of the catastrophe of Phaëton laid in so northern a latitude? There is nothing at all absurd in this supposition, since an extraordinary heat might have prevailed for a certain time as well in a northern as in any other latitude. But the difficulty seems to be, to find physical proofs of such a phenomenon having once taken place. Perhaps an argument in favour of a very elevated temperature having once prevailed in the environs of the Baltic, may be drawn from the great quantities of amber that are found there. The best naturalists regard this fossil as a juice which once flowed from a tree, and which, buried in the earth by some natural convulsion, would be impregnated with mineral vapours, and acquire a certain degree of consistency. As, however, the copal, the only kind of known gum which resembles amber, is brought to us from Africa and the East Indies, it would appear, that the forests in which amber was produced, could not have existed in the vicinity of the Baltic, unless the temperature of the atmosphere in that quarter had been very elevated. Whether the fable of Phaëton has reference to a sudden and vast accession of heat to this already elevated state of the climate, or be merely a creation of the poet's fancy, is all conjecture; although it is rather remarkable that Ovid, in describing the effects of Phaëton's rash act, speaks of the heat being sensibly felt even by the northern regions of the earth:

Et vetito frustra tentarunt equore tingi.*

*Quæque polo posita est glaciale proxima
serpens,*

*Frigure pigra prius, nec formidabilis ulli;
Incaluit: sumpsitque novas fervoribus iras.*

This, however, may be, after all, mere poetic embellishment. It is difficult to say whether a circumstance mentioned by Herodotus may not have some connection with the present subject of enquiry. The historian states (2, c. 142,) that the priests of Egypt informed him that the sun had four times altered his regular course, having been twice observed to rise where he now sets, and to go down twice where he now rises. Marsham, in his Chronicon. Canon. Ægyptiac. p. 252, attributes this to the defect of the solar year. Larcher thinks it one of the extravagant inventions of the priests, in order to show the antiquity of their nation. Horne, in his "Introduction to the critical study of the Scriptures," refers it to the narrative in Joshua, ch. 10, 12, and to the fact related of Hezekiah, in Isaiah, ch. 38. To the same effect is the learned dissertation of Goguet, (Origin of Laws, vol. 3. Diss. 4.) It should also be stated that Herodotus is not the only ancient writer in whose pages we find an allusion to this remarkable event. Plato informs us (Polit. part. 2, vol. 2, p. 272, ed. Bekker.) that in the time of Atreus, the motion of the firmament had changed in such a manner that the sun and all the stars had begun to rise where formerly they had set, and to set where they had been accustomed to rise; in a word, the machine of the world was moved in a way contrary to that in which it had been before. It is evident from the several parts of his relation that he speaks of a confused and perplexed, and consequently, a very ancient tradition. In his Timæus, however, he makes the Athenians to have first learned it from Solon; which would seem to favour the idea that the latter had, like Herodotus, received it from the priests of Egypt. Pomponius Mela, (1, c. 9.) speaks of the same tradition, as also Plutarch (De Placit. Phil. Lib. 2, c. 24.—Achilles Tatius, (De Arat. Phœnom. c. 24.—Solinus (c. 32.) and many other writers. Astronomers, however, insist that the idea of such an interruption of the regular motion of the earth as this phenomenon would have required, is not for a moment to be entertained; and that if it had taken place it would have left physical traces behind: besides, the figure of the earth shows, they maintain, that its revolutions have been uniform since the flood. We leave the present subject with them and the ancients.] Virg. Æn. 5, v. 105.—Hesiod. Theog. 985.—*Ovid. Perillus made him a brazen bull, and when he had presented it to Phalaris, the tyrant ordered the inventor to be seized, and the first experiment to be made on his body. These cruelties did not long remain unrevenged; the people of Agrigentum revolted in the tenth year of his reign, and put him to death in the same manner as he had tortured Perillus and many of his subjects after him, B. C. 552. The brazen bull of Phalaris was carried by Amilcar to Carthage; when that city was taken by Scipio, it was delivered again to the inhabitants of Agrigentum by the Romans. There are now some letters extant written by a certain Abaris to Phalaris, with their respective answers, but they are supposed by some to be spurious. [Boyle published an edition of these letters at the Oxford press in 1718. It gave rise to the celebrated discussion between him and Bentley, in which the latter obtained so brilliant a triumph over his unequally-matched antagonist, and proved conclusively the spuriousness of the epistles of Phalaris.] Cic. in Verr. 4, ad Allie. 7, ep. 12, de offic. 2.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 1, v. 663.—Juv. 3, v. 81.—Plin. 34, c. 8.—Diod.

["Phalerum," says Hobhouse, "is of an elliptical form, smaller than Munychia; and the remains of the piers on each side of the narrow mouth are still to be seen. The line of its length is from east to west, that of its breadth from north to south. On the north-east side of the port the land is high and rocky until you come to the fine sweep of the bay of Phalerum, perhaps two miles in length, and terminated on the north-east by a low promontory, once that of Colias. The clay from this neighbourhood was preferred to any other for the use of the potteries."—A place of Thessaly.

PHALLĪCA, festivals observed by the Egyptians in honour of Osiris. They receive their name from φαλλος, simulachrum ligneum membri virilis. The institution originated in this: after the murder of Osiris, Isis was unable to recover among the other limbs the privities of her husband; and therefore, as she paid particular honour to every part of his body, she distinguished that which was lost with more honour, and paid it more attention. Its representation, called phallus, was made with wood, and carried during the sacred festivals which were instituted in honour of Osiris. The people held it in the greatest veneration, it was looked upon as an emblem of fecundity, and the mention of it among the ancients never conveyed any impure thought or lascivious reflection. The festivals of the phallus were imitated by the Greeks, and introduced into Europe by the Athenians, who made the procession of the phallus part of the celebration of the Dionysia of the god of wine. Those that carried the phallus at the end of a long pole were called phallophori. They generally appeared, among the Greeks, besmeared with the dregs of wine, covered with skins of lambs, and wearing on their heads a crown of ivy. Lucian. de Deâ Syr.—Plut. de Isid. & Osir.—Paus. 1, c. 2.

PHAON, a boatman of Mitylene in Lesbos. He received a small box of ointment from Venus, who had presented herself to him in the form of an old woman, to be carried over into Asia, and as soon as he had rubbed himself with what the box contained, he became one of the most beautiful men of his age. Many were captivated with the charms of Phaon, and among others, Sappho, the celebrated poetess. Phaon gave himself up to the pleasures of Sappho's company, but, however, he soon conceived a disdain for her, and Sappho, mortified at his coldness, threw herself into the sea. [vid. Leucadia.] Some say that Phaon was beloved by the goddess of beauty, who concealed him for some time among lettuces. Ælian says, that Phaon was killed by a man whose bed he was defiling. *Ælian. PHARNACES, a son of Mithridates, king of Pontus, who favoured the Romans against his father. He revolted against Mithridates, and even caused him to be put to death, according to some accounts. In the civil wars of Julius Cæsar and Pompey, he interested himself for neither of the contending parties, upon which Cæsar turned his army against him, and conquered him. It was to express the celerity of his operations in conquering Pharnaces, that the victorious Roman made use of these words, Veni, vidi, vici. Flor. 3.—Suet. in Cæs. 37.—Paterec. 2, c. 55.—A king of Pontus who made war with Eumenes, B. PHAROS, a small island in the bay of Alexandria, about seven furlongs distant from the continent. It was joined to the Egyptian shore with a causeway, by Dexiphanes, B. C. 284, and upon it was built a celebrated tower, in the reign of Ptolemy Soter, and Philadelphus, by Sostratus, the son of Dexiphanes. This tower, which was called the tower of Pharos, and which passed for one of the seven wonders of the world, was built with white marble, and could be seen at the distance of 100 miles.

[It had several stories raised one above another, adorned with columns, balustrades, and galleries of the finest marble and workmanship. The architect had contrived to fasten some mirrors so artificially against the upper galleries that one could see in them all the ships that sailed in the sea for a great distance.] On the top, fires were constantly kept to direct sailors in the bay, which was dangerous and difficult of access. The building of this tower cost the Egyptian monarch 800 talents, which are equivalent to above 165,000*l.* English, if Attic, or if Alexandrian, double that sum. There was this inscription upon it, King Ptolemy to the Gods the saviours, for the benefit of sailors; but Sostratus the architect, wishing to claim all the glory, engraved his own name upon the stones, and afterwards filled the hollow with mortar, and wrote the above-mentioned inscription. When the mortar had decayed by time, Ptolemy's name disappeared, and the following inscription then became visible: Sostratus the Cnidian, son of Dexiphanes, to the Gods the saviours, for the benefit of sailors. The word Pharius is often used as Egyptian. [Instead of the noble structure here described, there is now only a kind of irregular castle without ditches or outworks of any strength, the whole being accommodated to the inequality of the ground on which it stands. Out of the midst of this clumsy building rises a tower which serves for a light-house, but which has nothing of the beauty and grandeur of the old one.] Lucan. 2, v. 636, l. 3, v. 260, l. 6, v. 308, l. 9, v. 1005, &c.—*Ovid. PHARSALUS, now Farsa, a town of Thessaly, [south-west of Larissa, on the river Enipeus, which falls into the Apidanus, one of the tributaries of the Peneus.] In its neighbourhood is a large plain called Pharsalia, famous for a battle which was fought there between Julius Cæsar and Pompey, in which the former obtained the victory. In that battle, which was fought on the 12th of May, B. C. 48, Cæsar lost about 200 men, or, according to others, 1200. Pompey's loss was

15,000, or 25,000, according to others, and 24,000 of his army were made prisoners of war by the conqueror. Lucan. 1, &c.—Plut. in Pomp. & Cæs.—Appian. Civ. Cæsar. Civ.—Sueton. in Cæs.—*Diod. PHASIS, a river of Colchis, rising in the mountains of Armenia, now called Phaos, and falling into the east of the Euxine. It is famous for the expedition of the Argonauts, who entered it after a long and perilous voyage, from which reason all dangerous voyages have been proverbially intimated by the words of sailing to the Phocis. There were on the banks of the Phasis a great number of large birds, of which, according to some of the ancients, the Argonauts brought some to Greece, and which were called on that account pheasants. The Phasis was reckoned by the ancients one of the largest rivers of Asia.—[A river of Armenia Major, the same with the Araxes.] *vid. Araxes. PHAVORINUS, [a native of Italy, born near Camerino. His true name was Guarino de Favera, which he changed for Varinus Phavorinus. He studied under Politian and Lascaris. Lorenzo de Medici made him preceptor to his son John, afterwards Pope Leo 10th, and gave him the charge of his library. He afterwards entered into a monastery, and employed the leisure of a retired life in the composition of various works. He was finally made Bishop of Nocera in 1514, and retained this see until his death, which happened in 1537. His principal work is a Greek Lexicon, compiled from Hesychius, Suidas, Phrynichus, Harpocration, Eustathius, the Etymologicon Magnum, the lexicon of Philemon, which he has copied nearly entire, and various works of grammarians and scholiasts. This was certainly a useful work at the period when it was first published; but at the present day its only merit consists in the various readings and the corrections which it affords of the authors cited in it, and in the extracts which it contains from unedited grammarians. The best edition is that of Bortoli, Venet. 1712. fol. The previous Venice edition of 1538 is also valuable.]

[PHAZANIA, a region of Africa, lying to the south of Tripolis. It is now Fezzan.]

PHEGËUS, or PHLEGEUS, a priest of Bacchus, the father of Alphisibæa, who purified Alcæon of his mother's murder, and gave him his daughter in marriage. He was afterwards put to death by the children of Alcæon by Callirhoe, because he had ordered Alcæon to be killed when he had attempted to recover a collar which he had given to his daughter. [vid. Alcæon.] Ovid. Met. 9, v. 412.

PHEMIUS, a man introduced by Homer as a musician among Penelope's suitors. Some say that he taught Homer, for which the grateful poet immortalized his name. Homer. Od. The word is applied by Ovid, Am. 3, v. 7, indiscriminately to any person who excels in music.

PHENËUS, [a city in the northern part of Arcadia, at the foot of Mount Cyllene. Near it was a lake of the same name. Mr. Gell, in his Itinerary of Greece, corrects an error in D'Anville's map of that country. The latter represents the Aroanus as flowing from the lake of Peneos, whereas, according to Gell, the Ladon receives the waters of the lakes of Orchomenus and Peneos, and the Aroanus rises at a spot not two hours-ride distant from Psophis. The waters of the lake were said to be unwholesome in the night, and wholesome in the day-time. In the city there was, among other temples, one of Ceres, and the mysteries of the goddess were celebrated here with great solemnity, and in the same manner as at Eleusis. Cic. de Nat. D. 3, c. 22.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 165.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 332.

PHERËUS, a surname of Jason, as being a native of Pheræ.

PHERËCRATES, a comic poet of Athens in the age of Plato and Aristophanes. He is supposed to have written 21 comedies, of which only a few verses remain. He introduced living characters on the stage, but never abused the liberty which he had taken, either by satire or defamation. He invented a sort of verse, which from him has been called Pheræcratic. [The Pheræcratic verse is rather the Glyconic, deprived of the final syllable, and consists of a spondee, a choriambus, and a catalectic syllable. The first foot was sometimes a trochee or an anapæst, rarely an iambus. When this species of verse has a spondee in the first station, it may then be scanned as a dactylic trimeter.]

PHERECYDES, [a Grecian philosopher, contemporary with Terpander and Thales, who flourished about 600 B. C. and was a native of the island of Scyros. Some writers suppose that he derived his ideas of philosophy from the sacred books of the Phœnicians, but others, who have carefully examined into the matter, think that he had them from the Grecian philosophers. Josephus advances the opinion that he studied in Egypt, which is not improbable, since that country in his time was universally regarded as the seat of learning. It was pretended that he had the power of predicting future events, that he foretold the destruction of a vessel at sea, and the approach of an earthquake, and that the event in both cases justified the prophecy. He probably had, by a careful observation of those phenomena which usually precede storms and earthquakes, acquired great skill in foretelling their approach. He is said to have been the first of the Grecians who wrote concerning the nature of the gods in prose, since before his time the same subject had been treated of in verse by Orpheus, Musæus, and others.] He was acquainted with the periods of the moon, and foretold eclipses with the greatest accuracy. The doctrine of the immortality of the soul was first supported by him, as also that of the metempsychosis. [According to Cicero, he was the first philosopher in whose writings the doctrine of the immortality of the soul was advanced and inculcated.] Pythagoras was one of his disciples, remarkable for his esteem and his attachment to his learned master. When Pherecydes lay dangerously ill in the island of Delos, Pythagoras hastened to give him every assistance in his power, and when all his efforts had proved ineffectual, he buried him, and after he had paid him the last offices, he retired to Italy. Some, however, suppose that Pherecydes threw himself down from a precipice as he was going to Delphi, or, according to others, he fell a sacrifice to the lousy disease, B. C. 515, in the 85th year of his age. Diog.—Lactant.—An historian of Leros, surnamed the Athenian. He wrote an history of Attica, now lost, in the age of Darius Hystaspes.—A tragic poet.

PHEREPHATTE, a surname of Proserpine, from the production of corn. [Riener, in his Greek-German Lexicon, pronounces this appellation to be one, not of Greek but of foreign origin, and, consequently condemns all the fanciful derivations which have deduced for it through the former language.]

PHERES, a son of Cretheus and Tyro, who built Phere in Thessaly, where he reigned. He married Clymene, by whom he had Admetus and Lycurgus. Apollod.—A son of Medea, stoned to death by the Corinthians on account of the poisonous clothes which he had given to Glauce, Creon's daughter. [vid. Medea.] Paus. 2, c. 3.

PHERETIMA, the wife of Battus, king of Cyrene, and mother of Arcesilaus. After her son's death, she recovered the kingdom by means of Amasis, king of Egypt, and to avenge the murder of Arcesilaus, she caused all his assassins to be crucified round the walls of Cyrene, and she cut off the breasts of their wives, and hung them up near the bodies of their husbands. It is said that she was devoured alive by worms, a punishment which, according to some of the ancients, was inflicted by Providence for her unparalleled cruelties. Polyæn. 9.—Herodot. 4, c. 204, &c.

PHERON, a king of Egypt, who succeeded Sesostris. He was blind, and he recovered his sight by washing his eyes, according to the directions of the oracle, in the urine of a woman who had never had any unlawful connections. He tried his wife first, but she appeared to have been faithless to his bed, and she was burnt with all those whose urine could not restore sight to the king. He married the woman whose urine proved beneficial. [Pheron lost his sight as a punishment for having hurled a javelin into the Nile, when that river, being at its extreme height of 18 cubits, was made impetuously to swell by a sudden wind. All the offending females above spoken of were collected by the king in a city called Erythreobolos, and destroyed with it by fire. The female, through whose means he was cured of blindness, was the wife of a gardener. This anecdote proves conclusively the great corruption of morals in Egypt, and Larcher judiciously refers to the precautions taken by Abraham in entering this country. (Gen. xñ. 11.)] Herodot. 2, c. 111.

PHIDIAS, a celebrated statuary of Athens, who died B. C. 432. He made a statue of Minerva at the request of Pericles, which was placed in the Parthenon. It was made with ivory and gold, and measured 39 feet in height. [On the convexity of the goddess's shield was represented the battle of the Amazons, and on its concave surface the battle of the gods with the giants; whilst her slippers were adorned with the fight of the Centaurs and Lapithæ. On her breast-plate was a Medusa's head. The base contained the birth of Pandora, with twenty figures of the gods. Phidias was accused of having embezzled a part of the gold employed in adorning this statue, but the artist having originally, by the advice of Pericles, put the gold on with so much skill that it could easily be taken off and weighed, was enabled thus to give a triumphant refutation to the charge. The excellence of the work, however, and the envy thence arising, was the cause of his overthrow.] His great talents raised him many enemies, and he was accused of having carved his own image and that of Pericles on the shield of the statue of the goddess, for which he was banished from Athens by the clamorous populace. He retired to Elis, where he determined to revenge the ill treatment he had received from his countrymen, by making a statue which should eclipse the fame of that of Minerva. He was successful in the attempt; and the statue he made of Jupiter Olympius was always reckoned the best of all his pieces, and has passed for one of the wonders of the world. The people of Elis were so sensible of his merit, and of the honour he had done to their city, that they appointed his descendants to the honourable office of keeping clean that magnificent statue, and of preserving it from injury. Paus. 9, c. 4.—Cic. de Orat.—Strab. 8.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Plut. in Per.

PHIDIPPIDES, a celebrated courier who ran from Athens to Lacedæmon, about 152 English miles, in two days, to ask of the Lacedæmonians assistance against the Persians. The Athenians raised a temple to his memory. Herodot. 6, c. 105.—C. Nep. in Mill.

PHIDITIA, a public entertainment at Sparta, where much frugality was observed, as the word (φειδῖτια from φειδομαι, parco,) denotes. Persons of all ages were admitted; the younger frequented it as a school of temperance and sobriety, where they were trained to good manners and useful knowledge by the example and discourse of the elders. Cic. Tus. 5, c. 34.—Paus. 3, c. 10.

PHIDON, a man who enjoyed the sovereign power at Argos, and is supposed to have invented scales and measures, and coined silver at Ægina. He died B. C. 854. Arist.—Herodot. 6, c. 127.

PHILA, the eldest daughter of Antipater, who married Craterus. She afterwards married Demetrius, and when her husband had lost the kingdom of Macedonia, she poisoned herself. Plut.

PHILADELPHIA, [a city of Lydia, south-east of Sardis. It was the seat of one of the seven churches mentioned in the Book of Revelations. Philadelphia, together with Sardis, and ten more of the principal cities of Asia, was overwhelmed by an earthquake in the reign of the emperor Tiberius, A. D. 17. This city is now Alah-Shehr. It received its ancient name from Attalus Philadelphus, brother of Eumenes.—Another in Cilicia Trachea, on the river Calycadnus.—A capital of the Ammonites, situate amid the mountains of Gilead, near the sources of the Jabook or Jobaccus. Its oriental name was Rabbath Ammon.] Plin. 5, c. 29.

PHILADELPHUS, a king of Paphlagonia, who followed the interest of M. Antony.—The surname of one of the Ptolemies, king of Egypt, by Antiphrasis because he destroyed all his brothers. vid. Ptolemæus 2d.

PHILE, a town and island of Egypt above the smaller cataract, but placed opposite Syene by Plin. 5, c. 9. Isis was worshipped there. Lucan. 10, v. 313.—Seneca. 2, Nat. 4, c. 2.—One of the Sporades. Plin. 4, c. 12.

PHILENI, two brothers of Carthage. When a contest arose between the Cyreneans and Carthaginians about the extent of their territories, it was mutually agreed that, at a stated hour, two men should depart from each city, and, that wherever they met, there they should fix the boundaries of their country. The Philæni accordingly departed from Carthage, and met the Cyreneans, when they had advanced far into their terriories. This produced a quarrel, and the Cyreneans supported that the Philæni had left Carthage before the appointment, and that therefore they must retire, or be buried in the sand. The Philæni refused, upon which they were overpowered by the Cyreneans, and accordingly buried in the sand. The Carthaginians, to commemorate the patriotic deeds of the Philæni, who had sacrificed their lives that the extent of their country might not be diminished, raised two altars on the place where their bodies had been buried, which were called Philænorum ara by the Romans. These altars were the boundaries of the Carthaginian dominions, which on the other side extended as far as the columns of Hercules, which is about 2000 miles, or, according to the accurate observations of the moderns, only 1420 geographical miles. Sallust. de bell. Jug. 19 and 79.—Sil. It. 15, v. 704.

PHILAMMON, [the son of Chrythemis of Crete. He was distinguished for his musical powers, and was the second person who obtained a prize at the Pythian games. His father was the first who carried off the prize at them, and his son Thamyras, the third.]

PHILEMON, a Greek comic poet, contemporary with Menander. He obtained some poetical prizes over Menander, not so much by the merit of his composition as by the intrigues of his friends. Plautus imitated some of his comedies. [The Mercator of Plautus is professedly taken from the Εμμοχος of Philemon.] He lived to his 97th year, and died, as it is reported, of laughing on seeing an ass eat figs, B. C. 274. [The fragments of Philemon are usually printed together with those of Menander. The best of these conjointly is that of Meineke, Berol. 1823.] His son, who bore the same name, wrote 54 comedies, of which some few fragments remain, which do not seem to entitle him to great rank among the Greek comic writers. Val. Max. 9, c. 12.—Quintil. 10.—Plut. de ira coh.—Strab. 14.—A poor man of Phrygia. [vid. Baucis.]—An illegitimate son of Priam.

PHILENE, a town of Attica between Athens and Tanagra. Sat. Theb. 4, v. 102.

PHILETÆRUS, an eunuch made governor of Pergamus by Lysimachus. He quarrelled with Lysimachus, and made himself master of Pergamus, where he laid the foundations of a kingdom called the kingdom of Pergamus, B. C. 283. He reigned there for 20 years, and at his death he appointed his nephew Eumenes as his successor. Strab. 13.—Paus. 1, c. 8.

PHILETAS, a grammarian and poet of Cos, in the reign of king Philip, and of his son Alexander the Great. He was made preceptor to Ptolemy Philadelphus. The elegies and epigrams which he wrote have been greatly commended by the ancients, and some fragments of them are still preserved in Athenæus. He was so small and slender, according to the improbable account of Ælian, that he always carried pieces of lead in his pockets to prevent him from being blown away by the wind. Ælian. V. H. 9, c. 14.—Ovid. Fast. 1, el. 5.—Propert. 3, el. 1.

PHILETIUS, a faithful steward of Ulysses, who with Eumæus assisted him in destroying the suitors who had not only insulted the queen, but wasted the property of the absent monarch. Homer. Od. 20, &c.

PHILINUS, a native of Agrigentum, who fought with Annibal against the Romans. He wrote a partial history of the Punic wars. C. Nep. in Annib.—Polyb.

PHILIPPEI, or PHILIPPI, certain pieces of money coined in the reign of Philip of Macedonia, and with his image. Horat. 2, ep. 1, v. 284.—Liv. 34, c. 52, l. 37, c. 59, l. 39, c. 5 and 7.

PHILIPPI, a town of Macedonia, [famous for the conflicts which took place near it between the republican forces under Brutus and Cassius and those of Antony and Augustus. vid. Brutus. This city lay east of Amphipolis. vid. Dato.] Ovid. Met. 15, v. 284.—Plin. 7, c. 45.—Flor. 4, c. 7.—Patenc. 2, c. 7, &c.—Appian. 2, Cic. bell.—Plut. in Anton.—Virg. G. 1, v. 490.—Suet. Aug. 3.

PHILIPPIDES, a comic poet in Alexander's age.

PHILIPPÖPÖLIS, [a city of Thrace, on the Hebrus, founded by Philip the father of Alexander. From its situation among hills, it acquired the Latin appellation of Trimontium. It still, however, preserves traces of its more ancient name in Philippopoli, or Philiba as the Turks abbreviate it.] Liv. 39, c. 53.

PHILIPPUS 1st, son of Argeus, succeeded his father on the throne of Macedonia, and reigned 38 years, B. C. 40.—The second of that name was the fourth son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia. He was sent to Thebes as an hostage by his father, where he learnt the art of war under Epaminondas, and studied with the greatest care the manners and the pursuits of the Greeks. He was recalled to Macedonia, and at the death of his brother Perdicas, he ascended the throne as guardian and protector of the youthful years of his nephew. His ambition, however, soon discovered itself, and he made himself independent. The valour of a prudent general, and the policy of an experienced statesman, seemed requisite to ensure his power. The neighbouring nations, ridiculing the youth and inexperience of the new king of Macedonia, appeared in arms, but Philip soon convinced them of their error. Unable to meet them as yet in the field of battle, he suspended their fury by presents, and soon turned his arms against Amphipolis, a colony tributary to the Athenians. Amphipolis was conquered, and added to the kingdom of Macedonia, and Philip meditated no less than the destruction of a republic which had rendered itself so formidable to the rest of Greece, and had even claimed submission from the princes of Macedonia. His designs, however, were as yet immature, and before he could make Athens an object of conquest, the Thracians and the Illyrians demanded his attention. He made himself master of a Thracian colony, to which he gave the name of Philippi, and from which he received the greatest advantages, on account of the golden mines in the neighbourhood. In the midst of his political prosperity, Philip did not neglect the honour of his family. He married Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, king of the Molossi, and when some time after he became father of Alexander, the monarch, conscious of the inestimable advantages which arise from the lessons, the example, and the conversation of a learned and virtuous preceptor, wrote a letter with his own hand to the philosopher Aristotle, and begged him to retire from his usual pursuits, and to dedicate his whole time to the instruction of the young prince. Every thing seemed now to conspire to his aggrandizement, and historians have observed, that Philip received in one day the intelligence of three things which could gratify the most unbounded ambition, and flatter the hopes of the most aspiring monarch; the birth of a son, an honourable crown at the Olympic games, and a victory over the barbarians at Illyricum. But all these increased rather than satiated his ambition; he declared his inimical sentiments against the power of Athens and the independence of all Greece by laying siege to Olynthus, a place which, on account of its situation and consequence, would prove most injurious to the interests of the Athenians, and most advantageous to the intrigues and military operations of every Macedonian Prince. The Athenians, roused by the eloquence of Demosthenes, sent 17 vessels and 2000 men to the assistance of Olynthus, but the money of Philip prevailed over all their efforts. The greatest part of the citizens suffered themselves to be bribed by the Macedonian gold, and Olynthus surrendered to the enemy and was instantly reduced to ruins. His successes were as great in every part of Greece; he was declared head of the Amphictyonic council, and was intrusted with the care of the sacred temple of Apollo at Delphi. If he was recalled to Macedonia, it was only to add fresh laurels to his crown, by victories over his enemies in Illyricum and Thessaly. By assuming the mask of a moderator and peace-maker, he gained confidence, and in attempting to protect the Peloponnesians against the encroaching power of Sparta, he rendered his cause popular, and by ridiculing the insults that were offered to his person as he passed through Corinth, he displayed to the world his moderation and philosophic virtues. In his attempts to make himself master of Eubœa, Philip was unsuccessful; and Phocion, who despised his gold as well as his meanness, obliged him to evacuate an island whose inhabitants were as insensible to the charms of money as they were unmoved at the horrors of war, and the bold efforts of a vigilant enemy. From Eubœa he turned his arms against the Scythians, but the advantages he obtained over this indigent nation were inconsiderable, and he again made Greece an object of plunder and rapine. He advanced far into Bœotia, and a general engagement was fought at Chæronea. The fight was long and bloody, but Philip obtained the victory. His behaviour after the battle reflects great disgrace upon him as a man and a monarch. In the hour of festivity, and during the entertainment which he had given to celebrate the trophies he had won, Philip sallied from his camp, and with the inhumanity of a brute, he insulted the bodies of the slain, and exulted over the calamities of the prisoners of war. His insolence, however, was checked when Demades, one of the Athenian captives, reminded him of his meanness by exclaiming Why do you, O king, act the part of a Thersites, when you can represent with so much dignity the elevated character of an Agamemnon. The reproof was felt, Demades received his liberty, and Philip learned how to gain popularity even among his fallen enemies, by relieving their wants and easing their distresses. At the battle of Chæronea the independence of Greece was extinguished; and Philip, unable to find new enemies in Europe, formed new enterprises, and meditated new conquests. He was nominated general of the Greeks against the Persians, and was called upon as well from inclination as duty to revenge those injuries which Greece had suffered from the invasions of Darius and of Xerxes. But he was stopped in the midst of his warlike preparations; he was stabbed by Pausanias as he entered the theatre at the celebration of the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra. This murder has given rise to many reflections upon the causes which produced it, and many who consider the recent repudiation of Olympias and the resentment of Alexander, are apt to investigate the causes of his death in the bosom of his family. The ridiculous honours which Olympias paid to her husband's murderer, strengthened the suspicion, yet Alexander declared that he invaded the kingdom of Persia to revenge his father's death upon the Persian satraps and princes, by whose immediate intrigues the assassination had been committed. The character of Philip is that of a sagacious, artful, prudent, and intriguing monarch; he was brave in the field of battle, eloquent and dissimulating at home, and he possessed the wonderful art of changing his conduct according to the disposition and caprice of mankind, without ever altering his purpose, or losing sight of his ambitious aims. He possessed much perseverance, and in the executions of his plans he was always vigorous. The hand of an assassin prevented him from achieving the boldest and the most extensive of his undertakings, and he might have acquired as many laurels, and conquered as many nations as his son Alexander did in the succeeding reign, and the kingdom of Persia might have been added to the Macedonian empire, perhaps with greatest moderation, with more glory, and with more lasting advantages. The private character of Philip lies open to censure, and raises indignation. The admirer of his virtues is disgusted to find him among the most abandoned prostitutes, and disgracing himself by the most unnatural crimes and lascivious indulgences which can make even the most debauched and the most profligate to blush. He was murdered in the 47th year of his age, and the 24th of his reign, about 336 years before the Christian era. His reign is become uncommonly interesting, and his administration a matter of instruction. He is the first monarch whose life and actions are described with peculiar accuracy and historical faithfulness. Philip was the father of Alexander the Great and of Cleopatra, by Olympias; he had also by Audaca, an Illyrian, Cyna, who married Amyntas the son of Perdiccas, Philip's elder brother; by Niacipolis, a Thessalian, Nicæa, who married Cassander; by Philinna, a Larisæan dancer, Aridæus, who reigned some time after Alexander's death; by Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus, Caranus and Europa, who were both murdered by Olympias; and Ptolemy the first, king of Egypt, by Arsinoe, who in the first month of her pregnancy was married to Lagus. Demosth. in Phil. & Olynth.—Justin. 7, &c.—Diod. 16.—Plut. in Alex. Dem. & Apoph.—Isocrat. ad Phil.—Curt. 1, &c.—Æschines.—Paus.—Bœotic. &c.—The last king of Macedonia, of that name, was son of Demetrius. His infancy, at the death of his father, was protected by Antigonus, one of his friends, who ascended the throne, and reigned for 12 years with the title of independent monarch. When Antigonus died, Philip recovered his father's throne, though only fifteen years of age, and he early distinguished himself by his boldness and his ambitious views. His cruelty, however, to Aratus, soon displayed his character in its true light, and to the gratification of every vice, and every extravagant propensity, he had the meanness to sacrifice this faithful and virtuous Athenian. Not satisfied with the kingdom of Macedonia, Philip aspired to become the friend of Annibal, and wished to share with him the spoils which the distressed and continual loss of the Romans seemed soon to promise. But his expectations were frustrated, the Romans discovered his intrigues, and though weakened by the valour and artifice of the Carthaginian, yet they were soon enabled to meet him in the field of battle. The consul Lævinius entered without delay the territories of Macedonia, and after he had obtained a victory over him near Apollonia and reduced his fleet to ashes, he compelled him to sue for peace. This peaceful disposition was not permanent, and when the Romans discovered that he had assisted their immortal enemy Annibal with men and money, they appointed T. Q. Flaminius to punish his perfidy, and the violation of the treaty. The Roman consul, with his usual expedition invaded Macedonia, and, in a general engagement which was fought near Cynocephale, the hostile army was totally defeated, and the monarch saved his life with difficulty by flying from the field of battle. Destitute of resources, without friends either at home or abroad, Philip was obliged to submit to the mercy of the conqueror, and to demand peace by his ambassadors. It was granted with difficulty, the terms were humiliating, but the poverty of Philip obliged him to accept the conditions, however disadvantageous and degrading to his dignity. In the midst of these public calamities the peace of his family was disturbed; and Perseus, the eldest of his sons by a concubine, raised seditions against his brother Demetrius, whose condescension and humanity had gained popularity among the Macedonians, and who, from his residence at Rome, as an hostage, had gained the good graces of the senate, and by the modesty and innocence of his manners, had obtained forgiveness from the venerable body for the hostilities of his father. Philip listened with too much avidity to the false accusation of Perseus; and when he heard it asserted that Demetrius wished to rob him of his crown, he no longer hesitated to punish with death so unworthy and so ungrateful a son. No sooner was Demetrius sacrificed to credulity than Philip became convinced of his cruelty and rashness, and to punish the perfidy of Perseus, he attempted to make Antigonus, another son, his successor on the Macedonian throne. But he was prevented from executing his purpose by death, in the 42d year of his reign, 179 years before the Christian era. The assassin of Demetrius succeeded his father, and with the same ambition, with the same rashness and oppression, renewed the war against the Romans till his empire was destroyed, and Macedonia became a Roman province. Philip has been compared with his great ancestor of the same name; but though they possessed the same virtues, the same ambition, and were tainted with the same vices, yet the father of Alexander was most sagacious and more intriguing, and the son of Demetrius was more suspicious, more cruel, and more implacable; and according to the pretended prophecy of one of the Sibyls, Macedonia was indebted to one Philip for her rise and consequence among nations, and under another Philip she lamented the loss of her power, her empire, and her dignity. Polyb. 16, &c.—Justin. 29, &c.—Plut. in Fam.—Paus. 7, c. 8.—Liv. 31, &c.—Val. Max. 4, c. 8.—Orosius, 4, c. 20.—M. Julius, a Roman emperor, of an obscure family in Arabia, from whence he was surnamed Arabian. From the lowest rank in the army he gradually rose to the highest offices, and when he was made general of the pretorian guards he assassinated Gordian to make himself emperor. To establish himself with more certainty on the imperial throne, he left Mesopotamia a prey to the continual invasions of the Persians, and hurried to Rome, where his election was universally approved by the senate and the Roman people. Philip rendered his cause popular by his liberality and profusion, and it added much to his splendour and dignity, that the Romans during his reign commemorated the foundation of their city, a solemnity which was observed but once every hundred years, and which was celebrated with more pomp and more magnificence than under the preceding reigns. The people were entertained with games and spectacles, the theatre of Pompey was successively crowded during three days and three nights, and 2000 gladiators bled in the circus at once, for the amusement and pleasures of a gazing populace. His usurpation, however, was short, Philip was defeated by Decius, who had proclaimed himself emperor in Pannonia, and he was assassinated by his own soldiers near Verona, in the 45th year of his age, and the 5th of his reign, A. D. 249. His son, who bore the same name, and who had shared with him the imperial dignity, was also massacred in the arms of his mother. Young Philip was then in the 12th year of his age, and the Romans lamented in him the loss of rising talents, of natural humanity, and endearing virtues. Aurel. Victor. Zozim.—A native of Acarnania, physician to Alexander the Great. When the monarch had been suddenly taken ill after bathing in the Cydnus, Philip undertook to remove the complaint when the rest of the physicians believed that all medical assistance would be ineffectual. But as he was preparing his medicine, Alexander received a letter from Parmenio, in which he was advised to beware of his physician Philip, as he had conspired against his life. The monarch was alarmed, and when Philip presented him the medicine, he gave him Parmenio's letter to peruse, and began to drink the potion. The serenity and composure of Philip's countenance, as he read the letter, removed every suspicion from Alexander's breast, and he pursued the directions of his physician, and in a few days recovered. Plut. in Alex.—Curt. 3.—Arrian. 2.—A son of Alexander the Great, murdered by order of Olympias.—A man who pretended to be the son of Perseus, that he might lay claim to the kingdom of Macedonia. PHILISTION, a comic poet of Nicæa in the age of Socrates. Martial. 2, ep. 41.

PHILISTUS, a musician of Miletus.—A

Syracusan, who during his banishment from his native country, wrote an history of Sicily in 12 books, which was commended by some, though condemned for inaccuracy by Pausanias. He was afterwards sent against the Syracusans by Dionysius the younger, and he killed himself when overcome by the enemy, 356 B. C. Plut. in Dion.—Diod. 13.

PHILO, [a learned Jewish writer who flourished in the first century, and under the reign of Caligula. He was of the sacerdotal family, and brother to the chief magistrate of his race at Alexandria, where he was born. He received his education at his native place, and distinguished himself by his early proficiency in eloquence, philosophy, and Scriptural knowledge. He is spoken of by Eusebius as a man copious in speech, rich in sentiments, and eminent for his knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. He was particularly versed in the Platonic philosophy. In A. D. 40, he was sent at the head of a deputation to Rome, to vindicate his countrymen on account of a tumult at Alexandria. Caligula, the Roman emperor, refused to receive him. By Eusebius, Jerome, and others, it is said that he came a second time to Rome in the reign of Claudius, when he formed an acquaintance with St. Peter, and cultivated his friendship; and Photius affirms that he became a convert to the Christian faith and was baptized; but that afterwards, having met with some cause of offence, from motives of resentment he renounced his creed. The Rev. J. Jones in his "Ecclesiastical Researches" published in 1812, and also in the "Supplement" to that work, labours very ingeniously to prove both Philo and Josephus to have been Christian writers.] He was so happy in his expressions, and elegant in his variety, that he has been called the Jewish Plato, and the book which he wrote on the sufferings of the Jews in the reign of Caius, met with such unbounded applause in the Roman senate where he read it publicly, that he was permitted to consecrate it in the public libraries. His works were divided into three parts, of which the first related to the creation of the world, the second spoke of sacred history, and in the third the author made mention of the laws and customs of the Jewish nation. The best edition of Philo is that of Mangey, 2 vols. fol. London, 1742.—A philosopher, who followed the doctrines of Carneades, B. C. 100.—Another philosopher of Athens, tutor to Cicero.—A grammarian in the first century.—An architect of Byzantium, who flourished about three centuries before the Christian era. He built a dock at Athens, where ships were drawn in safety, and protected from storms. Cic. in Orat. 1, c. 14.—A Greek Christian writer, whose work was edited at Rome, 4to. 1772.—A dialectic philosopher, 260 B. C.

PHILOCHORUS, a man who wrote an history of Athens in 17 books, a catalogue of the archons, two books of Olympiads, &c. He died B. C. 222.

PHILOCLEES, one of the admirals of the Athenian fleet during the Peloponnesian war. He recommended to his countrymen to cut off the right hand of such of the enemy as were taken, that they might be rendered unfit for service. His plan was adopted by all the 10 admirals except one, but their expectations were frustrated, and instead of being conquerors, they were totally defeated at Ægospotamos by Lysander, and Philocles, with 3000 of his countrymen, was put to death and denied the honours of a burial. Plut. in Lys.—A comic poet.—Another who wrote tragedies at Athens.

PHILOCTÈTES, son of Pœan and Demonassa, was one of the Argonauts according to Flaccus and Hyginus, and the arm-bearer and particular friend of Hercules. He was present at the death of Hercules, and because he had erected the burning-pile on which the hero was consumed, he received from him the arrows which had been dipped in the gall of the hydra, after he had bound himself by a solemn oath not to betray the place where his ashes were deposited. He had no sooner paid the last offices to Hercules, than he returned to Melibœa where his father reigned. From thence he visited Sparta, where he became one of the numerous suitors of Helen, and soon after, like the rest of those princes who had courted the daughters of Tyndarus, and who had bound themselves to protect her from injury, he was called upon by Menelaus to accompany the Greeks to the Trojan war, and he immediately set sail from Melibœa with seven ships, and repaired to Aulis, the general rendezvous of the combined fleet. He was here prevented from joining his countrymen, and the offensive smell which arose from a wound in his foot, obliged the Greeks, at the instigation of Ulysses, to remove him from the camp, and he was accordingly carried to the island of Lemnos, or, as others say, to Chryse, where Phimacus, the son of Dolopion, was ordered to wait upon him. In this solitary retreat he was suffered to remain for some time, till the Greeks, on the tenth year of the Trojan war, were informed by the oracle that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules, which were then in the possession of Philoctetes. Upon this Ulysses, accompanied by Diomedes, or, according to others, by Pyrrhus, was commissioned by the rest of the Grecian army to go to Lemnos, and to prevail upon Philoctetes to come and finish the tedious siege. Philoctetes recollected the ill treatment he had received from the Greeks, and particularly from Ulysses, and therefore he not only refused to go to Troy, but he even persuaded Pyrrhus to conduct him to Melibœa. As he embarked the manes of Hercules forbade him to proceed, but immediately to repair to the Grecian camp, where he should be cured of his wound, and put an end to the war. Philoctetes obeyed, and after he had been restored to his former health by Æsculapius, or, according to some, by Machaon, or Podalirus, he destroyed an immense number of the Trojan enemy, among whom was Paris the son of Priam, with the arrows of Hercules. When by his valour Troy had been ruined, he set sail from Asia; but as he was unwilling to visit his native country, he came to Italy, where, by the assistance of his Thessalian followers, he was enabled to build a town in Bruttium, which he called Petilia. Authors disagree about the causes of the wound which Philoctetes received on the foot. The most ancient mythologists support that it was the bite of the serpent which Juno had sent to torment him, because he had attended Hercules in his last moments, and had buried his ashes. According to another opinion, the princes of the Grecian army obliged him to discover where the ashes of Hercules were deposited, and as he had made an oath not to mention the place, he only with his foot struck the ground where they lay, and by this means concluded he had not violated his solemn engagement. For this, however, he was soon after punished, and the fall of one of the poisoned arrows from his quiver upon the foot which had struck the ground, occasioned so offensive a wound that the Greeks were obliged to remove him from their camp. The sufferings and adventures of Philoctetes are the subject of one of the best tragedies of Sophocles, Virg. Æn. 3, v. 46.—Pindar. Pyth. 1.—*Dictys. PHILOCYPRUS, a prince of Cyprus in the age of Solon, by whose advice he changed the situation of a city, which in gratitude he called Soli. Plut. in Sol.

PHILODEMUS, a poet in the age of Cicero, who rendered himself known by his lascivious and indelicate verses. Cic. de Finib. 2.—Horat. 1, Sat. 2, v. 121.

PHILOLÆUS, a Pythagorean philosopher of Crotona, B. C. 374, who first supported the diurnal motion of the earth round its axis, and its annual motion round the sun. Cicero in Acad. 4, c. 39, has ascribed this opinion to the Syracusan philosopher Nicetas, and likewise to Plato; and from this passage some suppose that Copernicus started the idea of the system which he afterwards established. Diog.—Cic. de Orat. 3.—Plut.—A lawgiver of Thebes. He was a native of Corinth, and of the family of the Bacchiades, &c. Aristot. 2, Polit. cap. ult.

PHILOLOGUS, a freed-man of Cicero. He betrayed his master to Antony, for which he was tortured by Pomponia, the wife of Cicero's brother, and obliged to cut off his own flesh by piece-meal, and to boil and eat it up. Plut. in Cic. &c.

PHILOMBROTUS, an archon at Athens in whose age the state was intrusted to Solon, when torn by factions. Plut. in Sol.

PHILOMELA, a daughter of Pandion, king of Athens, and sister to Procne, who had married Tereus king of Thrace. Procne separated from Philomela, to whom she was particularly attached, and spent her time in great melancholy till she prevailed upon her husband to go to Athens, and bring her sister to Thrace. Tereus obeyed his wife's injunctions, but he had no sooner obtained Pandion's permission to conduct Philomela to Thrace, than he became enamoured of her, and resolved to gratify his passion. He dismissed the guards, whom the suspicions of Pandion had appointed to watch his conduct, and he offered violence to Philomela, and afterwards cut off her tongue that she might not be able to discover his barbarity, and the indignities which she had suffered. He confined her also in a lonely castle; and after he had taken every precaution to prevent a discovery, he returned to Thrace, and he told Procne that Philomela had died by the way, and that he had paid the last offices to her remains. Procne, at this sad intelligence, put on mourning for the loss of Philomela; but a year had scarcely elapsed before she was secretly informed that her sister was not dead. Philomela, during her captivity, described on a piece of tapestry her misfortunes and the brutality of Tereus, and privately conveyed it to Procne. She was then going to celebrate the orgies of Bacchus when she received it; she disguised her resentment, and as, during the festivals of the god of wine, she was permitted to rove about the country, she hastened to deliver her sister Philomela from her confinement, and she concerted with her on the best measures of punishing the cruelty of Tereus. She murdered her son Itylus, who was in the sixth year of his age, and served him up as food before her husband during the festival. Tereus in the midst of his repast called for Itylus, but Procne immediately informed him, that he was then feasting on his flesh, and that instant Philomela, by throwing on the table the head of Itylus, convinced the monarch of the cruelty of the scene. He drew his sword to punish Procne and Philomela, but as he was going to stab them to the heart, he was changed into a hoopoe, Philomela into a nightingale, Procne into a swallow, and Itylus into a pheasant. This tragical scene happened at Daulis in Phocis; but Pausanias and Strabo, who mention the whole of the story, are silent about the transformation; and the former observes that Tereus, after this bloody repast, fled to Megara, where he destroyed himself. The inhabitants of the place raised a monument to his memory, where they offered yearly sacrifices and placed small pebbles instead of barley. It was on this monument that the birds called hoopoes were first seen; hence the fable of the metamorphosis. Procne and Philomela died through excess of grief and melancholy, and as the nightingale's and swallow's voice is peculiarly plaintive and mournful, the poets have embellished the fable, by supposing, that the two unfortunate sisters were changed into birds. Apollod. 3, c. 14.—Paus. 1, c. 42. l. 10, c. 4.—Hygin. fab. 45.—Strab. 9.—*Ovid. PHILONIDES, a courier of Alexander, who ran from Sicyon to Elis, 160 miles in nine hours, and returned the same journey in 15 hours. Plin. 2, c. 71.

PHILONOE, a daughter of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, by Leda daughter of Thestius. Apollod.—A daughter of Iobates, king of Lydia, who married Bellerophon. Id. 2.

PHILONOME, daughter of Nyctimus, king of Arcadia, who threw into the Eurymanthus two children whom she had by Mars. The children were preserved, and afterwards ascended their grandfather's throne. Plut. in Per.—The second wife of Cynus, the son of Neptune. She became enamoured of Teonēs, her husband's son by his first wife Proclea, the daughter of Clytius, and when he refused to gratify her passion, she accused him of attempts upon her virtue. Cynus believed the accusation, and ordered Tennes to be thrown into the sea, &c. Paus. 10, c. 14.

PHILOPOMEN, a celebrated general of the Achæan league, born at Megalopolis. His father's name was Grangis. His education was begun and finished under Cassander, Ecdemus, and Demophanes, and he early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and appeared fond of agriculture and a country life. He proposed himself Epaminondas for a model, and he was not unsuccessful in imitating the prudence and the simplicity, the disinterestedness and activity of this famous Theban. When Megalopolis was attacked by the Spartans, Philopomen, then in the 30th year of his age, gave the most decisive proofs of his valour and intrepidity. He afterwards assisted Antigonus, and was present in the famous battle in which the Ætolians were defeated. Raised to the rank of chief commander, he showed his ability to discharge that important trust, by killing with his own hand Machanidas, the tyrant of Sparta; and if he was defeated in a naval battle by Nabis, he soon after repaired his losses by taking the capital of Laconia, B. C. 188, and by abolishing the laws of Lycurgus, which had flourished there for such a length of time. Sparta, after its conquest, became tributary to the Achæans, and Philopomen enjoyed the triumph of having reduced to ruins, one of the greatest and most powerful of the cities of Greece. Some time after the Messenians revolted from the Achæan league, and Philopomen, who headed the Achæans, unfortunately fell from his horse, and was dragged to the enemy's camp. Dinocrates, the general of the Messenians, treated him with great severity; he was thrown into a dungeon, and obliged to drink a dose of poison. When he received the cup from the hand of the executioner, Philopomen asked him how his countrymen had behaved in the field of battle; and when he heard that they had obtained the victory, he drank the whole with pleasure, exclaiming that this was comfortable news. The death of Philopomen, which happened about 183 years before the Christian era, in his 70th year, was universally lamented, and the Achæans, to revenge his death, immediately marched to Messenia, where Dinocrates, to avoid their resentment, killed himself. The rest of his murderers were dragged to his tomb, where they were sacrificed; and the people of Megalopolis, to show farther their great sense of his merit, ordered a bull to be yearly offered on his tomb, and hymns to be sung in his praise, and his actions to be celebrated in a panegyric oration. He had also statues raised to his memory, which some of the Romans attempted to violate and to destroy, to no purpose, when Mummius took Corinth. Philopomen has been called by his countrymen, the last of the Greeks. Plut. in vitâ.—Justin. 32, c. 4.—Polyb.—A native of Pergamus, who died B. C. 138.

PHILOSTRATUS, a famous sophist, born at Lemnos, or, according to some, at Athens. He came to Rome, where he lived under the patronage of Julia, the wife of the emperor Severus, and he was intrusted by the empress with all the papers which contained some account or anecdotes of Apollonius Tyanæus, and he was ordered to review them, and with them to compile an history. [vid. Apollonius.] The life of Apollonius is written with elegance, but the improbable accounts, the fabulous stories, and exaggerated details which it gives, render it disgusting. There is, besides, another treatise remaining of his writings, &c. He died A. D. 244. The best edition of his writings is that of Olearius, fol. Lips. 1709.—His nephew, who lived in the reign of Heliogabalus, wrote an account of sophists.—A philosopher in the reign of Nero.—Another in the age of Augustus.

PHILOSTAS, a son of Parmenio, distinguished in the battles of Alexander, and at last accused of conspiring against his life. He was tortured, and stoned to death, or, according to some, stuck through with darts by the soldiers, B. C. 330. Curt. 6, c. 11.—Plut.—Arrian.

PHILOTTIS, a servant-maid at Rome, who saved her countrymen from destruction. After the siege of Rome by the Gauls, the Fidenates assembled an army under the command of Lucius Posthumius, and marched against the capital, demanding all the wives and daughters in the city as the conditions of peace. This extraordinary demand astonished the senators, and when they refused to comply, Philottis advised them to send all their female slaves disguised in matron's clothes, and she offered to march herself at the head. Her advice was followed, and when the Fidenates had feasted late in the evening, and were quite intoxicated and fallen asleep, Philottis lighted a torch as a signal for her countrymen to attack the enemy. The whole was successful, the Fidenates were conquered, and the senate, to reward the fidelity of the female slaves, permitted them to appear in the dress of the Roman matrons. Plut. in Rom.—Varro de L. L. 5.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2.

who received Cilicia at the general division of the provinces.—A son of Ptolemy, who was given to Pelopidas as a hostage.—A dithyrambic poet of Cythera, who enjoyed the favour of Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily, for some time, till he offended him by seducing one of his female singers. During his confinement, Philoxenus composed an allegorical poem, called Cyclops, in which he had delineated the character of the tyrant under the name of Polyphemus, and represented his mistress under the name of Galatæa, and himself under that of Ulysses. The tyrant, who was fond of writing poetry, and of being applauded, removed Philoxenus from his dungeon, but the poet refused to purchase liberty, by saying things unworthy of himself, and applauding the wretched verses of Dionysius, and therefore he was sent to the quarries. When he was asked his opinion at a feast about some verses which Dionysius had just repeated, and which the courtiers had received with the greatest applause, Philoxenus gave no answer, but he ordered the guards that surrounded the tyrant's table to take him back to the quarries. Dionysius was pleased with his pleasantry and with his firmness, and immediately forgave him. Philoxenus died at Ephesus, about 380 years before Christ. Plut.—A celebrated musician of Ionia.—A painter of Eretria, who made for Cassander an excellent representation of the battle of Alexander with Darius. He was pupil to Nicomachus. Plin. 31, c. 10.

PHILYRA, one of the Oceanides, who was met by Saturn in Thrace. The god, to escape from the vigilance of Rhea, changed himself into a horse, to enjoy the company of Philyra, by whom he had a son, half a man and half a horse, called Chiron. Philyra was so ashamed of giving birth to such a monster, that she entreated the gods to change her nature. She was metamorphosed into the linden tree, called by her name among the Greeks. Hygin. fab. 133.

PHILYRIDES, a patronymic of Chiron, the son of Philyra. Ovid. Art. Am.—Virg. G. 3, v. 550.

PHINEUS, a son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, or, according to some, of Neptune, who became king of Thrace; or, as the greater part of the mythologists support, of Bithynia. He married Cleopatra the daughter of Boreas, whom some call Cleobula, by whom he had Plexippus and Pandion. After the death of Cleopatra, he married Idæa, the daughter of Dardanus. Idæa, jealous of Cleopatra's children, accused them of attempts upon their father's life and crown, or, according to some, of attempts upon her virtue, and they were immediately condemned by Phineus to be deprived of their eyes. This cruelty was soon after punished by the gods. Phineus suddenly became blind, and the Harpies were sent by Jupiter to keep him under continual alarm, and to spoil the meats which were placed on his table. He was some time after delivered from these dangerous monsters by his brothers-in-law, Zetes and Calais, who pursued them as far as the Strophades. He also recovered his sight by means of the Argonauts, whom he had received with great hospitality, and instructed in the easiest and speediest way by which they could arrive in Colchis. The causes of the blindness of Phineus are a matter of dispute among the ancients, some supposing that this was inflicted by Boreas for his cruelty to his grandson, whilst others attribute it to the anger of Neptune, because he had directed the sons of Phryxus how to escape from Colchis to Greece. Many, however, think that it proceeded from his having rashly attempted to develope futurity, while others assert that Zetes and Calais put out his eyes on account of his cruelty to their nephews. The second wife of Phineus is called by some Dia, Eurytia, Danae, and Idothea. Phineus was killed by Hercules. Arg. 2.—Apollod. 1, c. 9, l. 3, c. 15.—Diod. 4.—Hygin. fab. 19.—Orpheus.—Flacc.—The brother of Cepheus, king of Æthiopia. He was going to marry his niece Andromeda, when her father Cepheus was obliged to give her up to be devoured by a sea-monster, to appease the resentment of Neptune. She was, however, delivered by Perseus, who married her by the consent of her parents, for having destroyed the sea-monster. This marriage displeased Phineus; he interrupted the ceremony, and with a number of attendants attacked Perseus and his friends. Perseus defended himself, and turned into stone Phineus and his companions, by showing them the Gorgon's head. Apollod. 2, c. 1 and 4.—Ovid. Met. 5, fab. 1 and 2.—Hygin. fab. 64.

PHINTIA, a town of Sicily, at the mouth of the Himera. Cic. in Verr. 2, c. 83.

PHLEGËTHON, a river of hell, whose waters were burning, as the word φλεγέθων, from which the name is derived, seems to indicate. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 550.—Ovid. Met. 15, v. 532.—Senec. in Hipp.—Sil. 13, v. 564.

PHLEGON, a native of Tralles in Lydia, one of the emperor Adrian's freedmen. He wrote different treatises on the long lived, on wonderful things, besides an historical account of Sicily, sixteen books on the Olympiads, an account of the principal places in Rome, three books of Fasti, &c. Of these some fragments remain. His style was not elegant, and he wrote without judgment or precision. His works have been edited by Meursius, 4to. L. Bat. 1620.—One of the horses of the sun. The word signifies burning. Ovid. Met. 2.

PHLEGRA, or PHLEGREÆUS CAMPUS, a place of Macedonia, afterwards called Pallene, where the giants attacked the gods and were defeated by Hercules. The combat was afterwards renewed in Italy, in a place of the same name near Cumæ. [The territory of Italy, which is thus denominatèd, forms a district of Campania, and appears to have experienced in a very great degree the destructive effects of subterraneous fires. Here we find Mount Vesuvius, the Solfaterra still smoking, as the poets have pretended, from Jupiter's thunder. The Monte Nuovo, which was suddenly thrown up from the bowels of the earth on the day of St. Michael's feast, in the year 1538, the Monte Barbara, formerly Mons Gaurus, the grôtto of the Sibyl, the noxious and gloomy lakes of Avernus and Acheron, &c. It is not improbable that these objects terrified the Greeks in their first voyages to the coast, and that they were afterwards embellished and exaggerated by the fancy and fiction of the poets.] Sil. 8, v. 538, l. 9, v. 305.—Strab. 5.—Diod. 4 and 5.—*Ovid. PHLEGYÆ, a people of Thessaly. Some authors place them in Bœotia. They received their name from Phlegyas, the son of Mars, with whom they plundered and burned the temple of Apollo at Delphi. Few of them escaped to Phocis, where they settled. Paus. 9, c. 36.—Homer. Il. 13, v. 301.—Strab. 9.

PHLEGYAS, a son of Mars by Chryse, daughter of Halmus, was king of the Lapithæ in Thessaly. He was father of Ixion and Coronis, to whom Apollo offered violence. When the father heard that his daughter had been so wantonly abused, he marched an army against Delphi, and reduced the temple of the god to ashes. This was highly resented, Apollo killed Phlegyas and placed him in hell, where a huge stone hangs over his head, and keeps him in continual alarms by its appearance of falling every moment. Paus. 9, c. 36.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Pind. Pyth. 3.—Ovid. Met. 3, v. 87.—Servius ad Virg. Æn. 6, v. 618.

PHLIASIA, a country of Peloponnesus near Sicyon, of which Philius was the capital.

PHLIUS, (gen. unhs.) a town in Peloponnesus, now Staphlica, in the territory of Sicyon.—Another in Elis.—Another in Argolis, now Drepano.

PHLEŪS, a surname of Bacchus, expressive of his youth and vigour. Plut. in Symp. 5, qu. 8.

PHOBËTOR, one of the sons of Somnus, and his principal minister. His office was to assume the shape of serpents and wild beasts, to inspire terror in the minds of men, as his name intimates (φοβω). The other two ministers of Somnus were Phantasia and Morpheus. Ovid. Met. 11, v. 640.

PHOBOS, son of Mars, and god of terror among the ancients, was represented with a lion's head, and sacrifices were offered to him to deprecate his appearance in armies. Plut. in erot.

PHOCÆA, now Fochia, a maritime town of Ionia in Asia Minor, with two harbours, between Cumæ and Smyrna, founded by an Athenian colony. It received its name from Phocus, the leader of the colony, or from (φωκαι.) sea-calves, which are found in great abundance in the neighbourhood. The inhabitants, called Phocæi and Phocæenses, were expert mariners, and founded many cities in different parts of Europe. [They founded a colony also in Corsica, and carried on commerce even as far as Tartessus. They are said to have been the first of the Greeks who built ships of war of 50 oars, which they probably imitated from the Carthaginians.] They left Ionia when Cyrus attempted to reduce them under his power, and they came, after many adventures, into Gaul, where they founded Massilia, now Marseilles. The town of Marseilles is often distinguished by the epithet of Phocæica, and its inhabitants called Phocæenses. [It seems that the Phocæans, being besieged by Harpagus, the general of Cyrus, put their families and all their effects on board of their fleet, and sailed to the Oenusa insulæ, near Chios. The Chians, however, to whom these islands belonged, fearing a diminution of their own commerce from such active neighbours, opposed the intended settlement. The Phocæans returned upon this to their native city, overpowered the Persian garrison, and having bound themselves by an oath to abandon their native land, and not to return to it again until a mass of iron, which they sunk, should rise to the surface, sailed away to their colony in Corsica. On the voyage, however, one half of the fleet repented of the oath and returned home to Phocæa, the rest proceeded on their course. Having reached Corsica, they settled in Alesia, or Aleria, an old colony of theirs, until at length the jealousy and encroachments of the Carthaginians and Etrurians compelled them to retire to the coast of Gaul, where they founded Massilia.] Phocæa was declared independent by Pompey, and under the first emperors of Rome it became one of the most flourishing cities of Asia Minor. Liv. 5, c. 34, l. 37, c. 31, l. 38, c. 39.—Mela, 1, c. 17.—Paus. 7, c. 3.—Herodot. 1, v. 165.—Strab. 14.—Horat. epod. 16.—*Ovid. PHOCENSES and PHOCÏI, the inhabitants of Phocis in Greece.

PHOCILIDES, a Greek poet and philosopher of Miletus, about 540 years before the Christian era. The poetical piece now extant, called φουδιτινον, and attributed to him, is not of his composition, but of another poet who lived in the reign of Adrian.

PHOCIION, an Athenian celebrated for his virtues, private as well as public. He was educated in the school of Plato and of Xenocrates, and as soon as he appeared among the statesmen of Athens, he distinguished himself by his prudence and moderation, his zeal for the public good, and his military abilities. He often checked the violent and inconsiderate measures of Demosthenes, and when the Athenians seemed eager to make war against Philip king of Macedonia, Phociion observed that war should never be undertaken without the strongest and most certain expectations of victory and success. When

Philip endeavoured to make himself master of Eubœa, Phocion stopped his progress, and soon obliged him to relinquish his enterprise. During the time of his administration he was always inclined to peace, though he never suffered his countrymen to become indolent, and to forget the jealousy and rivalry of their neighbours. He was 45 times appointed governor of Athens, and no greater encomium can be passed upon his talents as a minister and statesman, than that he never solicited that high, though dangerous, office. In his rural retreat, or at the head of the Athenian armies, he always appeared barefooted and without a cloak, whence one of his soldiers had occasion to observe, when he saw him dressed more warmly than usual during a severe winter, that since Phocion wore his cloak it was a sign of the most inclement weather. If he was the friend of temperance and discipline, he was not a less brilliant example of true heroism. Philip, as well as his son Alexander, attempted to bribe him, but to no purpose; and Phocion boasted in being one of the poorest of the Athenians, and in deserving the appellation of the Good. It was through him that Greece was saved from an impending war, and he advised Alexander rather to turn his arms against Persia than to shed the blood of the Greeks, who were either his allies or his subjects. Alexander was so sensible of his merit and of his integrity, that he sent him 100 talents from the spoils which he had obtained from the Persians, but Phocion was too great to suffer himself to be bribed; and when the conqueror had attempted a second time to oblige him, and to conciliate his favour, by offering him the government and possession of five cities, the Athenians rejected the presents with the same indifference and with the same independent mind. But, not totally to despise the favours of the monarch, he begged Alexander to restore to their liberty four slaves that were confined in the citadel of Sardis. Antipater, who succeeded in the government of Macedonia after the death of Alexander, also attempted to corrupt the virtuous Athenian, but with the same success as his royal predecessor; and when a friend had observed to Phocion, that if he could so refuse the generous offers of his patrons, yet he should consider the good of his children, and accept them for their sake, Phocion calmly replied, that if his children were like him they could maintain themselves as well as their father had done, but if they behaved otherwise he declared that he was unwilling to leave them any thing which might either supply their extravagance or encourage their debaucheries. But virtues like these could not long stand against the insolence and fickleness of an Athenian assembly. When the Piræus was taken, Phocion was accused of treason, and therefore, to avoid the public indignation, he fled for safety to Polyperchon. Polyperchon sent him back to Athens, where he was immediately condemned to drink the fatal poison. He received the indignities of the people with uncommon composure; and when one of his friends lamented his fate, Phocion exclaimed, This is no more than what I expected; this treatment the most illustrious citizens of Athens have received before me. He took the cup with the greatest serenity of mind, and as he drank the fatal draught, he prayed for the prosperity of Athens, and bade his friends to tell his son Phocus not to remember the indignities which his father had received from the Athenians. He died about 318 years before the Christian era. His body was deprived of a funeral by order of the ungrateful Athenians, and if it was at last interred, it was by stealth, under a hearth, by the hand of a woman who placed this inscription over his bones: Keep inviolate, O sacred hearth, the precious remains of a good man, till a better day restores them to the monuments of their forefathers, when Athens shall be delivered of her frenzy, and shall be more wise. It has been observed of Phocion, that he never appeared elated in prosperity or dejected in adversity, he never betrayed pusillanimity by a tear or joy by a smile. His countenance was stern and unpleasant, but he never behaved with severity; his expressions were mild, and his rebukes gentle. At the age of 80 he appeared at the head of the Athenian armies like the most active officer, and to his prudence and cool valour in every period of life his citizens acknowledged themselves much indebted. His merits were not buried in oblivion; the Athenians repented of their ingratitude, and honoured his memory by raising him statues, and putting to a cruel death his guilty accusers. *Plut. & C. PHOCIS, a country of Greece, [having the Sinus Corinthiacus on the south, Doris and the Locri Ozolæ on the west, Thessaly on the north, and the Locri Epicnemidii and Opuntii, together with Bœotia, on the east.] It originally extended from the bay of Coriath to the sea of Eubœa, and reached on the north as far as Thermopylæ, but its boundaries were afterwards more contracted. Phocis received its name from Phocus, a son of Ornytion, who settled there. The inhabitants were called Phocenses, and from thence the epithet of Phocus was formed. Parnassus was the most celebrated of the mountains of Phocis, and Delphi was the greatest of its towns. Phocis is rendered famous for a war which it maintained against some of the Grecian republics, and which has received the name of the Phocian war. This celebrated war originated in the following circumstances:—When Philip, king of Macedonia, had by his intrigues and well-concerted policy, fomented divisions in Greece, and disturbed the peace of every republic, the Greeks universally became discontented in their situation, fickle in their resolutions, and jealous of the prosperity of the neighbouring states. The Amphictyons, who were the supreme rulers of Greece, and who at that time were subservient to the views of the

Thebans, the inveterate enemies of the Phocians, showed the same spirit of fickleness, and, like the rest of their countrymen, were actuated by the same fears, the same jealousy and ambition. As the supporters of religion, they accused the Phocians of impiety, for ploughing a small portion of land which belonged to the god of Delphi. They immediately commanded that the sacred field should be laid waste, and that the Phocians, to expiate their crime, should pay a heavy fine to the community. The inability of the Phocians to pay the fine, and that of the Amphictyons to enforce their commands by violence, gave rise to new events. The people of Phocis were roused by the eloquence and the popularity of Philomelus, one of their countrymen, and when this ambitious ringleader had liberally contributed the great riches he possessed to the good of his countrymen, they resolved to oppose the Amphictyonic council by force of arms. He seized the rich temple of Delphi, and employed the treasures it contained to raise a mercenary army. During two years hostilities were carried on between the Phocians and their enemies, the Thebans and the people of Locris, but no decisive battles were fought; and it can only be observed, that the Phocian prisoners were always put to an ignominious death, as guilty of the most abominable sacrilege and impiety, a treatment which was liberally retaliated on such of the army of the Amphictyons as became the captives of the enemy. The defeat, however, and death of Philomelus, for a while checked their successes; but the deceased general was soon succeeded in the command by his brother called Onomarchus, his equal in boldness and ambition, and his superior in activity and enterprise. Onomarchus rendered his cause popular, the Thessalians joined his army, and the neighbouring states observed at least a strict neutrality, if they neither opposed nor favoured his arms. Philip of Macedonia, who had assisted the Thebans, was obliged to retire from the field with dishonour, but a more successful battle was fought near Magnesia, and the monarch, by crowning the head of his soldiers with laurel, and telling them that they fought in the cause of Delphi and heaven, obtained a complete victory. Onomarchus was slain, and his body exposed on a gibbet, 6000 shared his fate, and their bodies were thrown into the sea, as unworthy of funeral honours, and 3000 were taken alive. This fatal defeat, however, did not ruin the Phocians: Phayllus, the only surviving brother of Philomelus, took the command of their armies, and doubling the pay of his soldiers, he increased his forces by the addition of 9000 men from Athens, Lacedæmon, and Achaia. But all this numerous force at last proved ineffectual, the treasures of the temple of Delphi, which had long defrayed the expenses of the war, began to fail, dissensions arose among the ringleaders of Phocis, and when Philip had crossed the straits of Thermopylæ, the Phocians, relying on his generosity, claimed his protection, and implored him to plead their cause before the Amphictyonic council. His feeble intercession was not attended with success, and the Thebans, the Locrians, and the Thessalians, who then composed the Amphictyonic council, unanimously decreed that the Phocians should be deprived of the privilege of sending members among the Amphictyons. Their arms and their horses were to be sold for the benefit of Apollo, they were to pay the annual sum of 60,000 talents, till the temple of Delphi had been restored to its ancient splendour and opulence; their cities were to be dismantled, and reduced to distinct villages, which were to contain no more than sixty houses each, at the distance of a furlong from one another, and all the privileges and the immunities of which they were stripped were to be conferred on Philip, king of Macedonia, for his eminent services in the prosecution of the Phocian war. The Macedonians were ordered to put these cruel commands into execution. The Phocians were unable to make resistance, and ten years after they had undertaken the sacred war, they saw their country laid desolate, their walls demolished, and their cities in ruins, by the wanton jealousy of their enemies and the inflexible cruelty of the Macedonian soldiers, B. C. 348. They were not, however, long under this disgraceful sentence, their well-known valour and courage recommended them to favour, and they gradually regained their influence and consequence by the protection of the Athenians and the favours of Philip. Liv. 32, c. 18.—Ovid. 2, Am. 6, v. 15. Met. 5, v. 276.—Demosth.—Justin. 3, &c.—Diod. 16, &c.—Plut. in *Dem. PHOCUS, son of Phocion, was dissolute in his manners, and unworthy of the virtues of his great father. He was sent to Lacedæmon to imbibe there the principles of sobriety, of temperance, and frugality. He cruelly revenged the death of his father, whom the Athenians had put to death. Plut. in Phoc. & Apoph.—A son of Ornytion, who led a colony of Corinthians into Phocis. PHOCYLIDES, an ancient poet. [vid. Phocilides.]

PHŒBAS, a name applied to the priestess of Apollo's temple at Delphi. Lucan. 5, v. 128, &c.

PHŒBEE, a name given to Diana, or the moon, on account of the brightness of that luminary. She became, according to Apollodorus, mother of Asteria and Latona. [vid. Diana.]

PHŒBIDAS, a Lacedæmonian general, sent by the Ephori to the assistance of the Macedonians against the Thracians. He seized the citadel of Thebes; but though he was disgraced and banished from the Lacedæmonian army for this perfidious measure, yet his countrymen kept possession of the town. He died B. C. 377. C. Nep. in Pelop.—Diod. 14, &c.

PHŒMOS, a lake of Arcadia.

PHŒNICĒ, or PHŒNICIA, [a country of Asia commonly named by the Jews Canaan, though some part of it at least was known to them by the name of Syrophenice. Phœnicia was sometimes extended to all the maritime countries of Syria and Judæa, and Canaan to the Philistines and even to the Amalekites. Specially considered, however, Phœnicia extended along the coast of Syria from the river Eleutherus and the island Aradus, to Mount Carmel, a distance of about 35 geographical miles. The breadth was very limited, the ranges of Libanus and Antilibanus forming its utmost barrier to the east. As to the etymology of the name, various conjectures have been started: the most common one is that which makes it a Greek term, derived from φοινίξ, a palm-tree, which were very abundant in this country. Others derive the name from Phoenix, son of Agenor. Bochart's opinion is as follows: according to him the people of Phœnicia had in ancient times been called the children of Anak or Beni-Anak: the beth being softened, Beni-Anak was changed into Phenak, in the plural Phenakim, from which the Greeks formed φοινίκης. We learn from Scripture that the spies sent by Moses found in Hebron and its environs a people called Anakim or Enakim, and that these Canaanites were distinguished by their stature and strength; of course the other Canaanites who claimed descent from them were likewise named Anakim. M. l'Abbé Mignot, in his elaborate discussion of this subject, thinks that it is not necessary to recur to the word Beni, because the Egyptians always prefixed the article phe to words, so that instead of Enakim they would read Phenakim or Phonakim, and the Greeks becoming acquainted in their first maritime expeditions on the coast of the country with this word, formed from it φοινίκης, and the Latins Phœnices.] The Phœnicians were naturally industrious, and commerce and navigation were among them in the most flourishing state. [They planted colonies on the shores of the Mediterranean, particularly Carthage, Hippo, Marseilles, and Utica, and others on the coast of Spain, both within and without the straits of Gibraltar. Their commerce, besides extending to all parts of the Palus Mœotis, Euxine, and Mediterranean, reached even to the British isles, and also the shores of the Baltic Sea. Besides this maritime commerce, they carried on an extensive inland trade in Syria, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Arabia, and even to Judea. Their own commodities were the purple of Tyre, the glass of Sidon, and the fine linen made in their own country, together with curious pieces of art in metals and wood. Besides these, however, their foreign commerce furnished them with abundant supplies for their inland trade.] Their manufacturers acquired such a superiority over those of other nations, that among the ancients, whatever was elegant, great, or pleasing, either in apparel or domestic utensils, received the epithet of Sidonian. The Phœnicians were originally governed by kings. They were subdued by the Persians, and afterwards by Alexander, and remained tributary to his successors and the Romans. The invention of letters is attributed to them. PHŒNIX, son of Amyntor, king of Argos, by Cleobule, or Hippodamia, was preceptor to young Achilles. When his father proved faithless to his wife, on account of his fondness for a concubine called Clytia, Cleobule, jealous of her husband, persuaded her son Phœnix to ingratiate himself into the favours of his father's mistress. Phœnix easily succeeded, but when Amyntor discovered his intrigues, he drew a curse upon him, and the son was soon after deprived of his sight by divine vengeance. According to some, Amyntor himself put out the eyes of his son, which so cruelly provoked him that he mediated the death of his father. Reason and piety, however, prevailed over passion; and Phœnix, not to become a parricide, fled from Argos to the court of Peleus, king of Phthia. Here he was treated with tenderness, Peleus carried him to Chiron, who restored him to his eye-sight, and soon after he was made preceptor to Achilles, his benefactor's son. He was also presented with the government of many cities, and made king of the Dolopes. He accompanied his pupil to the Trojan war, and Achilles was ever grateful for the instructions and precepts which he had received from Phœnix. After the death of Achilles, Phœnix, with others, was commissioned by the Greeks to return into Greece, to bring to the war young Pyrrhus. This commission he performed with success, and after the fall of Troy, he returned with Pyrrhus, and died in Thrace. He was buried at Eon, or, according to Strabo, near Trachinia, where a small river in the neighbourhood received the name of Phœnix. *Strab. 9.—Homer. ed Telephassa, according to Apollodorus and Moschus, or, according to others, Epimedu-sa, Perimeda, or Agriope. He was, like his brothers, Cadmus and Cilix, sent by his father in pursuit of his sister Europa, whom Jupiter had carried away under the form of a bull, and when his inquiries proved unsuccessful, he settled in a country which, according to some, was from him called Phœnicia. From him, as some suppose, the Carthaginians were called Pœni. Apollod. 3.—Hygin. fab. 178.

PHOLŒE, a mountain of Arcadia, near Pisa. It received its name from Pholus, the friend of Hercules, who was buried there. It is often confounded with another of the same name in Thessaly, near Mount Othrys. Plin. 4, c. 6.—Lucan. 3, v. 198, l. 6, v. 388, l. 7, v. 449.—Ovid. 2. Fast. 2, v. 273.

PHOLUS, one of the Centaurs, son of Sile-nus and Melia, or, according to others, of Ix-ion and the cloud. He kindly entertained Her-cules, when he was going against the boar of Erymanthus, but he refused to give him wine, as that which he had belonged to the rest of the Centaurs. Hercules, upon this, without ceremony, broke the cask and drank the wine. The smell of the liquor drew the Centaurs from the neighbourhood to the house of Pho-lus, but Hercules stopped them when they forcibly entered the habitation of his friend, and killed the greatest part of them. Pho-lus gave the dead a decent funeral, but he mortally wounded himself with one of the arrows which were poisoned with the venom of the hydra, and which he attempted to ex-tract from the body of one of the Centaurs. Hercules, unable to cure him, buried him when dead, and called the mountain where his remains were deposited by the name of Pholœe. Apollod. 1.—Paus. 3.—Virg. G. 2, v. 456. Æn. 8, v. 294.—Diod. 4.—Ial. 1.—Lucan. 3, 6 and 7.—*Stat. PHORBAS, a son of Priam and Epithesia, killed during the Trojan war by Menelaus. The god Somnus borrowed his features when he deceived Palinurus, and threw him into the sea near the coast of Italy. Virg. Æn. 3, v. 842.

PHORCUS or PHORCYUS, a sea-deity, son of Pontus and Terra, who married his sister Ceto, by whom he had the Gorgons, the dragon that kept the apples of the Hesperides, and other monsters. Hesiod. Theogn.—Apol-lod.

PHORMIO, an Athenian general, whose father's name was Asopicus. He improve-rihed himself to maintain and support the dig-nity of his army. His debts were some time after paid by the Athenians, who wish-ed to make him their general, an office which he refused while he had so many debts, ob-serving that it was unbecoming an officer to be at the head of an army, when he knew that he was poorer than the meanest of his sol-diers.—A peripatetic philosopher of Ephe-sus, who once gave a lecture upon the du-ties of an officer and the military profession. The philosopher himself was ignorant of the subject which he treated, upon which Hannibal the Great, who was one of his auditors, exclaimed that he had seen many doting old men, but never one worse than Phormio. Cic. de Nat. D. 2.—A disciple of Plato, chosen by the people of Elis to make a re-formation in their government and their ju-risprudence.

PHORMIS, an Arcadian who acquired great riches at the court of Gelon and Hiero in Si-cily. He dedicated a brazen statue of a mare to Jupiter Olympius in Peloponnesus, which so much resembled nature, that hor-ses came near it as if it had been alive. Paus. 5, c. 27.

PHORONEUS, the god of a river of Pelopon-nesus of the same name. He was son of the river Inachus by Melissa, and he was the se-cond king of Argos. He married a nymph called Cerdo, or Laodice, by whom he had Apis, from whom Argolis was called Apia, and Niobe, the first woman of whom Jupiter became enamoured. Phoroneus taught his subjects the utility of laws, and the advan-tages of a social life, and of friendly inter-course, whence the inhabitants of Argolis are often called Phoronei. Pausanias relates that Phoroneus, with the Cephisus, Asterion and Inachus, were appointed as umpires in a quarrel between Neptune and Juno concern-ing their right of patronizing Argolis. Juno gained the preference, upon which Neptune, in a fit of resentment, dried up all the four rivers whose decision he deemed partial. He afterwards restored them to their dignity and consequence. Phoroneus was the first who raised a temple to Juno. He received divine honours after death. His temple still existed at Argos, under Antoninus the Roman em-peror. Paus. 2, c. 15, &c.—Apollod. 2, c. 1.—Hygin. fab. 143.

PHORŌNIS, a patronymic of Io, as sister of Phoroneus. Ovid. Met. 1, v. 625.

PHOTINUS, an eunuch who was prime mi-nister to Ptolemy, king of Egypt. When Pompey fled to the court of Ptolemy after the battle of Pharsalia, Photinus advised his master not to receive him, but to put him to death. His advice was strictly followed. Julius Cæsar some time after visited Egypt, and Photinus raised seditions against him, for which he was put to death. When Cæsar triumphed over Egypt and Alexandria, the pictures of Photinus, and of some of the Egyptians, were carried in the procession at Rome. Plut.

PHOTIUS, a patriarch of Constantinople in the 9th century. He was of a noble family, and enjoyed the reputation of being the most learned and accomplished man of his age. His elevation to the patriarchal office caused a great schism. The emperor Basilus ex-pelled him, an act which was confirmed by a council summoned for that purpose, who pro-nounced an anathema as well as a deposition against him. He was afterwards restored to favour, but was a second time deposed by Leo in 886, and confined in a monastery where he died. He wrote Myrobiblon or Bibliotheca, a work containing an abstract and critical judgment of 280 writers in various departments of literature, of many of whom no other relic remains. The best edition is that printed at Rouen in 1653. He was the author likewise of a work called Nomocanon, or a collection of the canons of the church, printed with the commentaries of Balsamon at Paris in 1615, and also of a collection of letters printed by Montagu in 1651. But his most valuable work is the Lexicon, which has only reached us in an imperfect and mutilated state. The various MSS. of this work in different libraries on the continent of Europe are mere transcripts from each other, and originally from the valuable one belonging to the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, England. This manuscript belonged originally to Gale. Bentley, Ruhnken, and Burman 2d, have given it celebrity by their quotations. Porson at last undertook to copy and publish it, but his death prevented the execution of this project. Porson's labours were finally given to the world in 1822, in 2 vols 8vo. by Dobree, whose name, however, does not appear in the work. This edition, notwithstanding all that has been said of it, is greatly injured by want of typographical accuracy; the addenda and corrigenda occupy forty-four pages. Still it is better than the edition of Hermann which was published at Leipzig in 1808 in 2 vols. 4to. Hermann followed two very incorrect manuscripts. The lexicon of Photius is compiled from Harpocration, the scholiasts on Plato, and from lexicons of the Dramatic and Rhetorical writers. There are two considerable lacunæ; one, from the word ἀδικησις to επωνυμος, the other, from φορταος to ψιλεις.]

PHRAATES, 1st. a king of Parthia, who succeeded Arsaces the 3d, called also Phriapatius. He made war against Antiochus, king of Syria, and was defeated in three successive battles. He left many children behind him, but as they were all too young, and unable to succeed to the throne, he appointed his brother Mithridates king, of whose abilities and military prudence he had often been a spectator. Justin. 41, c. 5.—The 2d, succeeded his father Mithridates as king of Parthia, and made war against the Scythians, whom he called to his assistance against Antiochus king of Syria, and whom he refused to pay, on the pretence that they came too late. He was murdered by some Greek mercenaries, who had been once his captives, and who had enlisted in his army, B. C. 129. Justin. 42, c. 1.—Plut. in Pomp.—The 3d, succeeded his father Pacorus on the throne of Parthia, and gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tigranes, the son of Tigranes king of Armenia. Soon after he invaded the kingdom of Armenia to make his son-in-law sit on the throne of his father. His expedition was attended with ill success. He renewed a treaty of alliance which his father had made with the Romans. At his return to Parthia, he was assassinated by his sons Orodes and Mithridates. Justin.—

The 4th, was nominated king of Parthia by his father Orodes, whom he soon after murdered, as also his own brothers. He made war against M. Antony with great success, and obliged him to retire with much loss. Some time after he was dethroned by the Parthian nobility, but he soon regained his power, and drove away the usurper called Tiridates. The usurper claimed the protection of Augustus, the Roman emperor, and Phraates sent ambassadors to Rome to plead his cause, and gain the favour of his powerful judge. He was successful in his embassy: he made a treaty of peace and alliance with the Roman emperor, restored the ensigns and standards which the Parthians had taken from Crassus and Antony, and gave up his four sons with their wives as hostages, till his engagements were performed. Some suppose that Phraates delivered his children into the hands of Augustus to be confined at Rome, that he might reign with greater security, as he knew his subjects would revolt as soon as they found any one of his family inclined to countenance their rebellion, though at the same time, they scorned to support the interest of any usurper who was not of the royal house of the Arsacidæ. He was, however, at last murdered by one of his concubines, who placed her son call Phraates, on the throne. Val. Max. 7, c. 6.—Justin. 42, c. 5.—*Diod. PHRAATICES, a son of Phraates 4th. He, with his mother, murdered his father, and took possession of the vacant throne. His reign was short; he was deposed by his subjects whom he had offended by cruelty, avarice, and oppression.

PHRAHATES, the same as Phraates. vid. Phraates.

PHRAORTES, succeeded his father Deioces on the throne of Media. He made war against the neighbouring nations, and conquered the greatest part of Asia. He was defeated and killed in a battle by the Assyrians, after a reign of 22 years, B. C. 625. His son Cyaxares succeeded him. It is supposed that the Arphaxad mentioned in Judith is Phraortes. Paus.—Herodot. 1, c. 102.

[PHRYCŌNIS, a more ancient name for Cumæ in Æolia. According to Strabo, the early settlers from Locris established themselves for a considerable space of time in the vicinity of Mount Phrykios. Hence they gave to the new state, when they had founded it, the name of Phryconis.]

PHRIXUS, a river of Argolis. There was also a small town of that name in Elis, built by the Minyæ. Herodot. 4, c. 148.

PHRONĪMA, a daughter of Etearchus, king of Crete. She was delivered to a servant to be thrown into the sea, by order of her father, at the instigation of his second wife. The servant was unwilling to murder the child, but as he was bound by an oath to throw her into the sea, he accordingly let her down into the water by a rope, and took her out again unhurt. Phronima was afterwards in the number of the concubines of Polymnestus, by whom she became mother of Battus, the founder of Cyrene. Herodot. 4, c. 154.

PHRYGIUS, a river of Asia Minor, dividing Phrygia from Caria, and falling into the Hellespont. Paus.

PHRYGIA, [a large country of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Bithynia and Galatia, on the west by a part of Mysia, by Lydia, and a part of Caria, on the south by Lycia, Pisidia, and Isauria, and on the east by Cappadocia. It received the appellation of Major to distinguish it from a part of Mysia near the Hellespont, which was occupied by some Phrygians after the Trojan war, and by them called Phrygia Minor; whence it appears that the term Phrygians is applied improperly, or else by anticipation, to the Trojans in Virgil.] It received its name from the Bryges, a nation of Thrace or Macedonia, who came to settle there, and from their name, by corruption, arose the word Phrygia. The most remarkable towns were Laodice, Hierapolis, and Synnada. The inventions of the pipe of reeds, and of all sorts of needle-work, is attributed to the inhabitants, who are represented by some authors as stubborn, but yielding to correction (hence Phryx verberatus melior), as imprudent, effeminate, servile, and voluptuous; and to this Virgil seems to allude, Æn. 9, v. 617. The Phrygians, like all other nations, were called barbarians by the Greeks; their music (Phrygii cantus) was of a grave and solemn nature, when opposed to the brisker and more cheerful Lydian airs. Mela, 1, c. 19.—Strab. 2, &c.—*Ovid. PHYRNE, a celebrated prostitute, who flourished at Athens about 328 years before the Christian era. She was mistress to Praxiteles who drew her picture. [vid. Praxiteles.] This was one of his best pieces, and it was placed in the temple of Apollo at Delphi. It is said that Apelles painted his Venus Anadyomene after he had seen Phryne on the sea-shore naked, and with dishevelled hair. Phryne became so rich by the liberality of her lovers, that she offered to rebuild, at her own expense, Thebes, which Alexander had destroyed, provided this inscription was placed on the walls: "Alexander destroyed, and the harlot Phryne restored." This was refused. Plin. 34, c. 8.—There was also another of the same name, who was accused of impiety. When she saw that she was going to be condemned, she unveiled her bosom, which so influenced her judges that she was immediately acquitted. Quintil. 2, c. 15.

PHRYNICHUS, [a Greek sophist, a native of Bithynia, who flourished in the reign of Marcus Antoninus and Commodus. Two works are attributed to him, viz. Apparatus Sophisticus, and Lectiones Atticæ. There is extant an abridgment of the latter, which was printed at Rome in 1517.]—A tragic poet of Athens, disciple to Thespis. He was the first who introduced a female character on the stage. [The characters of females were always played by males on the ancient stage: it would have been more correct therefore to have said that Phrynichus was the first who introduced a female mask. In some of his pieces the chorus very probably was composed of female characters thus represented. The tragedies of this poet were remarkable for the frequent dances that were intermingled with them. He himself taught the art. Phrynichus composed among others a tragedy which Themistocles caused to be represented with great magnificence, and which bore away the prize. The memory of this event was perpetuated by an inscription. The tragedy was probably "the Phœnicians," or "the Persians." His piece entitled "the taking of Miletus" made such an impression upon the audience at Athens, that the Athenians actually condemned the poet to pay a fine for having opened anew so deep a national wound, and one so dishonourable to the Greeks. Suidas, however, attributes this piece to another Phrynichus, but Bentley has shown that only one poet of the name composed tragedies.]—[A comic poet, anterior to Aristophanes.] Strab. 14.—A comic poet.

PHYRINO, a musician of Mitylene, the first who obtained a musical prize at the Panathenæa at Athens. He added two strings to the lyre, which had always been used with seven by all his predecessors, B. C. 438. It is said that he was originally a cook at the house of Hiero, king of Sicily.—A writer in the reign of Commodus, who made a collection in 36 books, of phrases and sentences from the best Greek authors, &c.

PHYRNO, a celebrated general of Athens, who died B. C. 590.

PHYRXYUS, a son of Athamas, king of Thebes, by Nephele. After the repudiation of his mother, he was persecuted with the most inveterate fury by his step-mother Ino, because he was to sit on the throne of Athamas, in preference to the children of a second wife. He was apprized of Ino's intentions upon his life by his mother Nephele, or, according to others, by his preceptor; and the better to make his escape, he secured part of his father's treasures, and privately left Bœotia with his sister Helle, to go to their friend and relation Æetes, king of Colchis. They embarked on board a ship, or, according to the fabulous account of the poets and mythologists, they mounted on the back of a ram whose fleece was of gold, and proceeded on their journey through the air. The height to which they were carried made Helle giddy, and she fell into the sea. Phryxus gave her a decent burial on the sea-shore, and after he had called the place Hellespont from her name, he continued his flight, and arrived safe in the kingdom of Æetes, where he offered the ram on the altar of Mars. The king received him with great tenderness.

and gave him his daughter Chalciopé in marriage. She had by him Phrontis, Melias, Argos, Cylindrus, whom some call Cytorus, Catis, Lorus, and Hellen. Some time after he was murdered by his father-in-law, who envied him the possession of the golden fleece; and Chalciopé, to prevent her children from sharing their father's fate, sent them privately from Colchis to Bœotia, as nothing was to be dreaded there from the jealousy or resentment of Ino, who was then dead. The fable of the flight of Phryxus to Colchis on a ram has been explained by some, who observe, that the ship on which he embarked was either called by that name or carried on her prow the figure of that animal. The fleece of gold is explained by recollecting that Phryxus carried away immense treasures from Thebes. Phryxus was placed among the constellations of heaven after death. The ram which carried him to Asia is said to have been the fruit of Neptune's amour with Theophane, the daughter of Altiis. This ram had been given to Athamas by the gods, to reward his piety and religious life, and Nephele procured it for her children just as they were going to be sacrificed to the jealousy of Ino. The murder of Phryxus was some time after amply revenged by the Greeks. It gave rise to a celebrated expedition which was achieved under Jason and many of the princes of Greece, and which had for its object the recovery of the golden fleece, and the punishment of the king of Colchis for his cruelty to the son of Athamas. Diod. 4.—Herodot 7, c. 197.—*Apollon. PHYLLIS, a daughter of Sithon, or, according to others, of Lycurgus, king of Thrace, who hospitably received Demophoon the son of Theseus, who, at his return from the Trojan war, had stopped on her coasts. She became enamoured of him, and did not find him insensible to her passion. After some months of mutual tenderness and affection, Demophoon set sail for Athens, whither his domestic affairs recalled him. He promised faithfully to return as soon as a month was expired; but either his dislike for Phyllis, or the irreparable situation of his affairs, obliged him to violate his engagement, and the queen, grown desperate on account of his absence, hanged herself, or, according to others, threw herself down a precipice into the sea, and perished. Her friends raised a tomb over her body, where there grew up certain trees, whose leaves, at a particular season of the year, suddenly became wet, as if shedding tears for the death of Phyllis. According to an old tradition mentioned by Servius, Virgil's commentator, Phyllis was changed by the gods into an almond-tree, which is called Phylla by the Greeks. Some days after this metamorphosis, Demophoon re-visited Thrace, and when he heard of the fate of Phyllis, he ran and clasped the tree, which, though at that time stripped of its leaves, suddenly shot forth and blossomed, as if still sensible of tenderness and love. The absence of Demophoon from the house of Phyllis has given rise to a beautiful epistle of Ovid, supposed to have been written by the Thracian queen about the fourth month after her lover's departure. *Ovid. PICTÆ, or PICTI, a people of Scythia, called also Agathyræ. They received this name from their painting their bodies with different colours, to appear more terrible in the eyes of their enemies. A colony of these, according to Servius, Virgil's commentator, emigrated to the northern parts of Britain, where they still preserved their name and their savage manners, but they are mentioned only by latter writers. [This remark of Servius is altogether incorrect. To say nothing of the utter impossibility of such a migration, it is sufficient to observe, that the Scythian race to whom he alludes were properly called Agathyræ, and the term picci is merely applied to them by the Latin poets from the circumstance of their painting their bodies to look more terrible in fight. The Picts were a Caledonian race, first mentioned under this denomination in a panegyric of Eumenius, A. D. 297. Various derivations have been assigned for their name. The simplest appears to be, that the original native term was Picithi, which was latinized into Picti, or "painted," which had in fact the same meaning.] Marcell. 27, c. 18.—Claudiam. de Hon. cons. v. 54.—Plin. 4, c. 12.—Mela, 2, c. 1.

PICUMNUS, and PILUMNUS, two deities at Rome who presided over the auspices that were required before the celebration of nuptials. Pilumnus was supposed to patronize children, as his name seems in some manner to indicate, quod pellat mala infantia. The manuring of lands was first invented by Picumnus, from which reason he is called Sterquilinius. Pilumnus is also invoked as the god of bakers and millers, as he is said to have first invented how to grind corn. Turnus boasted of being one of his lineal descendants. Virg. Æn. 9, v. 4.—Varro.

PICUS, a king of Latium, son of Saturn, who married Venilia, who is also called Canens, by whom he had Faunus. He was tenderly loved by the goddess Pomona, and he returned a mutual affection. As he was one day hunting in the woods, he was met by Circe, who became deeply enamoured of him, and who changed him into a woodpecker, called by the name of picus among the Latins. His wife Venilia was so disconsolate when she was informed of his death that she pined away. Some suppose that Picus was the son of Pilumnus, and that he gave out prophecies to his subjects by means of a favourite woodpecker, from which circumstance originated the fable of his being metamorphosed into a bird. Virg. Æn. 7, v. 48, 171, &c.—Ovid. Met. 14, v. 320, &c.

PIERIA, a small track of country in Macedonia, [to the west of the Sinus Thermaicus, and bordering on Thessaly,] from which the epithet of Pierian was applied to the Muses and to poetical compositions. [According to some, the Muses were born here; others suppose that they derived the name of Pierides from Mount Pierus in this district, which was called after Pierus mentioned below.]—[The city of Seleucia in Syria was surnamed Pieria, because situate at the foot of Mount Pierus, which mountain was so called by the Macedonians after the one in their native country. Martial. 9, ep. 88, v. 3.—Horat. 4, od. 8, v. 20.

PIERIDES, a name given to the Muses, either because they were born in Pieria in Thessaly, or because they were supposed by some to be the daughters of Pierus, a king of Macedonia, who settled in Bœotia.—Also the daughters of Pierus, who challenged the Muses to a trial in music, in which they were conquered and changed into magpies. It may perhaps be supposed that the victorious Muses assumed the name of the conquered daughters of Pierus, and ordered themselves to be called Pierides, in the same manner as Minerva was called Pallas, because she had killed the giant Pallas. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 300.

PIERUS, a mountain of Macedonia, sacred to the Muses, who were from thence, as some imagine, called Pierides.—A king of Macedonia, whose nine daughters, called Pierides, challenged the Muses, and were changed into magpies when conquered. PINARIUS and POTITIUS, two old men of Arcadia, who came with Evander to Italy. They were instructed by Hercules, who visited the court of Evander, how they were to offer sacrifices to his divinity, in the morning and in the evening, immediately at sun-set. The morning sacrifice they punctually performed, but on the evening Potitius was obliged to offer the sacrifice alone, as Pinarius neglected to come till after the appointed time. This negligence offended Hercules, and he ordered, that for the future, Pinarius and his descendants should preside over the sacrifices, but that Potitius, with his posterity, should wait upon the priests as servants, when the sacrifices were annually offered to him on Mount Aventine. This was religiously observed till the age of Appius Claudius, who persuaded the Potitii by a large bribe, to discontinue their sacred office, and to have the ceremony performed by slaves. For this negligence, as the Latin authors observe, the Potitii were deprived of sight, and the family became a little time after totally extinct. Liv. 1, c. 7.—*Virg. PINCUM, a town of Mœsia Superior, now Gradisca.

PINDARUS, a celebrated lyric poet of Thebes. [He was born, according to Boeckh, in the 3d year of the 64th Olympiad, 522 A. C. This was the most glorious period in the history of Greece, and Pindar was accustomed to regard the circumstance as a great favour on the part of the Gods. It was to testify his gratitude for this kindness that the poet was in the habit of visiting Delphi at every celebration of the Pythian games, and chaunting a pæan to Apollo.] He was carefully trained from his earliest years to the study of music and poetry, and he was taught how to compose verses with elegance and simplicity, by Myrtis and Corinna. [Lasus and Simonides were also his instructors.] When he was young, it is said that a swarm of bees settled on his lips, and there left some honey-combs as he reposed on the grass. This was universally explained as a prognostic of his future greatness and celebrity, and indeed he seemed entitled to notice when he had conquered Myrtis in a musical contest. He was not, however, so successful against Corinna, who obtained five times, while he was competitor, a poetical prize, which, according to some, was adjudged rather to the charms of her person than to the brilliancy of her genius, or the superiority of her composition. In the public assemblies of Greece, where females were not permitted to contend, Pindar was rewarded with the prize in preference to every other competitor; and, as the conquerors at Olympia were the subject of his compositions, the poet was courted by statesmen and princes. His hymns and pæans were repeated before the most crowded assemblies in the temples of Greece; and the priestess of Delphi declared that it was the will of Apollo that Pindar should receive the half of all the first fruit offerings that were annually heaped on his altars. This was not the only public honour which he received; after his death he was honoured with every mark of respect, even to adoration. His statue was erected at Thebes in the public place where the games were exhibited, and six centuries after, it was viewed with pleasure and admiration by the geographer Pausanias. The honours which had been paid to him while alive were also shared by his posterity; and, at the celebration of one of the festivals of the Greeks, a portion of the victim which had been offered in a sacrifice was reserved for the descendants of the poet. Even the most inveterate enemies of the Thebans showed regard for his memory, and the Spartans spared the house in which the prince of lyrics had inhabited when they destroyed the houses and the walls of Thebes. The same respect was also paid him by Alexander the Great when Thebes was reduced to ashes. It is said that Pindar died at the advanced age of 86, B. C. 435. The greatest parts of his works have perished. He had written some hymns to the gods, poems in honour of Apollo, dithyrambs to Bacchus, and odes on several victories obtained, at the four greatest festivals of the Greeks, the Olympic, Isthmian, Pythian, and Nemean games. Of all these, the odes are the only compositions extant, admired for sublimity of sentiments, grandeur of expression, energy and magnificence of style, boldness of metaphors, harmony of numbers, and elegance of diction. In these odes, which were repeated with the aid of musical instruments, and accompanied by the various inflections of the voice, with suitable attitudes and proper motions of body, the poet has not merely celebrated the place where the victory was won, but has introduced beautiful episodes, and by unfolding the greatness of his heroes, the dignity of their characters, and the glory of the several republics where they flourished, he has rendered the whole truly beautiful, and in the highest degree interesting. Horace has not hesitated to call Pindar inimitable; and this panegyric will not perhaps appear too offensive, when we recollect that succeeding critics have agreed in extolling his beauties, his excellence, the fire, animation, and enthusiasm of his genius. He has been censured for his affectation in composing an ode, from which the letter S was excluded. The Lyric effusions of Pindar were various and extensive. He composed Παρθενιαί, or songs to be chaunted by choirs of virgins; Θηνοι, or pieces of an elegiac cast; Υπορχηματα, or songs accompanied with music and dancing; Προσοδιαί, or odes in honour of the gods, chaunted in religious processions; and numerous others. Of these pieces we have only some few fragments left: but there are remaining to us forty-five hymns or "Songs of Victory," Επινικια ασματα, composed in honour of the conquerors who had borne away the prizes at the different games of Greece, and of the deities to whom these celebrations were respectively consecrated. These Hymns or Odes, such as they have reached our times, are divided into four sections or kinds: 1st

Olympic Songs or Hymns, to the number of fourteen : 2nd. Pythian Victories, to the number of twelve : 3d. Nemean Victories, eleven in number ; and 4th. Isthmian Victories, amounting to eight. This division, however, is not that of the poet himself. In their primitive form, the poems of Pindar contained effusions of all kinds, pæans, songs of victory, songs for banquets, and pieces of a plaintive nature, which we might denominate elegies, if the usage had not prevailed among the Greeks of applying this latter title to a species of poetical productions confined to a certain and determinate rhythm, which, very probably, was different from that employed by Pindar in his plaintive poems. We owe the modern arrangement to Aristophanes of Byzantium. This grammarian selected, out of the general collection which has just been mentioned, a certain number of pieces that had reference more or less to victories gained at the several games of Greece. It did not suffice in the eyes of this critic that an ode should celebrate some victory gained in these assemblies, in order to be judged worthy of a place in his selection ; for there are fragments remaining of the poems of Pindar which have direct allusion to such subjects, and yet were excluded by Aristophanes. On the other hand, we find in the selection made by him, one ode having no reference to any particular victory, namely, the second Pythian, as well as some others which, though they celebrate high deeds of martial prowess, contain no mention whatever of those peculiar exploits of which the four great national celebrations of the Hellenic race were respectively the theatres. The triumph of the conquerors at the public games was celebrated on the same evening that succeeded the contest ; and, as it was difficult, very probably, to find on every such occasion poets possessing a sufficient readiness and fertility of talent to extemporize on these themes, it would seem that the individuals charged with the celebration of these festivals committed to memory a certain number of odes which might apply equally well to all conquerors. Among the poems of Pindar there are perhaps some that may be ranked in this class. A second festival was prepared for the victor, and one possessing most charms for him, because his family, his friends, his fellow-citizens, and the companions of his earlier days, bore a part in it. It was that which awaited him on his approach to his native city. Many of the odes of Pindar were composed for such solemnities. There are likewise some odes in the selection made by Aristophanes, which could only have been written a long time after the event they celebrate : a circumstance which proves that the remembrance of these victories was kept alive by periodic celebrations. In the odes destined for such a use, the exploit of the victor is scarcely mentioned, and the poet indulges in the most extended license by singing the praises of the ancestry of the conqueror, or of the place which gave him birth. That Pindar, loaded with honours and presents at the courts of Hiero and Theron, should have employed his poetic talents in singing the praises of these monarchs, affords no subject of surprise ; but the question is often put respecting the motive which could have actuated the poet in devoting his abilities to the immortalizing of obscure individuals, who would otherwise have always remained unknown. What renders this enquiry a more interesting one for us, is the circumstance of Pindar having been charged, from certain passages in his odes, with mercenary motives in celebrating certain individuals. To this it may be replied that, in some of his odes, Pindar does in fact name the friend or friends of the victor who had incited the poet to the task ; or, to use his own expressive language, had "harnessed for the conqueror the chariot of the Muses." Every conqueror, however, did not possess friends equally generous : in ordinary cases, therefore, it would appear, that the magistrates who presided over the games were accustomed to establish a competition among such poets as might feel inclined to furnish a poem on such a theme, and that Pindar disdained not to take part in these poetic contests, which were both lucrative and honourable. The odes of which we have been speaking were sung by chorusses composed of men somewhat advanced in life, as well as, on certain occasions, of young men trained up to this office. As Pindar seems to have taken up the celebrating the victories at the games as a particular profession, it has been supposed by some, that, like the tragic poets, he had a chorus in his pay whom he transported with him to the different games of Greece. The recitation of these odes took place as the procession was moving to a temple in order to return thanks to the gods ; it was one of the last things done at the festival, which immediately after was terminated by a banquet. If some of the odes of Pindar were sung at banquets, it was not at the one given on the close of the games of which we have just spoken, but at that given to the victorious champion by his friends and relatives on his return to his home. This, however, could not have happened often, since the odes of Pindar have too solemn a character, and we may add too public a one, to allow us to suppose that they were destined for celebrations in private abodes. In reading the odes of Pindar we are struck with the grave and serious tone which pervades them : oftentimes they rise to the loftiest aspirations of prayer and enthusiastic emotion. Composed, not to be read in the closet, but to be recited, declaimed, chaunted before a numerous assembly, they breathe that dignified spirit which belongs to public memorials and national spectacles. The regular alternate succession of strophes, antistrophes, and epodes, gives them somewhat of a majestic character. They partake of the Epic spirit in that the poet, when he celebrates the praises of the conqueror, connects with his subject the mention of his family, his ancestry, and native land; their principal character, however, is the lyric, and here most of all the genius of the poet reigns triumphant. If we examine these poems in order to deduce from them the personal character of the individual who composed them, we are somewhat startled by a circumstance altogether at variance with the customs, and we may add, the hypocrisy of our own age: we refer to that feeling of pride with which Pindar proclaims himself the first of poets, and the disdain which he expresses for his rivals and those jealous of his fame, comparing them to crows contending against the eagle. This is the frankness of genius. The enthusiasm which wrests from him the avowal of his own superiority saves him from the suspicion of vanity. It is the god who inspires him that speaks by the mouth of the poet. Pindar is one of the most religious and moral of poets. His respect for the deity is unbounded; his gratitude knows no limits. Every where he sings the praises of just dealing, of virtue, and friendship. But, on the other hand, it must be conceded that the poet manifests too openly his love of riches. Indeed, he takes no pains whatever to conceal this. He considers no mortal happy unto whom the gods have not given an abundance of wealth. Much of this, however, is characteristic of the age in which he lived, and must not be exclusively assigned to the poet who utters it. As regards the style of Pindar, it is commonly said that he made use of the Doric dialect. Hermann, however, has shown that the basis of his diction is the Epic, but that he employs Doric forms as often as they appear more expressive, or are better adapted to the metre which he employs. Sometimes he gives the preference to Æolic forms, which was his native dialect. Hermann remarks that the verses of Pindar abound in hiatus, without there being any appearance of his having used the Digamma, which, in his days, had partially disappeared from the Æolic dialect, and which Alcæus and Sappho had scarcely employed. After the example of the ancient poets, he makes the vowel long which is followed by a mute and liquid. The remark of Hermann respecting the mixture of dialects in Pindar has been adopted by Boëckh, the latest editor of the poet, who observes that the copyists have frequently removed the Doricisms from the Olympic odes, while they have been preserved more carefully in the other works of the poet. The best editions of Pindar are, that of Heyne, Lips. 1817, 3 vols. 8vo. and that of Boëckh, Lips. 1811-21, 3 vols. 4to. This last is an admirable one. PIRÆUS, or PIRÆËUS, [a celebrated and capacious harbour of Athens, at some distance from it, but joined to it by long walls, called ακκρε τοίχον. The southern wall was built by Themistocles, and was 35 stadia long, and 40 cubits high: this height was but half of what Themistocles designed. The northern was built by Pericles, its height the same as the former, its length 40 stadia. Both of these walls were sufficiently broad on the top to admit of two waggons passing each other. The stones were of an enormous size, joined together without any cement, but with clamps of iron and lead, which, with their own weight, easily sufficed to unite walls even of so great a height as 40 cubits, (60 feet.) Upon both of the walls a great number of turrets were erected, which were turned into dwelling-houses, when the Athenians became so numerous that the city was not large enough to contain them. The wall which encompassed the Munychia, and joined it to the Piræus, was 60 stadia, and the exterior wall on the other side of the city was 43 stadia in length. Athens had three harbours, of which the Piræus was by far the largest. East of it was the second one, called Munychia, and still farther east the third, called Phalerus, the least frequented of the three. The entrance of the Piræus was narrow, being contracted by two projecting promontories. Within, however, it was very capacious, and contained three large basins or ports, named Cautharos, Aphrodisus, and Zea. The first was called after an ancient hero, the second after Venus, the third from the term Zea, signifying bread-corn. The Piræus is said to have been capable of containing 300 ships. The walls which joined it to Athens, with all its fortifications, were totally demolished when Lysander put an end to the Peloponnesian war by the reduction of Attica. They were rebuilt by Conon, with the money supplied by the Persian commander Pharnabazus, after the defeat of the Lacedæmonians in the battle off the Arginusæ insulæ. In after days the Piræus suffered greatly from Sylla, who demolished the walls and set fire to the armoury and arsenals. It must not be imagined, however, that the Piræus was a mere harbour. It was in fact a city of itself, abounding with temples, porticoes, and other magnificent structures. Little, however, remains of its former splendour. According to Hobhouse, nothing now is left to lead one to suppose that it was ever a large and flourishing port. The ancient Zea is a marsh, and Cantharus of but little depth. The deepest water is at the mouth of the ancient Aphrodisus. He adds, that the ships of the ancients must have been extremely small if 300 could be contained within the Piræus, since he saw an Hydriote merchant vessel, of about 200 tons, at anchor in the port, which appeared too large for the station, and an English sloop of war was warned that she would run aground if she attempted to enter, and was therefore compelled to anchor in the straits between Salamis and the port once called Phoron. The Piræus is now called Porto Leone, from the figure of a stone lion with which it was anciently adorned, and which was carried away by the Venetians.] Paus. 1, c. 1.—Strab. 9.—*C. PIRÈNE, a daughter of Ebalus, or, according to others, of the Achelous. She had by Neptune two sons, called Leches and Cenchrius, who gave their name to two of the harbours of Corinth. Pirene was so disconsolate at the death of her son Cenchrius, who had been killed by Diana, that she pined away, and was dissolved by her continual weeping into a fountain of the same name, which was still seen at Corinth in the age of Pausanias. The fountain Pirene was sacred to the Muses, and, according to some, the horse Pegasus was then drinking some of its waters when Bellerophon took it to go and conquer the Chimæra. Paus. 2, c. 3.—Ovid. Met. 2, v. 240.

PIRITHOÛS, a son of Ixion and the cloud, or, according to others, of Dia the daughter of Deioneus. Some make him son of Dia, by Jupiter, who assumed the shape of a horse whenever he paid his addresses to his mistress. He was king of the Lapithæ, and, as an ambitious prince he wished to become acquainted with Theseus, king of Athens, of whose fame and exploits he had heard so many reports. To see him, and at the same time to be a witness of his valour, he resolved to invade his territories with an army. Theseus immediately met him on the borders of Attica, but at the sight of one another the two enemies did not begin the engagement, but, struck with the appearance of each other, they stepped between the hostile armies. Their meeting was like that of the most cordial friends, and Pirithous, by giving Theseus his hand as a pledge of his sincerity, promised to repair all the damages which his hostilities in Attica might have occasioned. From that time, therefore, the two monarchs became the most intimate and the most attached of friends, so much that their friendship, like that of Orestes and Pylades, is become proverbial. Pirithous some time after married Hippodamia, and invited not only the heroes of his age, but also the gods themselves, and his neighbours the Centaurs, to celebrate his nuptials. Mars was the only one of the gods who was not invited, and, to punish this neglect, the god of war was determined to raise a quarrel among the guests and to disturb the festivity of the entertainment. Eurythion, captivated with the beauty of Hippodamia, and intoxicated with wine, attempted to offer violence to the bride, but he was prevented by Theseus, and immediately killed. This irritated the rest of the Centaurs, the contest became general, but the valour of Theseus, Pirithous, Hercules, and the rest of the Lapithæ, triumphed over their enemies. Many of the Centaurs were slain, and the rest saved their lives by flight. [vid. Lapithus.] The death of Hippodamia left Pirithous very disconsolate, and he resolved, with his friend Theseus, who had likewise lost his wife, never to marry again, except to a goddess, or one of the daughters of the gods. This determination occasioned the rape of Hellen by the two friends; the lot was drawn, and it fell to the share of Theseus to have the beautiful prize. Pirithous upon this undertook with his friend to carry away Proserpine and to marry her. They descended into the infernal regions, but Pluto, who was apprized of their machinations to disturb his conjugal peace, stopped the two friends and confined them there. Pirithous was tied to his father's wheel, or, according to Hyginus, he was delivered to the furies to be continually tormented. His punishment, however, was short, and when Hercules visited the kingdom of Pluto, he obtained from Proserpine the pardon of Pirithous, and brought him back to his kingdom safe and unhurt. Some suppose that he was torn to pieces by the dog Cerberus. [vid. Theseus.] Ovid. Met. 12, fab. 4 and 5.—Hesiod. in Scut. Her.—*Homer. PISA, a town of Elis on the Alpheus, founded by Pisis the son of Perieres, and grandson of Æolus. Its inhabitants accompanied Nestor to the Trojan war, and they enjoyed long the privilege of presiding at the Olympic games which were celebrated near their city. This honourable appointment was envied by the people of Elis, who made war against the Pisæans, and after many bloody battles took their city and totally demolished it. [Even after its destruction, however, the district in which it had been situate bore the name of Pisatis.] It was at Pisa that Cœnomaus murdered the suitors of his daughter, and that he himself was conquered by Pelops. The inhabitants were called Pisæi. Some have doubted the existence of such a place as Pisa, but this doubt originates from Pisa's having been destroyed in so remote an age. The horses of Pisa were famous. The year in which the Olympic games were celebrated was often called Pisæus annus, and the victory which was obtained there was called Pisææ ramus olivæ. vid. Olympia. Strab. 8.

PISÆ, a town of Etruria, [at the mouth of the Arnus,] built by a colony from Pisa in the Peloponnesus. The inhabitants were called Pisani. Dionysius of Halicarnassus affirms that it existed before the Trojan war, but others support that it was built by a colony of Pisæans who were shipwrecked on the coast of Etruria at their return from the Trojan war. [According to Strabo, these Pisæans formed a part of the army of Nestor. Some of them were carried to Metapontum; the majority, however, to the mouth of the Arnus.] Pisæ was once a very powerful and flourishing city, which conquered the Baleares, together with Sardinia and Corsica. [The power and greatness of Pisa, as a mighty and victorious republic, belong rather to modern history. The 10th, 11th, 12th, and a great part of the 13th centuries, formed the era of her national prosperity. Her numerous fleets were triumphant on the Mediterranean, and her fame not only eclipsed that of her Grecian parent, but even rivalled the achievements of all the cities of Peloponnesus united. The usurpation of domestic tyrants, however, first broke the spirit of her citizens, and next the victories of the Genoese. The intrigues of the Medici completed her downfall.] The sea on the neighbouring coast was called the bay of Pisæ. *Virg. PISANDER, a son of Bellerophon killed by the Solymi.—A son of Antimachus killed by Agamemnon during the Trojan war. He had recourse to entreaties and promises, but in vain, as the Grecian wished to resent the advice of Antimachus, who opposed the restoration of Helen. Homer. Il. 11, v. 123.—An admiral of the Spartan fleet during the Peloponnesian war. He abolished the democracy at Athens, and established the aristocratical government of the four hundred tyrants. He was killed in a naval battle by Conon, the Athenian general, near Cnidus, in which the Spartans lost 50 galleys, B. C. 394. Diod.—A poet of Rhodes, who composed a poem called Heraclea, in which he gave an account of all the labours and all the exploits of Hercules. He was the first who ever represented his hero armed with a club. Paus. 3, c. 22.

PISÄTES, or PISÆI, the inhabitants of Pisa in the Peloponnesus.

PISAURUS, now Foglia, a river of Picenum, with a town called Pisaurum, now Pesaro, which became a Roman colony in the consulship of Claudius Pulcher. The town was destroyed by an earthquake in the beginning of the reign of Augustus. Mela, 2, c. 4.—Catull. 82.—Plin. 3.—Liv. 39, c. 44, l. 41, c. 27.

between Phrygia, Lycia, Pamphylia, Cilicia, and Isauria. It was rich and fertile. The inhabitants were called Pisidæ. Cic. de Div. 1, c. 1.—Mela, 1, c. 2.—Strab. 12.—Liv. 37, c. 54 and 55.

PISISTRATIDÆ, the descendants of Pisis-tratu-, tyrant of Athens. vid. Pisis-tratus.

PISISTRÄTIDES, a man sent as ambassador to the king of Persia by the Spartans.

PISISTRÄTUS, an Athenian, son of Hippocrates, who early distinguished himself by his valour in the field and by his address and eloquence at home. After he had rendered himself the favourite of the populace by his liberality and by the intrepidity with which he had fought their battles, particularly near Salamis, he resolved to make himself master of his country. Every thing seemed favourable to his views; but Solon alone, who was then at the head of affairs, and who had lately instituted his celebrated laws, opposed him and discovered his duplicity and artful behaviour before the public assembly. Pisis-tratus was not disheartened by the measures of his relation Solon, but he had recourse to artifice. In returning from his country-house, he cut himself in various places, and after he had exposed his mangled body to the eyes of the populace, deplored his misfortunes, and accused his enemies of attempts upon his life, because he was the friend of the people, the guardian of the poor, and the reliever of the oppressed. He claimed a chosen body of 50 men from the populace to defend his person in future from the malevolence and the cruelty of his enemies. The unsuspecting people unanimously granted his request, though Solon opposed it with all his influence; and Pisis-tratus had no sooner received this band, on whose fidelity and attachment he could rely, than he seized the citadel of Athens and made himself absolute. The people too late perceived their credulity; yet, though the tyrant was popular, two of the citizens, Megacles and Lycurgus, conspired against him, and by their means he was forcibly ejected from the city. His house and all his effects were exposed to sale, but there was found in Athens only one man who would buy them. The private dissensions of the friends of liberty proved favourable to the expelled tyrant, and Megacles, who was jealous of Lycurgus, secretly promised to restore Pisis-tratus to all his rights and privileges in Athens if he would marry his daughter. Pisis-tratus consented, and by the assistance of his father-in-law, he was soon enabled to expel Lycurgus and to re-establish himself. By means of a woman called Phya, whose shape was tall, and whose features were noble and commanding, he imposed upon the people, and created himself adherents even among his enemies. Phya was conducted through the streets of the city, and showing herself subservient to the artifice of Pisis-tratus, she was announced as Minerva, the goddess of wisdom and the patroness of Athens, who was come down from heaven to re-establish her favourite Pisis-tratus in a power which was sanctioned by the will of heaven, and favoured by the affection of the people. In the midst of his triumph, however, Pisistratus found himself unsupported, and some time after, when he repudiated the daughter of Megacles, he found that not only the citizens, but even his very troops, were alienated from him by the influence, the intrigues, and the bribery of his father-in-law. He fled from Athens where he could no longer maintain his power, and retired to Eubœa. Eleven years after, he was drawn from his obscure retreat, by means of his son Hippias, and he was a third time received by the people of Athens as their master and sovereign. Upon this he sacrificed to his resentment the friends of Megacles, but he did not lose sight of the public good; and while he sought the aggrandizement of his family, he did not neglect the dignity and the honour of the Athenian name. He died about 527 years before the Christian era, after he had enjoyed the sovereign power at Athens for 33 years, including the years of his banishment, and he was succeeded by his son Hipparchus. Pisistratus claims our admiration for his justice, his liberality, and his moderation. If he was dreaded and detested as a tyrant, the Athenians loved and respected his private virtues and his patriotism as a fellow-citizen, and the opprobrium which generally falls on his head may be attributed not to the severity of his administration, but to the republican principles of the Athenians, who hated and exclaimed against the moderation and equity of the mildest sovereign, while they flattered the pride and gratified the guilty desires of the most tyrannical of their fellow-subjects. Pisistratus often refused to punish the insolence of his enemies, and when he had one day been violently accused of murder, rather than inflict immediate punishment upon the man who had criminated him, he went to the areopagus, and there convinced the Athenians that the accusations of his enemies were groundless, and that his life was irreproachable. It is to his labours that we are indebted for the preservation of the poems of Homer, and he was the first, according to Cicero, who introduced them at Athens in the order in which they now stand. He also established a public library at Athens, and the valuable books which he had diligently collected, were carried into Persia when Xerxes made himself master of the capital of Attica. Hipparchus and Hippias, the sons of Pisistratus, who have received the name of Pisistratidæ, rendered themselves as powerful as their father, but the flames of liberty were not to be extinguished. The Pisistratidæ governed with great moderation, yet the name of tyrant or sovereign was insupportable to the Athenians. Two of the most respectable of the citizens, called Harmodius and Aristogiton, conspired against them, and Hipparchus was dispatched in a public assembly. This murder was not, however, attended with any advantages; and though the two leaders of the conspiracy, who have been celebrated through every age for their patriotism, were supported by the people, yet Hippias quelled the tumult by his uncommon firmness and prudence, and for a while preserved that peace in Athens which his father had often been unable to command. This was not long to continue. Hippias was at last expelled by the united efforts of the Athenians and of their allies of Peloponnesus, and he left Attica when he found himself unable to maintain his power and independence. The rest of the family of Pisistratus followed him in his banishment, and after they had refused to accept the liberal offers of the princes of Thessaly, and the king of Macedonia, who wished them to settle in their respective territories, the Pisistratidæ retired to Sigæum, which their father had in the summit of his power conquered and bequeathed to his posterity. After the banishment of the Pisistratidæ, the Athenians became more than commonly jealous of their liberty, and often sacrificed the most powerful of their citizens, apprehensive of the influence which popularity and a well-directed liberality might gain among a fickle and unsettled populace. The Pisistratidæ were banished from Athens about 18 years after the death of Pisistratus, B. C. 510. *Ælian. V. Piso, a celebrated family at Rome which was a branch of the Calpurnian, descended from Calpus the son of Numa. Before the death of Augustus, 11 of this family had obtained the consulship, and many had been honoured with triumphs, on account of their victories, in the different provinces of the Roman empire. Of this family, the most famous were—Lucius Calpurnius, who was tribune of the people about 146 years before Christ, and afterwards consul. His frugality procured him the surname of Frugi, and he gained the greatest honours as an orator, a lawyer, a statesman, and an historian. He made a successful campaign in Sicily, and rewarded his son, who had behaved with great valour during the war, with a crown of gold, which weighed twenty pounds. He composed some annals and harangues, which were lost in the age of Cicero. His style was obscure and inelegant.—Caius, a Roman consul, A. U. C. 687, who supported the consular dignity against the tumults of the tribunes and the clamours of the people. He made a law to restrain the cabals which generally prevailed at the election of the chief magistrates.—Cneius, another consul under Augustus. He was one of the favourites of Tiberius, by whom he was appointed governor of Syria, where he rendered himself odious by his cruelty. He was accused of having poisoned Germanicus, and when he saw that he was shunned and despised by his friends, he destroyed himself. A. D. 20.

—Lucius, a governor of Spain, who was assassinated by a peasant as he was travelling through the country. The murderer was seized and tortured, but he refused to confess the causes of the murder.—Lucius, a private man, accused of having uttered seditious words against the emperor Tiberius. He was condemned, but a natural death saved him from the hands of the executioner.

—Lucius, a governor of Rome for twenty years, an office which he discharged with the greatest justice and credit. He was greatly honoured by the friendship of Augustus as well as of his successor, a distinction he deserved, both as a faithful citizen and a man of learning. Some, however, say, that Tiberius made him governor of Rome, because he had continued drinking with him a night and two days, or two days and two nights, according to Pliny. Horace dedicated his poem de Arte Poetica, to his two sons, who partiality for literature had distinguished them among the rest of the Romans, and who were fond of cultivating poetry in their leisure hours. Plut. in Cæs.—Plin. 18, c. 3.

—Cneius, a factious and turbulent youth, who conspired against his country with Catiline. He was among the friends of Julius Cæsar.—Caius, a Roman who was at the head of a celebrated conspiracy against the emperor Nero. He had rendered himself a favourite of the people by his private as well as public virtues, by the generosity of his behaviour, his fondness of pleasure with the voluptuous, and his austerity with the grave and the reserved. He had been marked by some as a proper person to succeed the emperor; but the discovery of the plot by a freed-man, who was among the conspirators, soon cut him off with all his partizans. He refused to court the affections of the people, and of the army, when the whole had been made public, and, instead of taking proper measures for his preservation, either by proclaiming himself emperor, as his friends advised, or by seeking a retreat in the distant provinces of the empire, he retired to his own house, where he opened the veins of both his arms, and bled to death.—Lucius, a senator who followed the emperor Valerian into Persia. He proclaimed himself emperor after the death of Valerian, but he was defeated and put to death a few weeks after, A. D. 261, by Valens, &c.—A son-in-law of Cicero.—A patrician, whose daughter married Julius Cæsar. Horat.—Tacit. Ann. & Hist.—Val. Max.—Liv.—Sueton.—Cic. de offic. &c.—Plut. in Cæs. &c.

PISŌNIS VILLA, a place near Baiæ in Campania, which the emperor Nero often frequented. Tacit. Ann. 1.

PISTOR, a surname given to Jupiter by the Romans, signifying baker, because when their city was taken by the Gauls, the god persuaded them to throw down loaves from the Tarpeian hill where they were besieged, that the enemy might from thence suppose that they were not in want of provisions, though in reality they were near surrendering through famine. This deceived the Gauls, and they soon after raised the siege. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 350, 394, &c.

PISTORIA, now Pistoja, a town of Etruria, at the foot of the Appenines, [north-west of Florentia, near which] Catiline was defeated. Sallust. Cat. 57.—Plin. 3, c. 4.

PITĀNE, a town of Æolia in Asia Minor, [at the mouth of the river Evenus and north-west of Pergamus.] Lucan. 3, v. 305.—Strab. 13.—Vitruv. 2, c. 3.—Mela, 1, c. 18.—Ovid. Met. 7, v. 357.

PITHECŪSA, a small island on the coast of Etruria, anciently called Ænaria and Inarime, with a town of the same name, on the top of a mountain. The frequent earthquakes to which it was subject obliged the inhabitants to leave it. There was a volcano in the middle of the island, which has given occasion to the ancients to say, that the giant Typhon was buried there. [It is in allusion to this latter circumstance that Virgil calls the island by the name of Inarime. Homer, however, makes Typhoeus to lie σ' Ἀγίμου. The name Ænaria evidently alludes to mines of metal having been found on the island, such as gold and iron. The poets, however, tell us that this name was given it from the circumstance of Æneas having landed there, which is a mere fable.] Ovid. Met. 14, v. 90.—Plin. 3, c. 6.—Pindar. Pyth. 1.—Strab. 1.

PITHO, called also Suada, the goddess of persuasion among the Greeks and Romans, supposed to be the daughter of Mercury and Venus. She was represented with a diadem on her head, to intimate her influence over the hearts of men. One of her arms appears raised in the attitude of an orator haranguing in a public assembly, and with the other she holds a thunderbolt, and fetters made with flowers, to signify the powers of reasoning and the attractions of eloquence. A caduceus, as a symbol of persuasion, appears at her feet, with the writings of Demosthenes and Cicero, the two most celebrated among the ancients, who understood how to command the attention of their audience, and to rouse and animate their various passions.

PITHŌLĒON, an insignificant poet of Rhodes who mingled Greek and Latin in his compositions. He wrote some epigrams against J. Cæsar, and drew upon himself the ridicule of Horace on account of the inelegance of his style. Sueton. de cl. Rh.—Horat. 1, sat. 10, v. 21.—Macrob. 2, sat. 2.

PITTĀCUS, a native of Mitylene in Lesbos, was one of the seven wise men of Greece. His father's name was Cyrradius. With the assistance of the sons of Alcæus, he delivered his country from the oppression of the tyrant Melanchrus, and in the war which the Athenians waged against Lesbos he appeared at the head of his countrymen, and challenged to single combat Phrynon, the enemy's general. As the event of the war seemed to depend upon this combat, Pittacus had recourse to artifice, and when he engaged, he entangled his adversary in a net, which he had concealed under his shield, and easily dispatched him. He was amply rewarded for his victory, and his countrymen, sensible of his merit, unanimously appointed him governor of their city with unlimited authority. In this capacity Pittacus behaved with great moderation and prudence, and after he had governed his fellow-citizens with the strictest justice, and had established and enforced the most salutary laws, he voluntarily resigned the sovereign power after he had enjoyed it for 10 years, observing that the virtues and innocence of private life were incompatible with the power and influence of a sovereign. His disinterestedness gained him many admirers, and when the Mityleneans wished to reward his public services by presenting him with an immense tract of territory, he refused to accept more land than what should be contained within the distance to which he could throw a javelin. He died in the 82d year of his age, about 570 years before Christ, after he had spent the last ten years of his life in literary ease and peaceful retirement. One of his favourite maxims was that man ought to provide against misfortunes, to avoid them; but that if they ever happened, he ought to support them with patience and resignation. In prosperity friends were to be acquired, and in the hour of adversity their faithfulness was to be tried. He also observed, that in our actions it was imprudent to make others acquainted with our designs, for if we failed we had exposed ourselves to censure and to ridicule. Many of his maxims were inscribed on the walls of Apollo's temple at Delphi, to show the world how great an opinion the Mityleneans entertained of his abilities as a philosopher, a moralist, and a man. By one of his laws, every fault committed by a man when intoxicated deserved double punishment. The titles of some of his writings are preserved by Laertius, among which are mentioned elegiac verses, some laws in prose addressed to his countrymen, epistles, and moral precepts. Diog.—Aristot. Polit.—Plut. in symp.—Paus. 10, c. 24.—Ælian. V. H. 2, &c.—Val. Max. 6, c. 5.

PITTHĒA, a town near Trœzene. Hence the epithet of Pittheus in Ovid. Met. 15, v. 296.

PITTHEUS, a king of Trœzene in Argolis, son of Pelops and Hippodamia. He was universally admired for his learning, wisdom, and application; he publicly taught in a school at Trœzene, and even composed a book, which was seen by Pausanias the geographer. He gave his daughter Æthra in marriage to Ægeus, king of Athens, and he himself took particular care of the youth and education of his grandson Theseus. He was buried at Trœzene, which he had founded, and on his tomb were seen, for many ages, three seats of white marble, on which he sat, with two other judges, whenever he gave laws to his subjects or settled their disputes. Paus. 1 and 2.—Plut. in Thes.—Strab. 8.

PITULĀNI, a people of Umbria. Their chief town was called Pitulum.

PITYUS (untis.) now Putchinda, a town of Colchis, [on the Euxine Sea, to the west of Dioscurias or Sebastopolis.] Plin. 6, c. 5.

PITYŪSÆ, [or pine islands, a group of small islands in the Mediterranean, off the coast of Spain, and lying to the south-west of the Balears. They derived their name from the number of pine-trees (pinus, pinus.) which grew in them. The largest is Ebusus or Ivica, (vid. Ebusus.) and next to it is Ophiussa, or Formontera.] Mela, 2, c. 7.—Strab.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

PIUS, a surname given to the emperor Antoninus, on account of his piety and virtue.—A surname given to a son of Metellus, because he interested himself so warmly to have his father recalled from banishment.

PLACENTIA, now called Placenza, an ancient town and colony of Italy, at the confluence of the Trebia and Po. [vid. Trebia.] Liv. 21, c. 25 and 56, l. 37, c. 10.

PLACIDIA, a daughter of Theodosius the Great, sister to Honorius and Arcadius. She married Adolphus, king of the Goths, and afterwards Constantius, by whom she had Valentinian the 3d. She died A. D. 449.

PLANASIA, a small island of the Tyrrhene Sea.—Another, on the coast of Gaul, where Tiberius ordered Agrippi, the grandson of Augustus, to be put to death. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 3.—A town on the Rhone.

PLANCINA, a woman celebrated for her intrigues and her crimes, who married Piso, and was accused with him of having murdered Germanicus in the reign of Tiberius. She was acquitted either by means of the empress Livia, or on account of the partiality of the emperor for her person. She had long supported the spirits of her husband during his confinement, but, when she saw herself freed from the accusation, she totally abandoned him to his fate. Subservient in every thing to the will of Livia, she, at her instigation, became guilty of the greatest crimes, to injure the character of Agrippina. After the death of Agrippina, Plancina was accused of the most atrocious offences, and, as she knew she could not elude justice, she put herself to death, A. D. 33. Tacit. Ann. 6, c. 26, &c.

L. PLANCUS MUNATIUS, a Roman who rendered himself ridiculous by his follies and extravagance. He had been consul, and had presided over a province in the capacity of governor, but he forgot all his dignity, and became one of the most servile flatterers of Cleopatra and Antony. At the court of the Egyptian queen in Alexandria, he appeared in the character of the meanest stage-dancer, and in comedy, he personated Glaucus, and painted his body of a green colour, dancing on a public stage quite naked, only with a crown of green reeds on his head, while he had tied behind his back, the tail of a large sea-fish. This exposed him to the public derision, and when Antony had joined the rest of his friends in censuring him for his unbecoming behaviour, he deserted to Octavius, who received him with great marks of friendship and attention. It was he who proposed in the Roman senate that the title of Augustus should be conferred on his friend Octavius, as expressive of the dignity and the reverence which the greatness of his exploits seemed to claim. Horace has dedicated 1 od. 7 to him; and he certainly deserved the honour, from the elegance of his letters which are still extant, written to Cicero. Plut. in vitâ Anton.—A patrician, proscribed by the second triumvirate. His servants wished to save him from death, but he refused it, rather than to expose their persons to danger.

PLATÆA, an island on the coast of Africa, in the Mediterranean. It belonged to the Cyreneans. Herodot. 4, c. 17.

PLATÆA, and Æ, (arum), a town of Bœotia. [Homer writes the name in the singular, Πλαταια, but the historians use the plural, Πλαταιαι. It was situate near Mount Cithæron, a little below the Asopus, and seems to have derived its name from Platea, the daughter of an ancient king of the country who had given his own name to the Asopus.] This place was celebrated for a battle fought there between Mardonius the commander of Xerxes king of Persia, and Pausanias the Lacedæmonian, who commanded the combined forces of the Greeks. The Persian army consisted of 300,000 men, 3000 of which scarce escaped with their lives by flight. [We must except, however, 40,000 who were commanded by Artabazus, and took no part in the fight, but fled as soon as they saw the main army give way. The battle was fought on the part of the Greeks by the combined forces of the Lacedæmonians and Tegæans, amounting to 53,000 men, the Tegæans being 3000 strong. The Athenians were kept back from the main fight by the attack of the confederate Greeks in the service of the king of Persia. They only arrived on the field after the Lacedæmonians and Tegæans had driven the Barbarians to their entrenchments. They proved, however, of great service in storming these, a mode of warfare with which the Spartans were but little accustomed.] In this celebrated conflict, the Greeks lost but few men; 91 Spartans, 52 Athenians, and 16 Tegæans, were the only soldiers found in the number of the slain. The plunder which the Greeks obtained in the Persian camp was immense. Pausanias received the tenth of all the spoils, on account of his uncommon valour during the engagement, and the rest were rewarded each according to their respective merit. This battle was fought on the 22d of September, the same day as the battle of Mycale, 479 B. C. and by it Greece was totally delivered for ever from the continual alarms to which she was exposed on account of the Persian invasions, and from that time none of the princes of Persia dared to appear with a hostile force beyond the Hellespont. The Platæans were naturally attached to the interest of the Athenians, and they furnished them with a thousand soldiers when Greece was attacked by Datis, the general of Darius. Platæa was taken by the Thebans, after a famous siege, in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and destroyed by the Spartans, B. C. 427. Alexander rebuilt it, and paid great encomiums to the inhabitants, on account of their ancestors, who had so bravely fought against the Persians at the battle of Marathon and under Pausanias. *Herodot. 8, c. 50.—Paus. 9, c. 1.—Plut. in Alex. &c.—C. PLATO, a celebrated philosopher at Athens, son of Aristocles, and Parectonia. His original name was Aristocles, and he received that of Plato from the largeness of his shoulders. As one of the descendants of Codrus, and as the offspring of a noble, illustrious, and opulent family, Plato was educated with care, his body was formed and invigorated with gymnastic exercises, and his mind was cultivated and enlightened by the study of poetry and of geometry, from which he derived that acuteness of judgment and warmth of imagination which have stamped his character as the most subtle and flowery writer of antiquity. [He applied himself with great diligence to the arts of painting and poetry. In the latter he made such proficiency as to produce an epic poem, which, however, upon comparing it with Homer, he committed to the flames. At the age of 20 years he composed a dramatic piece, which he gave to the performers to be represented upon the theatre; it formed what the ancients termed a Tetralogy, consisting of three separate tragedies and one comedy. The day before the intended exhibition, however, he happened to attend upon a discourse of Socrates, and was so captivated by the charms of his discourse, as from that moment to abandon poetry and apply himself earnestly to the study of philosophy.] During eight years he continued to be one of the pupils of Socrates; and, if he was prevented by a momentary indisposition from attending the philosopher's last moments, yet he collected, from the conversation of those that were present, and from his own accurate observations, the minutest and most circumstantial accounts, which can exhibit, in its truest colours, the concern and sensibility of the pupil, and the firmness, virtues, and moral sentiments of the dying philosopher. [While Plato was a disciple of Socrates, he frequently displeased the followers of that philosopher, and sometimes gave Socrates himself occasions of complaint, by mixing foreign tenets with those of his master, and grafting upon the Socratic system, opinions which were taken from some other stock. Plato, nevertheless, retained a zealous attachment to Socrates. When the latter was summoned before the Athenian senate, Plato undertook to plead his cause, but the partiality and violence of the judges would not permit him to proceed. After the condemnation he presented his master with money sufficient to redeem his life, which, however, Socrates refused to accept. During his imprisonment, Plato attended him, and was present at a conversation which he held with his friends concerning the immortality of the soul, the substance of which he afterwards committed to writing in the beautiful dialogue entitled Phædo, not, however, without interweaving his own opinions and language.] After the death of Socrates, Plato retired from Athens, and, to acquire that information which the accurate observer can derive in foreign countries, he began to travel over Greece. He visited Megara, Thebes, and Elis, where he met with the kindest reception from his fellow-disciples, whom the violent death of their master had likewise removed from Attica. He afterwards visited Magna Græcia, attracted by the fame of the Pythagorean philosophy, and by the learning, abilities, and reputation of its professors, Philolaus, Archytas, and Eurytus. [He was instructed by these philosophers in all the mysteries of the Pythagorean system, the subtleties of which he afterwards too freely blended with the simple doctrine of Socrates. He next visited Theodorus of Cyrene, and became his pupil in mathematical science. When he found himself sufficiently instructed in the elements of this branch of learning, he determined to study astronomy and other sciences in Egypt. According to some authorities, however, (for the ancient writers vary in their accounts of the life of Plato,) he went first to Egypt and then to Italy. Diogenes Laertius makes him to have visited Cyrene first, to have betaken himself from thence to Italy, and to have visited Egypt last. That he might travel with more safety upon his journey to the last named country he assumed the character of a merchant, and, as a seller of oil, passed through the kingdom of Artaxerxes Mnemon. Wherever he came, he obtained information from the Egyptian priests concerning their astronomical observations and calculations. It has been asserted that it was in Egypt that Plato acquired his opinions concerning the origin of the world, and learnt the doctrines of transmigration and the immortality of the soul: but it is more than probable that he learned the latter doctrine from Socrates, and the former from the school of Pythagoras. It is not likely that Plato, in the habit of a merchant, could have obtained access to the sacred mysteries of Egypt; for, in the case of Pythagoras, the Egyptian priests were so unwilling to communicate their secrets to strangers, that even a royal mandate was scarcely sufficient in a single instance to procure this indulgence. Little regard is therefore due to the opinions of those who assert that Plato derived his system of philosophy from the Egyptians. Nor is there a better foundation for supposing, that, during his residence in Egypt, Plato became acquainted with the doctrine of the Hebrews, and enriched his system with spoils from their sacred books. This opinion has, it is true, been maintained by several Jewish and Christian writers; but it has little foundation beyond mere conjecture; and it is not difficult to perceive that it originated in that injudicious zeal for the honour of revelation, which led these writers to make the Hebrew Scriptures, or traditions, the source of all Gentile wisdom. When Plato had, in his travels, exhausted the philosophical treasures of distant countries, he returned into Italy, to the Pythagorean school at Tarentum, where he endeavoured to improve his own system by incorporating in it the doctrine of Pythagoras as it was then taught by Archytas, Timæus, and others. Returning home richly stored with knowledge of various kinds, Plato settled in Athens, and opened a school in a public grove called the Academy (Ἀκαδημία). Within this place he possessed, as a part of his humble patrimony, a small garden, in which he commenced his system of instruction. How much Plato valued mathematical studies, and how necessary a preparation he thought them for higher speculations, appears from the inscription which he placed over the door of his school: Οὐδεὶς ἀγεωμετρῆτος εἰσὶν, "Let no one who is unacquainted with geometry enter here." This new school soon became famous, and its master was ranked among the most eminent philosophers. His travels into distant countries, where learning and wisdom flourished, gave him celebrity among his brethren of the Socratic sect. None of these had ventured to institute a school at Athens, except Aristippus; and he had confined his instructions almost entirely to ethical subjects, and had brought himself into some discredit by the freedom of his manners. Plato's school soon became frequented by persons of every age, and of the first distinction in every department. Even females, disguised in male attire, were often among the number of his hearers. Such distinguished reputation naturally produced among the companions of Plato, formerly the disciples of Socrates, a spirit of emulation, which soon degenerated into envy, and loaded him with detraction and obloquy. It can only be ascribed to mutual jealousy, that Xenophon and Plato, though they relate the discourses of their common master, studiously avoid mentioning one another. In the midst, however, of private censures, the public fame of Plato daily increased. His political wisdom was in such high estimation, that several solicited his assistance in new modelling their respective forms of government. Applications of this kind from the Arcadians, and from the Thebans, he rejected, because they refused to adopt the plan of his republic, which required an equal distribution of property. He gave his advice in the affairs of Elis and other Grecian states, and furnished a code of laws for Syracuse. Plato was in high estimation with several princes, particularly Archelaus, king of Macedon, and Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily. An account of his first visit to the latter prince is given under the article Dion, and also of Plato's being sold into slavery at Ægina. The people of Ægina were then at war with the Athenians; Plato, however, remained but a short time in bondage, Anicerris, a Cyrenaic philosopher, purchased his liberty for 30 minæ, and sent him home to Athens. At the pressing instance, however, of the younger Dionysius, who had ascended the throne upon the death of the elder, Plato paid a second visit to Sicily. His stay, however, was unsatisfactory and brief. A third invitation came some time after, but the philosopher, now advanced in life, pleaded his age as an excuse, and finally was only prevailed upon to go by the entreaties of the wife and sister of Dion, and the urgent solicitations of some Pythagorean philosophers. For a time Plato possessed the chief influence and authority at the court of Syracuse. But mutual distrust soon followed, and Dionysius at last even placed Plato in confinement, and the philosopher was at length only rescued from the tyrant's power and restored to his country by the spirited intercession of his Pythagorean friends.] In his dress the philosopher was not ostentatious, his manners were elegant but modest, simple without affectation, and the great honours which his learning deserved were not paid to his appearance. When he came to the Olympian games, Plato resided, during the celebration, in a family who were totally strangers to him. He ate and drank with them, he partook of their innocent pleasures and amusements; but, though he told them his name was Plato, yet he never spoke of the employment he pursued at Athens, and never introduced the name of that philosopher whose doctrines he followed, and whose death and virtues were favourite topics of conversation in every part of Greece. When he returned home he was attended by the family which had so kindly entertained him; and, as being a native of Athens, he was desired to show them the great philosopher whose name he bore: their surprise was great when he told them that he himself was the Plato whom they wished to behold. In his diet he was moderate, and indeed, to sobriety and temperance in the use of food, and to the want of those pleasures which enfeeble the body and enervate the mind, some have attributed his preservation during the tremendous pestilence which had raged at Athens with so much fury at the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. Plato was never subject to any long or lingering indisposition, and though change of climate had enfeebled a constitution naturally strong and healthy, the philosopher lived to an advanced age, and was often heard to say, when his physicians advised him to leave his residence at Athens, where the air was impregnated by the pestilence, that he would not advance one single step to gain the top of Mount Athos, were he assured to attain the great longevity which the inhabitants of that mountain were said to enjoy above the rest of mankind. Plato died on his birth-day, in the 81st year of his age, about 348 years before the Christian era. His last moments were easy and without pain, and, according to some, he expired in the midst of an entertainment, or, according to Cicero, as he was writing. The works of Plato are numerous; they are all written in the form of a dialogue, except 13 letters. [The dialogues are 35 in number. Plato's success, however, in the use of this mode of writing, was not very striking, as will appear from almost every dialogue which he has composed. The main question of the dialogue is so long kept in suspense by the minute details of induction, and the business of the piece meets with so many colloquial interruptions, that it is not without great difficulty that the reader can follow the thread of the argument, or perceive the general conclusion. The writer's meaning too is frequently lost in the obscurity of subtle distinctions, and sometimes after the Egyptian manner, concealed beneath the cloak of the fable. Cicero, though an enthusiastic admirer of Plato, was not insensible of the uncertainty which, from this cause, hangs upon his doctrine. "Plato," says he, "affirms nothing, but after producing many arguments, and examining a question on every side, leaves it undetermined."] He speaks always by the mouth of others, and the philosopher has no where made mention of himself, except once in his dialogue entitled Phædon, and another time, in his apology for Socrates. [It is from the writings of Plato, chiefly, that we are to form a judgment of his merit as a philosopher, and of the service which he rendered to science. No one can be conversant with these without perceiving that his diction always retained a strong tincture of that poetical spirit which he discovered in his first productions. This is the principal ground of those lofty encomiums which both ancient and modern critics have passed upon his language, and, particularly of the high estimation in which it was held by Cicero, who, treating of the subject of language, says, "that if Jupiter were to speak in the Greek tongue, he would use the language of Plato." The accurate Stagyrite describes it as "a middle species of diction, between verse and prose." Some of his dialogues are elevated by such sublime and glowing conceptions, are enriched with such copious diction, and flow in so harmonious a rhythm, that they may be truly pronounced highly poetical. Even in the discussion of abstract subjects, the language of Plato is often clear, simple, and full of harmony. At other times, however, he becomes turgid and swelling, and involves himself in obscurities which were either the offspring of a lofty fancy, or borrowed from the Italic school. Several ancient critics have noticed these blemishes in the writings of Plato. The same inequality which is so apparent in the style of Plato may also be observed in his conceptions. Whilst he adheres to the school of Socrates, and discourses upon moral topics, he is much more pleasing than when he loses himself, with Pythagoras, in abstruse speculations. The dialogues of Plato, which treat of various subjects, and were written with different views, are classed by the ancients under the two heads of didactic and inquisitive. The didactic are subdivided into speculative, (including physical and logical); and practical, (comprehending ethical and political). The second class, the inquisitive, is characterized by terms taken from the athletic art, and divided into the gymnastic and the agonistic. The dialogues termed gymnastic were imagined to be similar to the exercise, and were subdivided into the Maieutic (as resembling the teaching of the rudiments of the art); and the peirastic (as represented by a skirmish, or trial of proficiency.) The agonistic dialogues, supposed to resemble the combat, were either endeictic, (as exhibiting specimens of skill); or anatreptic (as presenting the spectacle of a perfect defeat.) Instead of this whimsical classification, they may more properly be divided into physical, logical, ethical, and political. The writings of Plato were originally collected by Hermodorus, one of his pupils.] The speculative mind of Plato was employed in examining things divine and human, and he attempted to fix and ascertain, not only the practical doctrine of morals and politics, but the more subtle and abstruse theory of mystical theogony. His philosophy was universally received and adopted and it has not only governed the opinions of the speculative part of mankind, but it continues still to influence the reasoning, and to divide the sentiments of the moderns. In his systems of philosophy, he followed the physics of Heraclitus, the metaphysical opinions of Pythagoras, and the morals of Socrates. [One circumstance it is particularly necessary to remark; that, among other things which Plato received from philosophy, he was careful to borrow the art of concealing his real opinions. His inclination towards this kind of concealment appears from the obscure language which abounds in his writings, and may indeed be learned from his own express assertions. "It is a difficult thing," he observes, "to discover the nature of the Creator of the universe; and, being discovered, it is impossible, and would even be impious, to expose the discovery to vulgar understandings." This concealed method of philosophizing he was induced to adopt from a regard to personal safety, and from motives of vanity.] He maintained the existence of two beings, one self-existent, and the other formed by the hand of a pre-existent creature, god and man. The world was created by that self-existent cause, from the rude, undigested mass of matter which had existed from all eternity, and which had even been animated by an irregular principle of motion. [Plato appears to have conceived of the Divine principle, as distinct, not merely from matter, but from the efficient cause, and as eternally containing within itself Ideas, or intelligible forms, which, flowing from the fountain of the Divine essence, have in themselves a real existence, and which, in the formation of the visible world, were, by the energy of the efficient cause, united to matter to produce sensible bodies. These ideas Plato defines to be the peculiar natures of things, or essences as such; and asserts that they always remain the same, without beginning or end. Of matter, Plato maintains its eternal co-existence with God, and it is surprising that any one could have so far mistaken his meaning as to discover the least coincidence between his doctrine and that of Moses.] The origin of evil could not be traced under the government of a deity, without admitting a stubborn intractability and wildness congenial to matter, and from these, consequently, could be demonstrated the deviations from the laws of nature, and from thence the extravagant passions and appetites of men. From materials like these were formed the four elements, and the beautiful structure of the heavens and the earth, and into the active, but irrational, principle of matter, the divinity infused a rational soul. The souls of men were formed from the remainder of the rational soul of the world, which had previously given existence to the invisible gods and demons. The philosopher, therefore, supported the doctrine of ideal forms, and the pre-existence of the human mind, which he considered as emanations of the Deity, which can never remain satisfied with objects or things unworthy of their divine original. Men could perceive, with their corporeal senses, the types of immutable things, and the fluctuating objects of the material world; but the sudden changes to which these are continually obnoxious, create innumerable disorders, and hence arises deception, and, in short, all the errors and miseries of human life. Yet, in whatever situation man may be, he is still an object of divine concern, and, to recommend himself to the favour of the pre-existent cause, he must comply with the purposes of his creation, and, by proper care and diligence, he can recover those immaculate powers with which he was naturally endowed. All science the philosopher made to consist in reminiscence, and in recalling the nature, forms, and proportions, of those perfect and immutable essences with which the human mind had been conversant. From observations like these, the summit of felicity might be attained by removing from the material, and approaching nearer to the intellectual world, by curbing and governing the passions, which were ever agitated and inflamed by real or imaginary objects. The passions were divided into two classes; the first consisted of the irascible passions, which originated in pride or resentment, and were seated in the breast: the other, founded on the love of pleasure, was the concupiscible part of the soul, seated in the belly and inferior parts of the body. These different orders induced the philosopher to compare the soul to a small republic, of which the reasoning and judging powers were stationed in the head, as in a firm citadel, and of which the senses were its guards and servants. By the irascible part of the soul men asserted their dignity, repelled injuries, and scorned danger; and the concupiscible part provided the support and the necessities of the body, and, when governed with propriety, it gave rise to temperance. Justice was produced by the regular dominion of reason, and by the submission of the passions; and prudence arose from the strength, acuteness, and perfection of the soul, without which all other virtues could not exist. But, amidst all this, wisdom was not easily attained; at their creations all minds were not endowed with the same excellence, the bodies which they animate on earth were not always in harmony with the divine emanation; some might be too weak, others too strong, and on the first years of a man's life depended his future consequence; as an effeminate and licentious education seemed calculated to destroy the purposes of the divinity, while the contrary produced different effects, and tended to cultivate and improve the reasoning and judging faculty, and to produce wisdom and virtue. Plato was the first who supported the immortality of the soul upon arguments solid and permanent, deduced from truth and experience. [Plato's arguments in favour of the immortality of the soul are not founded "on truth and experience," but are drawn from the more fanciful parts of his system. For example: In nature all things terminate in their contraries; the state of sleep terminates in that of waking; and the reverse: so life ends in death, and death in life. The soul is a simple indivisible substance, and therefore incapable of dissolution or corruption. The objects to which it naturally adheres are spiritual and incorruptible; therefore its own nature is so. All our knowledge is acquired by the reminiscence of ideas contemplated in a prior state: as the soul therefore must have existed before this life, it is probable that it will continue to exist after it. Life being the conjunction of the soul with the body, death is nothing more than their separation. Whatever is the principle of motion must be incapable of destruction. Such is the substance of the arguments for the immortality of the soul, contained in the celebrated dialogue entitled Phædo. It is happy for mankind that their belief of this important doctrine rests upon firmer grounds than such futile reasonings. It was another doctrine in the Platonic system that the Deity formed the material world after a perfect archetype, which had eternally subsisted in his Reason, and endued it with a soul. "God," says he, "produced mind, prior in time as well as in excellence, to the body, that the latter might be subject to the former." "From that substance which is invisible, and always the same, and from that which is corporeal and divisible, he compounded a third kind of substance, participating of the nature of both." This substance, which is not eternal, but produced, and which derives the superior part of its nature from God, and the inferior from matter, Plato supposed to be the animating principle in the universe, pervading and adorning all things. This third principle in nature is, in the Platonic system, inferior to the Deity, being derived from that Divine Reason which is the seat of the ideal world; herein differing fundamentally from the Stoical doctrine of the soul of the world, which supposed the essence of the Divine nature diffused throughout the universe. The doctrine of a two-fold soul of the world, the one ὑπερκόσμιον, "presiding over the world," the other εγκόσμιον, "residing in the world," is an appendage to the ancient Platonic system, introduced by the later Platonists to accommodate this system to the notions adopted by many of the Christian fathers concerning the Divine Nature. It is evident from the preceding account of the doctrine of Plato concerning God and the soul of the world, that it differs materially from the doctrine of the Trinity afterwards received into the Christian church. Plato did not suppose three subsistences in one Divine essence, separate from the visible world; but he taught that the λογος, or Reason of God, is the seat of the intelligible world, or of ideas, and that the soul of the world is a third subordinate nature, compounded of intelligence and matter. In the language of Plato, the universe, being animated by a soul which proceeds from God, is the son of God; and several parts of nature, particularly the heavenly bodies, are gods. He probably conceived many subordinate divinities to have been produced at the same time with the soul of the world, and imagined that the Supreme Being appointed them to the charge of forming animal bodies, and superintending the visible world; a doctrine which he seems to have borrowed from the Pythagoreans.] Plato did not imagine that the diseases and the death of the body could injure the principle of life and destroy the soul, which, of itself, was of divine origin, and of an uncorrupted and immutable essence, which, though inherent for a while in matter, could not lose that power which was the emanation of God. From doctrines like these, the great founder of Platonism concluded that there might exist in the world a community of men whose passions could be governed with moderation, and who, from knowing the evils and miseries which arise from ill conduct, might aspire to excellence and attain that perfection which can be derived from the proper exercise of the rational and moral powers. To illustrate this more fully, the philosopher wrote a book, well known by the name of the republic of Plato, in which he explains with acuteness, judgment, and elegance, the rise and revolution of civil society. [The school of Plato long continued famous, but passed through several changes, on account of which it was successively distinguished into the Old, the Middle, and the New Academy. The Old Academy consisted of those followers of Plato who taught the doctrines of their master without mixture or corruption. The most distinguished of these were Speusippus, Xenocrates, Polemo, Crates and Crantor. After the death of Crates a new tribe of philosophers arose, who, on account of certain innovations in their manner of philosophizing, which in some measure receded from the Platonic system without entirely deserting it, have been distinguished by the name of the Middle Academy. Under Lacydes the New Academy commenced. He is said to have been the founder of a new school, not because he introduced any new doctrine, but from his having changed the place of instruction and held the school over which he presided in the garden of Attalus, still, however, within the limits of the Academic grove.—The works of Plato were first published after the invention of printing, by Aldus Manutius, at Venice, in 1513. The editions of Ficinus and Serranus are very valuable, but their notes and interpretations are to be read with caution; for Ficinus, having formed his conceptions of the doctrine of Plato after the model of the Alexandrian school, frequently, in his Arguments, misrepresents the design of his author, and in his version obscures the sense of the original; and Serranus, for want of an accurate acquaintance with the doctrine of his author, and through the influence of a strong predilection for the scholastic system of theology, sometimes gives an incorrect and injudicious explanation of the text.—The most useful editions of Plato, next to those mentioned above, are, the Biont edition, 12 vols. 8vo. 1788, and that of Bekker, Berol: 1816-18, 10 vols. 8vo. including 2 vols. of various readings, &c. The text of this last edition is decidedly the best. An edition by Prof. Ast is now publishing in Germany, of which 6 vols. have already appeared.] *Plato. PLAUTIA LEX, was enacted by M. Plautius, the tribune, A. U. C. 664. It required every tribe annually to choose fifteen persons of their body, to serve as judges, making the honour common to all the three orders, according to the majority of votes in every tribe.—Another, called also Plotia, A. PLAUTIANUS, FULVIUS, an African of mean birth, who was banished for his seditious behaviour in the years of his obscurity. In his banishment, Plautianus formed an acquaintance with Severus, who, some years after, ascended the imperial throne. This was the beginning of his prosperity; Severus paid the greatest attention to him, and, if we believe some authors, their familiarity and intercourse were carried beyond the bounds of modesty and propriety. Plautianus shared the favours of Severus in obscurity as well as on the throne. He was invested with as much power as his patron at Rome, and in the provinces, and, indeed, he wanted but the name of emperor to be his equal. His table was served with more delicate meats than that of the emperor; when he walked in the public streets he received the most distinguishing honours, and a number of criers ordered the most noble citizens, as well as the meanest beggars, to make way for the favourite of the emperor, and not to fix their eyes upon him. He was concerned in all the rapine and destruction which was committed through the empire, and he enriched himself with the possessions of those who had been sacrificed to the emperor's cruelty or avarice. To complete his triumph, and to make himself still greater, Plautianus married his favourite daughter Plautilla to Caracalla, the son of the emperor; and so eager was the emperor to indulge his inclinations in this, and in every other respect, that he declared he loved Plautianus so much that he would even wish to die before him. The marriage of Caracalla with Plautilla was attended with serious consequences. The son of Severus had complied with great reluctance, and, though Plautilla was amiable in her manners, commanding in aspect, and of a beautiful countenance, yet the young prince often threatened to punish her haughty and imperious behaviour as soon as he succeeded to the throne. Plautilla reported the whole to her father, and to save his daughter from the vengeance of Caracalla, Plautianus conspired against the emperor and his son. The conspiracy was discovered, and Severus forgot his attachment to Plautianus, and the favours he had heaped upon him, when he heard of his perfidy. The wicked minister was immediately put to death, and Plautilla banished to the island of Lipari, with her brother Plautius, where, seven years after, she was put to death by order of Caracalla, A. D. 211. Plautilla had two children, a son who died in his childhood, and a daughter whom Caracalla murdered in the arms of her mother. Dion. Cass.

M. ACCIUS PLAUTUS, a comic poet, born at Sarsina, in Umbria. [He was called Plau-

tus from his splay feet, a defect common to all the Umbrians.] Fortune proved unkind to him, and, from competence, he was reduced to the meanest poverty, by engaging in a commercial line. To maintain himself, he entered into the family of a baker as a common servant, and was employed in grinding corn. [Many of his plays were written in these unfavourable circumstances, and of course have not obtained all the perfection which might otherwise have resulted from his increased knowledge of life, and his long practice in the dramatic art.] He died about 184 years before the Christian era; and Varro, his learned countryman, wrote this stanza, which deserved to be engraved on his tomb:

*Postquam morte captus est Plautus,
Comedia luget, scena est deserta;
Deinde risus, ludus, jocusque, & numeri
Innumeri simul omnes collacrymârunt.*

The plays of Plautus were universally esteemed at Rome, and the purity, the energy, and the elegance of his language, were, by other writers, considered as objects of imitation; and Varro, whose judgment is great, and generally decisive, declares, that if the muses were willing to speak Latin they would speak in the language of Plautus. In the Augustan age, however, when the Roman language became more pure and refined, the comedies of Plautus did not appear free from inaccuracy. The poet, when compared to the more elegant expressions of Terence, was censured for his negligence in versification, his low wit, execrable puns, and disgusting obscenities. [As regards the opinion expressed by Varro, it is necessary to distinguish between the judgment of philologers and that of critics and poets. Plautus wrote at a period when his country as yet possessed no written or literary language. Every phrase was drawn from the living source of conversation. This early simplicity seemed pleasing and artless to those Romans who lived in an age of excessive refinement and cultivation: but this apparent merit was rather accidental than the effect of poetic art. Making, however, some allowances for this, there can be no doubt that Plautus wonderfully improved and refined the Latin language from the rude form to which it had been moulded by Ennius.] Yet, however censured as to language or sentiments, Plautus continued to be a favourite on the stage. If his expressions were not choice or delicate, it was universally admitted that he was more happy than other comic writers in his pictures, the incidents of his plays were more varied, the acts more interesting, the characters more truly displayed, and the catastrophe more natural. In the reign of the emperor Diocletian, his comedies were still acted on the public theatres, and no greater compliment can be paid to his abilities as a comic writer, and no greater censure can be passed upon his successors in dramatic compositions, than to observe, that for 500 years, with all the disadvantage of obsolete language and diction, in spite of the change of manners and the revolutions of government, he commanded and received that applause which no other writer dared to dispute with him. [In the time of Varro there were remaining 130 comedies attributed to Plautus; in this number, however, were included many pieces composed by another poet of the same name. Varro acknowledges only 21 as genuine. Of these last we possess 20. One of them, the Pœnulus, or "young Carthaginian," contains some specimens of the Punic tongue, which, though very corrupt, are, notwithstanding, very interesting fragments of antiquity.] The best editions of Plautus are that of Gronovius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1664; that of Barboiu, 12mo. in 3 vols. Paris, 1759; that of Ernesti, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1760; and that of Glasgow, 3 vols. 12mo. 1763. PLEIÂDES, or VERGILIÆ, a name given to seven of the daughters of Atlas by Pleione of Æthra, one of the Oceanides. They were placed in the heavens after death, where they formed a constellation called Pleiades, in the neck of the bull in the Zodiac. Their names were Alcyone, Merope, Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Sterope, and Celeno. They all, except Merope, who married Sisyphus, king of Corinth, had some of the immortal gods for their suitors. On that account, therefore, Merope's star is dim and obscure among the rest of her sisters, because she married a mortal. The name of the Pleiades is derived from the Greek word πλειων, to sail, because that constellation shows the time most favourable to navigators, which is in the spring. The name of Vergiliæ they derive from ver, the spring. They are sometimes called Atlantides, from their father, or Hesperides, from the gardens of that name, which belonged to Atlas. Hygin. fab. 191. P. A. 2, c. 21.—*Ovid. Their names were Lycophron, Theocritus, Aratus, Nicander, Apollonius, Philicus, and Homerus the younger.

PLEXIPPUS, a son of Thestius, brother to Althæa, the wife of Æneus. He was killed by his nephew Meleager, in hunting the Calydonian boar. His brother Toxeus shared his fate. (vid. Althæa and Meleager.)

C. PLINIUS SECUNDUS, surnamed the Elder, was born at Verona, of a noble family. He distinguished himself in the field, and, after he had been made one of the augurs at Rome, he was appointed governor of Spain. In his public character he did not neglect the pleasures of literature, the day was employed in the administration of the affairs of his province and the night was dedicated to study. Every moment of time was precious to him; at his meals one of his servants read to him books valuable for their information, and from them he immediately made copious extracts in a memorandum book. Even while he dressed himself after bathing, his attention was called away from surrounding objects, and he was either employed in listening to another or in dictating himself. To a mind so earnestly devoted to learning, nothing appeared too laborious, no undertaking too troublesome. He deemed every moment lost which was not dedicated to study, and, from these reasons, he never appeared at Rome but in a chariot, and, wherever he went he was always accompanied by his amanuensis. He even censured his nephew, Pliny the younger, because he had indulged himself with a walk, and sternly observed that he might have employed those moments to better advantage. But if his literary pursuits made him forget the public affairs, his prudence, his abilities, and the purity and innocence of his character, made him known and respected. He was courted and admired by the emperors Titus and Vespasian, and he received from them all the favours which a virtuous prince could offer, and an honest subject receive. As he was at Misenum, where he commanded the fleet which was then stationed there, Pliny was surprised at the sudden appearance of a cloud of dust and ashes. He was then ignorant of the cause which produced it, and he immediately set sail in a small vessel for Mount Vesuvius, which he at last discovered to have made a dreadful eruption. The sight of a number of boats that fled from the coast to avoid the danger might have deterred another, but the curiosity of Pliny excited him to advance with more boldness, and, though his vessel was often covered with stones and ashes that were continually thrown up by the mountain, yet he landed on the coast. The place was deserted by the inhabitants, but Pliny remained there during the night the better to observe the mountain, which, during the obscurity, appeared to be one continual blaze. He was soon disturbed by a dreadful earthquake, and the contrary wind on the morrow prevented him from returning to Misenum. The eruption of the volcano increased, and, at last, the fire approached the place where the philosopher made his observations. Pliny endeavoured to fly before it, but, though he was supported by two of his servants, he was unable to escape. He soon fell down suffocated by the thick vapours that surrounded him, and the insupportable stench of sulphureous matter. His body was found three days after and decently buried by his nephew, who was then at Misenum with the fleet. This memorable event happened in the 79th year of the Christian era; and the philosopher who perished by the eruptions of the volcano has been called by some the martyr of nature. He was then in the 56th year of his age. Of the works which he composed none are extant but his natural history in 37 books. It is a work, as Pliny the younger says, full of erudition, and as varied as nature itself. It treats of the stars, the heavens, wind, rain, hail, minerals, trees, flowers, and plants, besides an account of all living animals, birds, fishes, and beasts; a geographical description of every place on the globe, and an history of every art and science, of commerce and navigation, with their rise, progress, and several improvements. He is happy in his descriptions as a naturalist, he writes with force and energy, and, though many of his ideas and conjectures are sometimes ill-founded, yet he possesses that fecundity of imagination, and vivacity of expression, which are requisite to treat a subject with propriety, and to render an history of nature pleasing, interesting, and above all, instructive. His style possesses not the graces of the Augustan age; he has neither its purity and elegance, nor its simplicity, but it is rather cramped, obscure, and sometimes unintelligible. Yet for all this he has ever been admired and esteemed, and his work may be called a compilation of every thing which had been written before his age on the various subjects which he treats, and a judicious collection from the best treatises which had been composed on the various productions of nature. [Notwithstanding all that may be said in its favour, the work must be read with caution, because Pliny often makes his extracts from others with too much precipitation. This becomes extremely necessary where the originals, from which he copied, no longer exist, or where Pliny allows his judgment to be warped by prejudice. Pliny is credulous, and often deficient on questions of taste. In the medical part of his work, however, he is most erroneous. The last five books, in which he treats occasionally of the arts, contain also many errors. The text of this writer is very corrupt, and still needs an expert and critical editor.] Pliny was not ashamed to mention the authors which he quoted; he speaks of them with admiration and while he pays the greatest compliment to their abilities, his encomiums show, in the strongest light, the goodness, the sensibility, and the ingenuousness of his own mind. He had written 160 volumes of remarks and annotations on the various authors which he had read, and so great was the opinion in his contemporaries, of his erudition and abilities, that a man called Lartius Lutinus offered to buy his notes and observations for the enormous sum of about 3242*l.* English money. The philosopher, who was himself rich and independent, rejected the offer, and his compilations, after his death, came into the hands of his nephew Pliny. The best editions of Pliny are that of Harduin, 3 vols. fol. Paris, 1723, that of Frantzius, 10 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1778, that of Brotier, 6 vols. 12mo. Paris, 1779, and the Variorum. 8vo. in 8 vols. Lips. 1778 to 1789. Tacit. Ann. 1, c. 69, l. 13, c. 20, l. 15, c. 53.—Plin. ep. &c.—C. Cæcilius Secundus, surnamed the younger, was son of L. Cæcilius by the sister of Pliny the elder. He was adopted by his uncle, whose name he assumed, and whose estates and effects he inherited. He received the greatest part of his education under Quintilian, and at the age of 19 he appeared at the bar, where he distinguished himself so much by his eloquence, that he and Tacitus were reckoned the two greatest orators of their age. He did not make his profession an object of gain like the rest of the Roman orators, but he refused fees from the rich as well as from the poorest of his clients, and declared that he cheerfully employed himself for the protection of innocence, the relief of the indigent, and the detection of vice. He published many of his harangues and orations, which have been lost. When Trajan was invested with the imperial purple, Pliny was created consul by the emperor. This honour the consul acknowledged in a celebrated panegyric, which, at the request of the Roman senate, and in the name of the whole empire, he pronounced on Trajan. [The "Panegyric" of Pliny is rendered very interesting by the numerous facts it contains relative to the emperor Trajan; especially as we do not now possess what Suetonius and Tacitus may have written of this prince, and since many other histories of his reign are likewise lost.] Some time after he presided over Pontus and Bithynia, in the office, and with the power, of pro-consul, and by his humanity and philanthropy the subject was freed from the burden of partial taxes, and the persecution which had been begun against the Christians of his province was stopped when Pliny solemnly declared to the emperor that the followers of Christ were a meek and inoffensive sect of men, that their morals were pure and innocent, that they were free from all crimes, and that they voluntarily bound themselves by the most solemn oaths to abstain from vice, and relinquish every sinful pursuit. If he rendered himself popular in his province, he was not less respected at Rome. He was there the friend of the poor, the patron of learning, great without arrogance, affable in his behaviour, and an example of good-breeding, sobriety, temperance, and modesty. As a father and a husband his character was amiable; as a subject he was faithful to his prince; and as a magistrate, he was candid, open, and compassionate. His native country shared among the rest his unbounded benevolence; and Comum, a town of Insubria, which gave him birth, boasted of his liberality in the valuable and choice library of books which he collected there. He also contributed towards the expenses which attended the education of his countrymen, and liberally spent part of his estate for the advancement of literature, and for the instruction of those whom poverty otherwise deprived of the advantages of a public education. He made his preceptor Quintilian, and the poet Martial, objects of his benevolence, and when the daughter of the former was married, Pliny wrote to the father with the greatest civility; and while he observed that he was rich in the possession of learning, though poor in the goods of fortune, he begged of him to accept, as a dowery for his beloved daughter, 50,000 sesterces, about 300*l.* I would not, continued he, be so moderate, were I not assured from your modesty and disinterestedness, that the smallness of the present will render it acceptable. He died in the 52d year of his age, A. D. 113. He had written a history of his own times, which is lost. It is said that Tacitus did not begin his history till he had found it impossible to persuade Pliny to undertake that laborious task, and indeed what could not have been expected from the panegyrist of Trajan, if Tacitus acknowledged himself inferior to him in delineating the character of the times. Some suppose, but falsely, that Pliny wrote the lives of illustrious men, universally ascribed to Cornelius Nepos. He also wrote poetry, but his verses have all perished, and nothing of his learned works remain but his panegyric on the emperor Trajan, and 10 books of letters, which he himself collected and prepared for the public from a numerous and respectable correspondence. These letters contain many curious and interesting facts; they abound with many anecdotes of the generosity and the humane sentiments of the writer. They are written with elegance and great purity, and the reader every where discovers that affability, that condescension and philanthropy, which so egregiously marked the advocate of the Christians. These letters are esteemed by some equal to the epistles of Cicero. [The most interesting of these letters are, two in which he details the mode of life pursued by Pliny the elder, and states the particulars of his death; two others in which he gives an account of his villas; and that relative to the Christians, in which he communicates to the emperor the result of his enquiries respecting them. Semler, a German divine, has attempted to prove this last a fabrication of Tertullian, but ineffectually. There is a foolish legend connected with this letter, that Pliny, having met Titus in Crete, was converted by him, and suffered martyrdom.] In his panegyric, Pliny's style is florid and brilliant; he has used to the greatest advantage the liberties of the panegyrist, and the eloquence of the courtier. His ideas are new and refined, but his diction is distinguished by that affectation and pomposity which marked the reign of Trajan. The best editions of Pliny, are that of Gesner, [improved by Schaeffer, Lips. 1805, in 8vo.] and of Lallemand, 12mo. Paris apud Barbou, and of the panegyric separate, that of Schwartz, 4to. 1746, and of the epistles, the Variorum, L. Bat. 1669, 8vo Plin. ep.—Vossius.—Sidonius.

PLISTARCHUS, son of Leonidas, of the family of the Eurysthenidæ, succeeded to the Spartan throne at the death of Cleombrotus. Herodot. 9, c. 10.

PLISTHÈNES, a son of Arteus, king of Argos, father of Menelaus and Agamemnon according to Hesiod and others. Homer, however, calls Menelaus and Agamemnon sons of Atreus, though they were in reality the children of Plisthenes. The father died very young, and the two children were left in the house of their grandfather, who took care of them and instructed them. From his attention to them, therefore, it seems probable that Atreus was universally acknowledged as their protector and father, and thence their surname of Atrideæ. *Ovid. Rem. PLISTINUS, a brother of Faustulus the shepherd who saved the life of Romulus and Remus. He was killed in a scuffle which happened between the two brothers.

PLISTOÂNAX and PLISTÔNAX, son of Pausanias, was general of the Lacedæmonian armies in the Peloponnesian war. He was banished from his kingdom of Sparta for 19 years, and was afterwards recalled by order of the oracle of Delphi. He reigned 58 years. He had succeeded Plistarchus. Thucyd.

PLOTINA POMPEIA, a Roman lady who married Trajan while he was yet a private man. She entered Rome in the procession with her husband when he was saluted emperor, and distinguished herself by the affability of her behaviour, her humanity, and liberal offices to the poor and friendless. She accompanied Trajan in the east, and at his death she brought back his ashes to Rome, and still enjoyed all the honours and titles of a Roman empress under Adrian, who, by her means, had succeeded to the vacant throne. At her death, A. D. 122, she was ranked among the gods, and received divine honours, which, according to the superstition of the times, she seemed to deserve from her regard for the good and the prosperity of the Roman empire, and for her private virtues. Dion.

PLOTINOPŌLIS, a town of Thrace built by the emperor Trajan, and called after Plotina, the founder's wife. [It was situate upon the river Hebrus, 22 miles from Trajanopolis according to the itinerary of Antonine.]—Another in Dacia.

PLOTINUS, a Platonic philosopher of Lycopolis in Egypt. He was for eleven years a pupil of Ammonius the philosopher, and after he had profited by all the instructions of his learned preceptor, he determined to improve his knowledge and to visit the territories of India and Persia to receive information. He accompanied Gordian in his expedition into the east, but the day which proved fatal to the emperor nearly terminated the life of the philosopher. He saved himself by flight, and the following year he retired to Rome, where he publicly taught philosophy. His school was frequented by people of every sex, age, and quality, by senators as well as plebeians; and so great was the opinion of the public of his honesty and candour, that many on their death-bed left all their possessions to his care, and intrusted their children to him as a superior being. He was the favourite of all the Romans; and while he charmed the populace by the force of his eloquence, and the senate by his doctrines, the emperor Gallienus courted him, and admired the extent of his learning. It is even said, that the emperor and the empress Salonia intended to rebuild a decayed city of Campania, and to appoint the philosopher over it, that there he might experimentally know, while he presided over a colony of philosophers, the validity and the use of the ideal laws of the republic of Plato. This plan was not executed through the envy and malice of the enemies of Plotinus. The philosopher, at last, become helpless and infirm, returned to Campania, where the liberality of his friends for awhile maintained him. He died A. D. 270, in the 66th year of his age, and as he expired, he declared that he made his last and most violent efforts to give up what there was most divine in him and in the rest of the universe. Amidst the great qualities of the philosopher, we discover some ridiculous singularities. Plotinus never permitted his picture to be taken, and he observed, that to see a painting of himself in the following age, was beneath the notice of an enlightened mind. These reasons also induced him to conceal the day, the hour, and the place of his birth. He never made use of medicines, and though his body was often debilitated by abstinence or too much study, he despised to have recourse to a physician, and thought that it would degrade the gravity of a philosopher. His writings have been collected by his pupil Porphyry. They consist of 54 different treatises divided into six equal parts, written with great spirit and vivacity; but the reasonings are abstruse, and the subjects metaphysical. The best edition is that of Picinus, fol. Basil, 1580.

PLUTARCHUS, a native of Chæronea, descended of a respectable family. His father, whose name is unknown, was distinguished for his learning and virtues, and his grandfather, called Lamprias, was also as conspicuous for his eloquence and the fecundity of his genius. At Athens, under Ammonius, he was made acquainted with philosophy and mathematics, and so well established was his character, that he was appointed by his countrymen, while yet very young, to go to the Roman consul, in their name, upon an affair of the most important nature. This commission he executed with honour to himself and with success for his country. He afterwards travelled in quest of knowledge, and after he had visited, like a philosopher and an historian, the territories of Egypt and Greece, he retired to Rome, where he opened a school. His reputation made his school frequented. The emperor Adrian admired his abilities, and honoured him with the office of consul, and appointed him governor of Illyricum. After the death of his imperial benefactor, Plutarch removed from Rome to Chæronea, where he lived in the greatest tranquillity, respected by his fellow-citizens, and raised to all the honours which his native town could bestow. In this peaceful and solitary retreat, Plutarch closely applied himself to study, and wrote the greatest part of his works, and particularly his lives. [The work is entitled Βίαι παράλληλοι, "Parallel Lives." It contains an account of 44 distinguished individuals, Greeks and Romans, who are compared in such a way, that a Roman and a Greek are always put in opposition to one another. There are, besides these, five other isolated biographies, while 12 or 14 are lost.] He died in an advanced age at Chæronea, about the 140th year of the Christian era. Plutarch had five children by his wife called Timoxena, four sons and one daughter. Two of the sons and the daughter died when young, and those that survived were called Plutarch and Lamprias, and the latter did honour to his father's memory, by giving to the world an accurate catalogue of his writings. In his private and public character, the historian of Chæronea was the friend of discipline. He boldly asserted the natural right of mankind, liberty; but he recommended obedience and submissive deference to magistrates, as necessary to preserve the peace of society. He supported that the most violent and dangerous public factions arose too often from private disputes, and from misunderstanding. To render himself more intelligent, he always carried a common place-book with him, and he preserved with the greatest care whatever judicious observations fell in the course of conversation. The most esteemed of his works are his lives of illustrious men, of whom he examines and delineates the different characters with wonderful skill and impartiality. He neither misrepresents the virtues nor hides the foibles of his heroes. He writes with precision and with fidelity, and though his diction is neither pure nor elegant, yet there is energy and animation, and in many descriptions he is inferior to no historian. [His ignorance of the Latin tongue, which he himself avows in his biographies of Cato and Demosthenes, causes him to fall into many errors on the subject of Roman history.] In some of his narrations, however, he is often too circumstantial, his remarks are often injudicious; and when he compares the heroes of Greece with those of Rome, the candid reader can easily imagine which side of the Adriatic gave the historian birth. [The great fault of Plutarch is a neglect of the order of chronology, so much so that his narration oftentimes presents nothing but a confused mass of facts, and the perusal of his Lives not unfrequently leaves only a confused impression on the mind.] Some have accused him of not knowing the genealogy of his heroes, and have censured him for his superstition; yet for all this, he is the most entertaining, the most instructive and interesting of all the writers of ancient history; and were a man of true taste and judgment asked what book he wished to save from destruction of all the profane compositions of antiquity, he would perhaps without hesitation reply, the Lives of Plutarch. In his moral treatises, Plutarch appears in a different character, and his misguided philosophy, and erroneous doctrines, render some of these inferior compositions puerile and disgusting. They, however, contain many useful lessons and curious facts; and though they are composed without connection, compiled without judgment, and often abound with improbable stories, and false reasonings, yet they contain much information and many useful reflections. The best editions of Plutarch are that of Francfort, 2 vols. fol. 1599; that of Stephens, 6 vols. 8vo. 1572; the Lives by Reiske, 12 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1775; and the Moralia, &c. by Wytenbach. Plut.

PLUTO, a son of Saturn and Ops, inherited his father's kingdom with his brothers Jupiter and Neptune. [vid. the end of this article.] He received as his lot the kingdom of hell, and whatever lies under the earth, and as such he became the god of the infernal regions, of death and funerals. From his functions, and the place he inhabited, he received different names. He was called Dis, Hades, or Ades, Clytopolon, Agelastus, Orcus, &c. As the place of his residence was obscure and gloomy, all the goddesses refused to marry him; but he determined to obtain by force what was denied to his solicitations. As he once visited the island of Sicily, after a violent earthquake, he saw Proserpine, the daughter of Ceres, gathering flowers in the plains of Enna, with a crowd of female attendants. He became enamoured of her, and immediately carried her away upon his chariot drawn by four horses. To make this retreat more unknown, he opened himself a passage through the earth, by striking it with his trident in the lake of Cyane in Sicily, or, according to others, on the borders of the Cephissus in Attica. Proserpine called upon her attendants for help, but in vain, and she became the wife of her ravisher, and the queen of hell. Pluto is generally represented as holding a trident with two teeth, he has also keys in his hand, to imitate that whoever enters his kingdom can never return. He is looked upon as a hard-hearted and inexorable god, with a grim and dismal countenance, and for that reason no temples were raised to his honour as to the rest of the superior gods. Black victims, and particularly a bull, were the only sacrifices which were offered to him, and their blood was not sprinkled on the altars, or received in vessels, as at other sacrifices, but it was permitted to run down into the earth, as if it were to penetrate as far as the realms of the god. The Syracusans yearly sacrificed to him black bulls, near the fountain of Cyane, where, according to the received traditions, he had disappeared with Proserpine. Among plants, the cypress, the narcissus and the maiden-hair, were sacred to him, as also every thing which was deemed inauspicious, particularly the number two. According to some of the ancients, Pluto sat on a throne of sulphur, from which issued the rivers Lethe, Cocytus, Phlegethon, and Acheron. The dog Cerberus watched at his feet, the harpies hovered round him, Proserpine sat on his left, and near to the goddess stood the Eumenides, with their heads covered with snakes. The Parcæ occupied the right, and they each held in their hands the symbols of their office, the distaff, the spindle, and the scissors. Pluto is called by some the father of the Eumenides. During the war of the gods and the Titans, the Cyclops made a helmet, which rendered the bearer invisible, and gave it to Pluto. Perseus was armed with it when he conquered the Gorgons. [Banier is of opinion that Pluto was reckoned the god of hell because he lived in a very lone country compared with that where Jupiter had fixed his empire. This country was the extremity of Spain, where he busily employed himself in working at the gold and silver mines, which abounded near Cadiz, where he fixed his residence. Hence he obtained the name of Pluto, the god of riches, and has been sometimes confounded with Plutus. Besides, Pluto's kingdom was not only low in respect of situation compared with Greece, but as Pluto employed labourers in the mines, who dug into the bowels of the earth in search of hidden treasure, he was reckoned king of the lower world.] *Hesiod. PLUTUS, son of Jason or Jasius, by Ceres, the goddess of corn, has been confounded by many of the mythologists with Pluto, though plainly distinguished from him as being the god of riches. He was brought up by the goddess of peace, and, on that account, Peace was represented at Athens as holding the god of wealth in her lap. The Greeks spoke of him as of a fickle divinity. They represented him as blind, because he distributed riches indiscriminately. he was lame, because he came slow and gradually; but had wings, to intimate that he flew away with more velocity than he approached mankind. Lucian. in Tim.—Paus. 9, c. 16 and 26.—*Hygin. PLUVIUS, a surname of Jupiter as god of rain. He was invoked by that name among the Romans, whenever the earth was parched up by continual heat, and was in want of refreshing showers. He had an altar in the temple on the capitol. Tibull. 1, el. 7, v. 26.

PLYNTERIA, a festival among the Greeks, in honour of Aglauros, or rather of Minerva, who received from the daughter of Cecrops the name of Aglauros. The word seems to be derived from πλυννι, lavare, because, during the solemnity, they undressed the statue of the goddess, and washed it. The day on which it was observed was universally looked upon as unfortunate and inauspicious, and on that account, no person was permitted to appear in the temples, as they were purposely surrounded with ropes. The arrival of Alcibiades in Athens that day was deemed very unfortunate; but, however, the success that ever after attended him, proved it to be otherwise. It was customary at this festival to bear in procession a cluster of figs, which intimated the progress of civilization among the first inhabitants of the earth, as figs served them for food after they had found a dislike for acorns. Pollux.

PNYX, a place of Athens set apart by Solon for holding assemblies. [It was so called δία το πετυκνωθαι εν αυτη τους Βουλευτας, "from the crowding together of the people in it." The Pnyx was near the citadel. In later times the theatre of Bacchus was the usual place for public assemblies.] C. Nep. Att. 3.—Plut. in Thes. & Them.

PODALIRIUS, a son of Æsculapius and Epione. He was one of the pupils of the Centaur Chiron, and he made himself under him such a master of medicine, that during the Trojan war, the Greeks invited him to their camp to stop a pestilence which had baffled the skill of all their physicians. Some, however, suppose, that he went to the Trojan war not in the capacity of a physician in the Grecian army, but as a warrior, attended by his brother Machaon, in 30 ships with soldiers from Cælia, Ithome, and Tricca. At his return from the Trojan war, Podalirius was shipwrecked on the coast of Caria, where he cured of the falling sickness and married a daughter of Damætas, the king of the place. He fixed his habitation there, and built two towns, one of which he called Synna, by the name of his wife. The Carians, after his death, built him a temple, and paid him divine honours. Dactyls. Cret.—Q. Smyrn. 6 and 9.—Ovid. de Art. Am. 2. Trist. el. 6.—Paus 3.

PODARCES, a son of Iphiclus of Thessaly, who went to the Trojan war.—The first name of Priam. When Troy was taken by Hercules, he was redeemed from slavery by his sister Hesione, and from thence received the name of Priam. [vid. Priamus.]

PODARGE, one of the Harpies, mother of two of the horses of Achilles, by the Zephyrs. The word intimates the swiftness of her feet.

POEAS, the father of Philoctetes. The son is often called Pœantia prolos on account of his father. Ovid. Met. 13, v. 45.

PŒCILE, a celebrated portico at Athens, which received its name from the variety (ποικιλος;) of paintings which it contained. It was there that Zeno kept his school, and the stoics also received their lectures there, whence their name (ἄσος, a porch.) The Pœcile was adorned with pictures of gods and benefactors, and among many others was that of the siege and sacking of Troy, the battle of Theseus against the Amazons, the fight between the Lacedæmonians and Athenians at Cnoe in Argolis, and of Atticus the great friend of Athens. The only reward which Miltiades obtained after the battle of Marathon was to have his picture drawn more conspicuous than that of the rest of the officers that fought with him, in the representation which was made of the engagement which was hung up in the Pœcile, in commemoration of that celebrated victory. C. Nep. in Milit. & in Attic. 3.—Paus. 1.—Plin. 35.

PŒNI, a name given to the Carthaginians. It seems to be a corruption of the word Phœni, or Phœnices, as the Carthaginians were of Phœnician origin. Serv. ad Virg. 1, v. 302.

POGON, a harbour of the Træzenians on the coast of the Peloponnesus. It received this name on account of its appearing to come forward before the town of Træzene, as the beard (πρωγων) does from the chin. Strab. 8.—Mela, 2.

POLA, a city of Istria, founded by the Colchians, and afterwards made a Roman colony, and called Pœlas Julia. [It was made the eastern limit of Italy in the time of Augustus.] Plin. 3, c. 9.—Mela, 2, c. 3.—Strab. 1 and 5.

POLEMARCHUS. [vid. Archon.]

PŒLÈMON, a youth of Athens, son of Philostratus. He was much given to debauchery and extravagance, and spent the greatest part of his life in riot and drunkenness. He once, when intoxicated, entered the school of Xenocrates while the philosopher was giving his pupils a lecture upon the effects of intemperance, and he was so struck with the eloquence of the academician, and the force of his arguments, that from that moment he renounced the dissipated life he had led, and applied himself totally to the study of philosophy. He was then in the 30th year of his age, and from that time he never drank any other liquor but water; and after the death of Xenocrates he succeeded in the school where his reformation had been effected. He died about 270 years before Christ, in an extreme old age. Diog. in vitâ.—Horat. 2, sat. 3, v. 254.—Val. Max. 6, c. 9.—A son of Zeno the rhetorician, made king of Pontus by Antony. He attended his patron in his expedition against Parthia. After the battle of Actium he was received into favour by Augustus, though he had fought in the cause of Antony. He was killed some time after by the Barbarians near the Palus Mæotis, against whom he had made war. Strab.—Dion.—His son of the same name was confirmed on his father's throne by the Roman emperors, and the province of Cilicia was also added to his kingdom by Claudius.—A rhetorician at Rome, who wrote a poem on weights and measures, still extant. He was master to Persius the celebrated satirist, and died in the age of Nero.—A sophist of Laodicea in Asia Minor, in the reign of Adrian. He was sent to the emperor with an embassy by his countrymen, which he executed with great success. He was greatly favoured by Adrian, from whom he obtained much money. In the 56th year of his age he buried himself alive as he laboured with the gout. He wrote declamations in Græek.

POLEMONIUM, now Vatija, a town of Pontus, at the east of the mouth of the Thermodon. [It is supposed to have derived its ancient name from the first Polemon, who was made king of this country by Mark Antony. The modern name of the place appears to be derived from the adjacent promontory of Phadisana.]

POLIAS, a surname of Minerva, as protectress of cities.

POLICHNA, a town of Troas on Ida. Herodot. 6, c. 23.—Another of Crete. Thucyd. 2, c. 85.

POLIEIA, a festival at Thebes in honour of Apollo, who was represented there with grey hair, (πολιῆ;) contrary to the practice of all other places. The victim was a bull, but when it happened once that no bull could be found, an ox was taken from the cart and sacrificed. From that time the sacrifice of labouring oxen was deemed lawful, though before it was looked upon as a capital crime.

POLIORCÈTES, (destroyer of cities;) a surname given to Demetrius, son of Antigonus. Plut. in Demet.

POLISMA, a town of Troas, on the Simois. Strab. 13.

PŒLISTRÁTUS, an Epicurean philosopher, born the same day as Hippoclidès, with whom he always lived in the greatest intimacy. They both died at the same hour. Diog.—Val. Max. 1.

POLITES, a son of Priam and Hecuba, killed by Pyrrhus in his father's presence. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 526, &c. His son, who bore the same name, followed Æneas into Italy, and was one of the friends of young Ascanius. Id. 5, v. 564.

POLLA ARGENTARIA, the wife of the poet Lucan. She assisted her husband in correcting the three first books of his Pharsalia. Stat. Sylv. 1 and 2.

POLLENTIA, now Polenza, a town of Liguria in Italy, [south-east of Alba Pompeia,] famous for wool. There was a celebrated battle fought there between the Romans and Alaric king of the Huns, about the 403d year of the Christian era, in which the former, according to some, obtained the victory. Mela, 2, c. 7.—Plin. 8, c. 48.—Suet. Tib. 37.—Sil. 8, v. 598.—Cic. 11, Fam. 13.—A town of Majorca [now Pollensa or Pugliansa. This city was built, as is said, with a view of replacing a Roman colony, founded in that situation, and on this account was called Colonia.] Plin. & Mela.—of Picenum. Liv. 39, c. 44, l. 41, c. 27.

POLLES, a Greek poet, whose writings were so obscure and unintelligible that his name became proverbial. Suidas.

POLLIO, C. Asinius, a Roman consul under the reign of Augustus, who distinguished himself as much by his eloquence and writings as by his exploits in the field. He defeated the Dalmatians, and favoured the cause of Antony against Augustus. He patronized, with great liberality, the poet Virgil and Horace, who have immortalized him in their writings. He was the first who raised a public library at Rome, and indeed his example was afterwards followed by many of the emperors. In his library were placed the statues of all the learned men of every age, and Varro was the only person who was honoured there during his lifetime. He was with J. Cæsar when he crossed the Rubicon. He was greatly esteemed by Augustus when he had become one of his adherents, after the ruin of Antony. Pollio wrote some tragedies, orations, and an history which was divided into 17 books. All these compositions are lost, and nothing remains of his writings except a few letters to Cicero. He died in the 80th year of his age. A. D. 4. He is the person in whose honour Virgil has inscribed his fourth eclogue, Pollio, as a reconciliation was effected between Augustus and Antony during his consulship. The poet, it is supposed by some, makes mention of a son of the consul born about this time, and is lavish in his excursions into futurity, and his predictions of approaching prosperity. [Bishop Horsely has proved with great ability that the eclogue is founded on the old traditions respecting our Saviour, and that he is the child of whom Virgil, without being aware of it, makes mention. Horsely's Sermons, vol. 2, p. 1, seqq.]—Patere, 2, c. 36.—Horat. 2, od. 1, Sat. 1, l. 1.—Virg. Ecl. 3 and 4.—Val. Max. 8, c. 13.—Quint. 10.—Annius, a man accused of sedition before Tiberius, and acquitted. He afterwards conspired against Nero, &c. Tacit.

6, c. 9, l. 15, c. 56.—Vedius, one of the friends of Augustus, who used to feed his fishes with human flesh. This cruelty was discovered when one of his servants broke a glass in the presence of Augustus who had been invited to a feast. The master ordered the servant to be seized; but he threw himself at the feet of the emperor, and begged him to interfere, and not to suffer him to be devoured by fishes. Upon this the causes of his apprehension were examined, and Augustus, astonished at the barbarity of his favourite, caused the servant to be dismissed, all the fish-ponds to be filled up, and the crystal glasses of Pollio to be broken to pieces. [vid. Pausilypus.]

POLLIVS FELIX, a friend of the poet Statius to whom he dedicated his second Sylva.

POLLUPEX, now Final, a town of Genoa.

POLLUX, [or Πόλυδωνος,] a son of Jupiter by Leda the wife of Tyndarus. He was brother to Castor. [vid. Castor.]—A Greek writer, who flourished A. D. 186, in the reign of Commodus, and died in the 68th year of his age. He was born at Naucratis, and taught rhetoric at Athens, and wrote an useful book, called Onomasticon, of which the best edition is that of Hemsterhusius, 2 vols. Amst. 1706. [Pollux does not follow the Alphabetical order, but has divided his work into nine books, according to the subjects of which he treats. He treats of antiquities, terms of art, agriculture, hunting, and in fact almost every subject that can be enumerated.]—[There was another of the same name, but much posterior. He probably flourished about the end of the 4th century, and was the author of "Chronicon" in Greek, which commences at the Creation and comes down to the reign of the emperor Valens. There is an edition published by Hardt, 8vo. Lips. 1792. Hardt supposed that this work was just newly discovered; but the Abbé Morelli has proved that this is the same work with that entitled, Historia Sacra ab orbe condito ad Valentinianum et Valentem Imp. a Biancono. Bonon. 1779, fol.]

POLUSCA, a town of Latium, formerly the capital of the Volsci. The inhabitants were called Pollustini. Liv. 2, c. 39.

POLYÆNUS, a native of Macedonia, who wrote eight books in Greek of stratagems, which he dedicated to the emperors Antoninus and Verus, while they were making war against the Parthians. [The work originally contained 900 examples of warlike stratagems, of which 833 are now remaining.] He wrote also other books, which have been lost, among which was an history, with a description of the city of Thebes. The best editions of his stratagems is that of Masvicius, 8vo. L. Bat. 1756.—An orator in the age of Julius Cæsar. He wrote in three books an account of Antony's expedition in Parthia, and likewise published orations.—A mathematician, who afterwards followed the tenets of Epicurus, and disregarded geometry as a false and useless study. Cic. in Acad. quæst. 4.

POLYBIUS, or POLYBVS, a king of Corinth, who married Peribœa, whom some have called Merope. He was son of Mercury by Chthonophyle, the daughter of Sicyon, king of Sicyon. He permitted his wife, who had no children, to adopt and educate as her own son, Œdipus, who had been found by his shepherds exposed in the woods. He had a daughter called Lysianassa, whom he gave in marriage to Talaus, son of Bias king of Argos. As he had no male child, he left his kingdom to Adrastus, who had been banished from his throne, and who fled to Corinth for protection. Hygin. fab. 66.—Paus. 2, c. 6.—Apollod. 3, c. 5.—Seneca in Œdip. 312.

POLYBIUS, a native of Megalopolis in Arcadia, son of Lycortas. He was early initiated in the duties, and made acquainted with the qualifications of a statesman, by his father, who was a strong supporter of the Achæan league, and under Philopœmen he was taught the art of war. [He played a distinguished part in the history of his country as ambassador to the Roman generals, and as a commander of the Achæan cavalry. At the age of about 15 years he was selected by his father, one of the chiefs of the Achæan league, to join an embassy to Egypt; which, however, was not sent. At the age of forty years he was carried as a hostage to Rome, and continued there for the space of 17 years.] He became the friend, the counsellor, and the companion in arms of the younger Africanus. He accompanied him in his expeditions, and was present at the taking of Carthage and Numantia. In the midst of his prosperity, however, he felt the distresses of his country, which had been reduced into a Roman province, and, like a true patriot, he relieved its wants, and eased its servitude by making use of the influence which he had acquired by his acquaintance with the most powerful Romans. [In order to collect materials for his great historical work, which he now projected, he travelled into Gaul, Spain, and even traversed a part of the Atlantic. Scipio gave him access to the registers or records, known by the name of libri censuales, which were preserved in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, as well as to other historic monuments. On his return to Greece, after the decree of the senate which granted the Achæan hostages permission to return to their homes, he proved of great service to his countrymen, and endeavoured, though fruitlessly, to dissuade them from a war with the Romans. The war broke out when he was in Africa, whither he had accompanied Scipio, and with whom he was present at the taking of Carthage. He hastened home, but appears to have arrived only after the fall of Corinth. Greece having been reduced under the Roman power, he traversed the Peloponnesus as commissary, and by his mild and obliging deportment, won the affections of all. Some years after, he travelled into Egypt; in the year of Rome 620, he accompanied Scipio into Spain.] He died in the 82d year of his age, about 124 years before Christ, of a wound which he had received by a fall from his horse. He wrote an universal history in Greek, divided into 40 books. [It was entitled Ἱστορία καθολικὴ, "General History," and embraced a period of 53 years, from the commencement of the second Punic war, (A. U. C. 555,) to the reduction of Macedonia into a Roman province, (A. U. C. 587). Thirty-eight books were devoted to the events of this period; while two others precede them, and serve as an introduction to the work. In these last the historian runs rapidly over the interval which had elapsed between the taking of Rome by the Gauls and the first descent of the Romans in Sicily, and after this enumerates what had occurred up to the commencement of the second Punic war. His object was to prove that the Romans did not owe their greatness to a mere blind fatality; he wished it to be made known by what steps, and by favour of what events, they had become masters, in so short a time, of so extensive an empire. His history is of a general nature, because he does not confine himself merely to those events which related to the Romans, but embraces, at the same time, whatever had passed during that period among every nation of the known world. Of the forty books which it originally comprehended, time has only spared the first five entire. Of the rest, as far as the seventeenth, we have merely fragments, though of considerable size. Of the remaining books we have nothing left except what is found in two meagre abridgments which the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus, in the tenth century, caused to be made of the whole work. The one of these is entitled "Embassies," or the history of treaties of peace; the other is styled "Virtues and Vices." Among the fragments that remain of Polybius, are from the 17th to the 40th chapters of the sixth book, inclusive, which treat of the Roman art of war, and have often been published separately under this title. That part of the history which is lost embraced the history of those events of which the historian was himself an eye-witness; an irreparable loss for us; though Livy made frequent use of it.] The history of Polybius is admired for its authenticity, and he is, perhaps, the only historian among the Greeks who was experimentally and professedly acquainted with the military operations and the political measures of which he makes mention. He has been recommended in every age and country as the best master in the art of war, and nothing can more effectually prove the esteem in which he was held among the Romans, than to mention that Brutus, the murderer of Cæsar, perused his history with the greatest attention, epitomized it, and often retired from the field where he had drawn his sword against Octavius and Antony, to read the instructive pages which described the great actions of his ancestors. [The history of Polybius possesses in one respect, a peculiar character, distinguishing it from the works of all the historians which had preceded him. Not content with relating events in the order in which they had occurred, he goes back to the causes which produced them; he unfolds their attendant circumstances, and the consequences which they have brought with them. He judges the actions of men, and paints the characters of the principal actors. In a word, he forms the judgment of the reader, and causes him to indulge in reflections which ought to prepare him for the administration of public affairs (πραγματι). Hence the title of his history, ἱστορία πραγματικῆ. The style of Polybius is not elegant. He wrote after the purity of the Attic dialect had departed; and introduces, besides, many Latinisms into his work. Perhaps too, his long sojourning among strangers had caused him to forget some of the nicer features of his native tongue.] Notwithstanding, however, the faulty nature of his style, still every where there is instruction to be found, information to be collected, and curious facts to be obtained; and it reflects not much honour upon Livy for calling the historian from whom he has copied whole books almost word for word, without gratitude or acknowledgment, haudquaquam spernendus auctor. Dionysius of Halicarnassus is one of his most violent accusers; but the historian has rather exposed his ignorance of true criticism than discovered inaccuracy or inelegance. [Dionysius remarks that no man of taste can endure to read the work of Polybius to the end. It is strange that he did not take into consideration the highly attractive nature of the events, and the spirit with which they are narrated. Besides his general history, Polybius wrote "Memoirs of the life of Philipœmen," a work on "Tactics," and a letter on "the situation of Laconia." From a passage of Cicero, moreover, (Ep. ad Fam. 5, 12,) it would appear that Polybius had written a detached "history of the Numantine war."] The best editions of Polybius are those of Gronovius, 3 vols. 8vo. Amst. 1670, of Ernesti, 3 vols. 8vo. 1764, and of Schweighauser, 7 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1785. [An eighth volume was added in 1794-5, in two parts; the first containing the remainder of the annotations, and an historical and geographical index; the second part forming a valuable Lexicon Polybianum. This costly and elaborate edition well deserves to be ranked as the editio optima. Orellius published in 1813, from the Leipzig press, the commentary of Æneas Tacticus, in one vol. 8vo. as a supplement to this edition.] Plut. in Phil. in Præc.—Liv. 30, c. 45.—Paus. 8, c. 36.

POLYBOTES, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was killed by Neptune, who crushed him under a part of the island of Cos, as he was walking across the Ægean. Paus. 1, c. 2.—Hygin. in præ. fab.

POLYBUS. vid. Polybius.

POLYCARPUS, a famous Greek writer, born at Smyrna, and educated at the expense of a rich but pious lady. Some suppose that he was St. John's disciple. He became bishop of Smyrna, and went to Rome to settle the festival of Easter, but to no purpose. He was condemned to be burnt at Smyrna, A. D. 167. [When he was going to the flames, the pro-consul offered him his life if he would blaspheme Christ, to which the venerable prelate answered, eighty and six years have I served him, and he has ever treated me with kindness, how then can I blaspheme him? His epistle to the Philippians is simple and modest, yet replete with useful precepts and rules for the conduct of life. The best edition of Polycarp's epistle is that of Oxon, 8vo. 1708, being annexed to the works of Ignatius.

POLYCLEES, a famous athlete, often crowned at the four solemn games of the Greeks. He had a statue in Jupiter's grove at Olympia. Paus. 6, c. 1.

POLYCLÉTUS, a celebrated statuary of Siccyon, about 232 years before Christ. He was universally reckoned the most skilful artist of his profession among the ancients, and the second rank was given to Phidias. One of his pieces, in which he had represented a body-guard of the king of Persia, was so happily executed, and so nice and exact in all its proportions, that it was looked upon as a most perfect model, and accordingly called the Rule. He was acquainted with architecture. Paus. 2 and 6.—Quintil. 12, c. 10.

—Another who lived about 30 years after.

POLYCRATES, a tyrant of Samos, well known for the continual flow of good fortune which attended him. He became very powerful, and made himself master not only of the neighbouring islands, but also of some cities on the coast of Asia. He had a fleet of a hundred ships of war, and was so universally respected that Amasis, the king of Egypt, made a treaty of alliance with him. The Egyptian monarch, however, terrified by his continued prosperity, advised him to chequer his enjoyments by relinquishing some of his most favourite objects. Polycrates complied, and threw into a sea a beautiful seal, the most valuable of his jewels. The voluntary loss of so precious a seal afflicted him for some time, but a few days after, he received as a present a large fish, in whose belly the jewel was found. Amasis no sooner heard this than he rejected all alliance with the tyrant of Samos, and observed, that sooner or later his good fortune would vanish. Some time after Polycrates visited Magnesia on the Mæander, where he had been invited by Orætes, the governor. He was shamefully put to death, 522 years before Christ, merely because the governor wished to terminate the prosperity of Polycrates. [Herodotus alleges two reasons: one, that Orætes was induced by the reproaches of an acquaintance, the governor of Daseylum, who upbraided him for not having added Samos to the Persian dominions, when it lay so near, and had been seized by a private citizen (Polycrates) with the help of but fifteen armed men; the other, that a messenger from Orætes had been disrespectfully treated by Polycrates.] The daughter of Polycrates had dissuaded her father from going to the house of Orætes, on account of the bad dreams which she had, but her advice was disregarded. [She dreamt that she saw her father aloft in the air, washed by Jupiter and anointed by the sun. The circumstance of her father being suspended on a cross fulfilled the vision. He was washed by Jupiter, that is, by the rain, and anointed by the sun, "which extracted," says Herodotus, "the moisture from his body."] Paus. 3, c. 14.—Strab. 14.—Herodot. 3, c. 39, &c.—A sophist of Athens, who, to engage the public attention, wrote a panegyric on Buciris and Clytemnestra. Quintil. 2, c. 17.—An ancient statuary.

POLYDĀMAS, a Trojan, son of Antenor by Theano, the sister of Hecuba. He married Lycaste, a natural daughter of Priam. He is accused by some of having betrayed his country to the Greeks. Dares Phryg.—A son of Panthous, born the same night as Hector. He was inferior in valour to none of the Trojans except Hector, and his prudence, the wisdom of his counsels, and the firmness of his mind, claimed equal admiration, and proved most salutary to his unfortunate and misguided countrymen. He was at last killed by Ajax, after he had slaughtered a great number of the enemy. Dictys Cret. 1, &c.—Homer. Il. 12, &c.—A celebrated athlete, son of Nicias, who imitated Hercules in whatever he did. He killed a lion with his fist, and it is said that he could stop a chariot with his hand in its most rapid course. He was one day with some of his friends in a cave, when, on a sudden, a large piece of rock came tumbling down, and while all fled away, he attempted to receive the falling fragment in his arms. His prodigious strength, however, was insufficient, and he was instantly crushed to pieces under the rock. Paus. 6, c. 5.

POLYDĀMNA, a wife of Thonis king of Egypt. It is said that she gave Helen a certain powder which had the wonderful power of driving away care and melancholy. Homer. Od. 4, v. 228.

POLYDECTES, a king of Sparta, of the family of the Proclidæ. He was son of Eunomus. Paus. 3, c. 7.—A son of Magnes, king of the island of Seriphos. He received with great kindness Danae and her son Perseus, who had been exposed on the sea by Acrisius. (vid. Perseus.) He took particular care of the education of Perseus; but when he became enamoured of Danae, he removed him from his kingdom, apprehensive of his resentment. Some time after he paid his addresses to Danae, and when she rejected him, he prepared to offer her violence. Danae fled to the altar of Minerva for protection, and Dictys, the brother of Polydectes, who had himself saved her from the waves, opposed her ravisher, and armed himself in her defence. At this critical moment, Perseus arrived, and with Medusa's head he turned into stones Polydectes, with the associates of his guilt. The crown of Seriphos was given to Dictys who had shown himself so active in the cause of innocence. Ovid. Met. 5, v. 242.—Hygin fab. 63, &c.

POLYDŌRA, a daughter of Peleus, king of Thessaly, by Antigone, the daughter of Eurytion. She married the river Sperchius, by whom she had Mnestheus. Apollod.—One of the Oceanides. Hesiod.—A daughter of Meleager king of Calydon, who married Protesilaus. She killed herself when she heard that her husband was dead. The wife of Protesilaus is more commonly called Laodamia. [vid. Protesilaus.] Paus. 4, c. 2.—An island of the Propontis near Cyzicus.

POLYDŌRUS, a son of Alcamenes, king of Sparta. He put an end to the war which had been carried on during 20 years between Messenia and his subjects, and during his reign the Lacedæmonians planted two colonies, one at Crotona, and the other among the Locri. He was universally respected. He was assassinated by a nobleman, called Polemarchus. His son Eurycrates succeeded him 724 years before Christ. Herodot. 7, c. 204.—A celebrated carver of Rhodes, who with one stone made the famous statue of Laocoon and his children. Plin. 34, c. 8.—A son of Hippomedon, who went with the Epigoni to the second Theban war. Paus. 2.—A son of Cadmus and Hermione, who married Nycteis, by whom he had Labdacus, the father of Laius. He succeeded to the throne of Thebes when his father had gone to Illyricum. Apollod. 3.—A brother of Jason of Pheræ, who killed his brother, and seized upon his possessions. Diod. 15.—A son of Priam killed by Achilles.—Another son of Priam by Hecuba, or, according to others, by Laothoe, the daughter of Altes, king of Pedæus. As he was young and inexperienced when Troy was besieged by the Greeks, his father removed him to the court of Polymnestor, king of Thrace, and also intrusted to the care of the monarch a large sum of money, and the greatest part of his treasures, till his country was freed from foreign invasion. No sooner was the death of Priam known in Thrace than Polymnestor made himself master of the riches which were in his possession, and, to ensure them the better, he assassinated young Polydorus, and threw his body into the sea, where it was found by Hecuba. [vid. Hecuba.] According to Virgil the body of Polydorus was buried near the shore by his assassin, and there grew on his grave a myrtle, whose shoots dropped blood, when Æneas, going to Italy, attempted to tear them from the tree. [vid. Polymnestor.] Virg. Æn. 3, v. 21, &c.—Apollod. 3, c. 12.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 432.—Homer. Il. 20.—Dictys Cret. 2, c. 18.

POLYGNŌTUS, a celebrated painter of Phasos, about 422 years before the Christian era. His father's name was Aglaophon. He adorned one of the public porticoes of Athens with his paintings, in which he represented the most striking events of the Trojan war. He particularly excelled in giving grace, liveliness, and expression to his pieces. The Athenians were so pleased with him, that they offered to reward his labours with whatever he pleased to accept. He declined this generous offer, and the Amphictyonic council, which was composed of the representatives of the principal cities of Greece, ordered that Polygnotus should be maintained at the public expense wherever he went. Quintil. 12, c. 10.—Plin. 33 and 34.—Plut. in Cim.—Paus. 10, c. 25, &c.—A statue. Plin. 34.

POLYHYMNA, and POLYMNIA, one of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over singing and rhetoric, and was deemed the inventress of harmony. POLYDIUS, a physician who brought back to life Glaucus, the son of Minos, by applying to his body a certain herb with which he had seen a serpent restore life to another which was dead. [vid. Glaucus.] Apollod. 3, c. 3.—Paus. 1, c. 43.—A son of Hercules by one of the daughters of Thestius.—Apollod.—A Corinthian soothsayer, called also Polybius.—A dithyrambic poet, painter, and musician.

POLYMNESTES, a Greek poet of Colophon. Paus. 1, c. 14.—A native of Thera, father of Battus or Aristocles, by Phronima, the daughter of Etearchus, king of Oaxus. Herodot. 4, c. 150.

POLYMNESTOR, a king of the Thracian Chersonesus, who married Ilione the eldest of Priam's daughters. When the Greeks besieged Troy, Priam sent the greatest part of his treasures, together with Polydorus, the youngest of his sons, to Thrace, where they were intrusted to the care of Polymnestor. The Thracian monarch paid every attention to his brother-in-law; but when he was informed that Priam was dead, he murdered him to become master of the riches which were in his possession. At that time, the Greeks were returning victorious from Troy, followed by all the captives, among whom was Hecuba, the mother of Polydorus. The fleet stopped on the coasts of Thrace, where one of the female captives discovered on the shore the body of Polydorus, whom Polymnestor had thrown into the sea. The dreadful intelligence was immediately communicated to the mother, and Hecuba, who recollected the frightful dream which she had had on the preceding night, did not doubt but Polymnestor was the cruel assassin. She resolved to revenge her son's death, and immediately she called out Polymnestor, as if wishing to impart to him a matter of the most important nature. The tyrant was drawn into the snare, and was no sooner introduced into the apartments of the Trojan princess, than the female captives rushed upon him, and put out his eyes with their pins, while Hecuba murdered his two children who had accompanied him. According to Euripides, the Greeks condemned Polymnestor to be banished into a distant island for his perfidy. Hyginus, however, relates the whole differently, and observes, that when Polydorus was sent to Thrace, Ilione, his sister, took him instead of her son Deiphilus, who was of the same age, apprehensive of her husband's cruelty. The monarch was unacquainted with the imposition, he looked upon Polydorus as his own son, and treated Deiphilus as the brother of Ilione. After the destruction of Troy, the conquerors, who wished the house and family of Priam to be totally extirpated, offered Electra, the daughter of Agamemnon, to Polymnestor, if he would destroy Ilione and Polydorus. The monarch accepted the offer, and immediately dispatched his own son Deiphilus, whom he had been taught to regard as Polydorus. Polydorus, who passed as the son of Polymnestor, consulted the oracle after the murder of Deiphilus, and when he was informed that his father was dead, his mother a captive in the hands of the Greeks, and his country in ruins, he communicated the answer of the god to Ilione, whom he had always regarded as his mother. Ilione told him the measures she had pursued to save his life, and upon this he avenged the perfidy of Polymnestor by putting out his eyes. Eurip. in Iteub.—Hygin. fab. 109.—*Virg. POLYNICES, a son of Ædipus, king of Thebes, by Jocasta. He inherited his father's throne with his brother Eteocles, and it was mutually agreed between the two brothers that they should reign each a year alternately. Eteocles first ascended the throne by right of seniority; but when the year was expired, he refused to resign the crown to his brother. Polynices, upon this, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, the daughter of Adrastus, the king of the country, and levied a large army, at the head of which he marched to Thebes. The command of his army was divided among seven celebrated chiefs, who were to attack the seven gates of the city of Thebes. The battle was decided by a single combat between the two brothers, who both killed one another. (*vid. POLYPEMON, a famous thief, called also Procrustes, who plundered all the travellers about the Cephissus and near Eleusis in Attica. He was killed by Theseus. Ovid calls him father of Procrustes, and Apollodorus of Sinus. (vid. Procrustes.) Paus. 1, c. 38.—Ovid. in Ib. 409.—Diod. 4.—Plut. in Theb.

POLYPERCHON, or POLYSERPCHON, one of the officers of Alexander. Antipater at his death appointed him governor of the kingdom of Macedonia, in preference to his own son Cassander. Polyperchon, though old, and a man of experience, showed great ignorance in the administration of the government. He became cruel not only to the Greeks, or such as opposed his ambitious views, but even to the helpless and innocent children and friends of Alexander to whom he was indebted for his rise and military reputation. He was killed in a battle 309 B. C. Curt.—Diod. 17, &c.—Justin. 13.

POLYPHĒMUS, a celebrated Cyclops, king of all the Cyclops in Sicily, and son of Neptune and Thoosa, the daughter of Phorcys. [vid. Cyclopes.] He is represented as a monster of strength, of a tall stature, and one eye in the middle of the forehead. He fed upon human flesh, and kept his flocks on the coasts of Sicily, when Ulysses, at his return from the Trojan war, was driven there. The Grecian prince, with twelve of his companions, visited the coast, and were seized by the Cyclops, who confined them in his cave, and daily devoured two of them. Ulysses and all his companions would have perished had they not intoxicated the Cyclops, and put out his eye with a firebrand while he was asleep. Polyphemus, was awakened by the sudden pain, he stopped the entrance of his cave, but Ulysses and his surviving companions escaped by means of the flocks of the Cyclops, as they were led out to feed on the mountains. Polyphemus became enamoured of Galatæa, but his addresses were disregarded, and the nymph shunned his presence. The Cyclops was more earnest, and when he saw Galatæa surrender herself to the pleasures of Acis, he crushed his rival with a piece of a broken rock. Theocrit. 1.—Ovid. Met. 13, v. 772.—*Homer. POLYSPERCHON. vid. Polyperchon.

POLYXĒNA, a daughter of Priam and Hebe, celebrated for her beauty and accomplishments. Achilles became enamoured of her, and solicited her hand, and their marriage would have been consummated, had not Hector, her brother, opposed it. Polyxena, according to some authors, accompanied her father when he went to the tent of Achilles to redeem the body of his son Hector. Some time after the Grecian hero came into the temple of Apollo to obtain a sight of the Trojan princess, but he was murdered there by Paris; and Polyxena, who had returned his affection, was so afflicted at his death, that she went and sacrificed herself on his tomb. Some, however, suppose, that that sacrifice was not voluntary, but that the manes of Achilles appeared to the Greeks as they were going to embark, and demanded of them the sacrifice of Polyxena. The princess, who was in the number of the captives, was upon this dragged to her lover's tomb, and there immolated by Neoptolemus, the son of Achilles. Ovid. Met. 13, fab. 5, &c.—Dictys. Cret. 3 and 5.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 321.—Catull. ep. 65.—Hygin. fab. 90.

POLYXO, a priestess of Apollo's temple in Lemnos. She was also nurse to queen Hypsipyle. It was by her advice that the Lemnian women murdered all their husbands. Apolon. 1.—Flacc. 2.—Hygin. fab. 15—A native of Argos, who married Tlepolemus, son of Hercules. She followed him to Rhodes after the murder of his uncle Lycymnius, and when he departed for the Trojan war with the rest of the Greek princes, she became the sole mistress of the kingdom. After the Trojan war, Helen fled from Peloponnesus to Rhodes, where Polyxo reigned. Polyxo detained her, and, to punish her as being the cause of a war in which Tlepolemus had perished, she ordered her to be hanged on a tree by her female servants, disguised in the habit of Furies. (vid. Helena.) Paus. 5, c. 19.

POLYZĒLUS, a Greek poet of Rhodes. He had written a poem on the origin and birth of Bacchus, Venus, the Muses, &c. Some of his verses are quoted by Athenæus. Hygin. P. A. 2, c. 14.

POMETIA, POMETII, and POMETIA SUESSA, [a town of Italy and capital of the Volsci. It was taken by the Romans in the early part of the reign of Tarquinius Superbus. From the sale of the plunder a sum of 40 talents was obtained, which was set apart by the king for the erection of the capitol.] It was totally destroyed by the Romans, because it had revolted. Virg. Æn. 6, v. 775.—Liv. 2, c. 17.

POMŌNA, a nymph at Rome who was supposed to preside over gardens, and to be the goddess of all sorts of fruit-trees. She had a temple at Rome, and a regular priest, called Flamen Pomonalis, who offered sacrifices to her divinity for the preservation of fruit. She was generally represented as sitting on a basket full of flowers and fruit, and holding a bough in one hand, and apples in the other. Pomona was particularly delighted with the cultivation of the earth, she disdained the toils of the field, and the fatigues of hunting. Many of the gods of the country endeavoured to gain her affection, but she received their addresses with coldness. Vertumnus was the only one who, by assuming different shapes, and introducing himself into her company under the form of an old woman, prevailed upon her to break her vow of celibacy and to marry him. This deity was unknown among the Greeks. Ovid. Met. 14, v. 628, &c.—Festus. de V. sig.

POMPEIA, a daughter of Pompey the Great, Julius Cæsar's third wife. She was accused of incontinence, because Clodius had introduced himself in women's clothes into the room where she was celebrating the mysteries of Cybele. Cæsar repudiated her upon this accusation. Plut.—There was a portico at Rome, called Pompeia, much frequented by all orders of people. Ovid. Art. Am. v. 67.—Mart. 11, ep. 48.

POMPEIA LEX, by Pompey the Great, de ambitu, A. U. C. 701. It ordained that whatever person had been convicted of the crime of ambitus, should be pardoned, provided he could impeach two others of the same crime and occasion the condemnation of one of them. —Another by the same, A. U. C. 701, which forbade the use of Laudatores in trials, or persons who gave a good character of the prisoner then impeached.—Another by the same, A. U. C. 683. It restored to the tribunes their original power and authority, of which they had been deprived by the Cornelian law.—Another by the same, A. U. C. 701. It shortened the forms of trials, and enacted that the three first days of a trial should be employed in examining witnesses, and it allowed only one day to the parties to make their accusation and defence. The plaintiff was confined to two hours, and the defendant to three. This law had for its object the riots which happened from the quarrels of Clodius and Milo.—Another by the same, A. U. C. 698. It required that the judges should be the richest of every century, contrary to the usual form. It was, however, requisite that they should be such as the Aurelian law prescribed.—Another of the same, A. U. C. 701. Pompey was by this empowered to continue in the government of Spain five years longer.

POMPEIANUS, a Roman knight of Antioch, raised to offices of the greatest trust under the emperor Aurelius, whose daughter Lucilla he married. He lived in great popularity at Rome, and retired from the court when Commodus succeeded to the imperial crown. He ought, according to Julian's opinion, to have been chosen and adopted as successor by M. Aurelius.

POMPEII or POMPEIUM, a town of Campania, [about fourteen miles from Naples, on the road to Nocera,] built, as some suppose, by Hercules, and so called because the hero there exhibited the long procession (pompa) of the herds of Geryon, which he had obtained by conquest. It was partly demolished by an earthquake, A. D. 63, and afterwards rebuilt. Sixteen years after it was swallowed up by another earthquake, which accompanied one of the eruptions of Mount Vesuvius. Herculaneum, in its neighbourhood, shared the same fate. The people of the town were then assembled in a theatre, where public spectacles were exhibited. [It was probably situate on an arm of the sea, and served as a port for the inland towns. This inlet of the sea has been filled up by successive eruptions, besides that which destroyed the town. The opinion generally maintained, that the people of this city were surprised and overwhelmed by the volcanic storm while in the theatre, is not a very probable one. The number of skeletons discovered in Pompeii does not exceed 60; and ten times this number would be inconsiderable when compared with the extent and population of the city. Besides, the first agitation and threatening aspect of the mountain must have filled every breast with terror, and banished all gaiety and amusement. No doubt the previous intimations were of such a nature as to have fully apprized the inhabitants of their danger, and induced the great mass of them to save themselves by flight. The discovery of Pompeii, (vid. Herculaneum,) after having lain so long buried and unknown, has furnished us with many curious and valuable remains of antiquity.] Liv. 9, c. 38.—Strab. 6—Mela, 2, c. 4.—Dionys. 1.—Seneca. Quest. 4.—Solin. 8.

Q. POMPEIUS, a consul who carried on war against the Numantines, and made a shameful treaty. He is the first of that noble family of whom mention is made. Flor. 2, c. 18.—Cneus, a Roman general who made war against the Marsi, and triumphed over the Piceni. He declared himself against Cinna and Marius, and supported the interest of the republic. He was surnamed Strabo, because he squinted. While he was marching against Marius, a plague broke out in his army, and raged with such violence, that it carried away 11,000 men in a few days. He was killed by a flash of lightning, and as he had behaved with cruelty while in power, the people dragged his body through the streets of Rome with an iron hook, and threw it into the Tiber. Paterc. 2.—Plut. in Pomp.—Rufus, a Roman consul with Sylla. He was sent to finish the Marsian war, but the army mutinied at the instigation of Pompeius Strabo, whom he was to succeed in command, and he was assassinated by some of the soldiers. Appian. Civ. 1.—A general, who succeeded Metellus in Spain, and was the occasion of a war with Numantia.—Sextus, a governor of Spain, who cured himself of the gout by placing himself in corn above the knee. Plin. 22, c. 25.—A consul praised for his learning and abilities. Ovid. ex Pont. 4, ep. 1.—A son of Theophanes of Mitylene, famous for his intimacy with Pompey the Great, and for his writings. Tacit. Ann. 6.—A knight put to death by the emperor Claudius for his adultery with Messalina, Tacit. 11, Ann.—Cneus, surnamed Magnus, from the greatness of his exploits, was son of Pompeius Strabo, and Lucilla. He early distinguished himself in the field of battle, and fought with success and bravery under his father, whose courage and military prudence he imitated. He began his career with great popularity, the beauty and elegance of his person gained him admirers, and by pleading at the bar, he displayed his eloquence, and received the most unbounded applause. In the disturbances which agitated Rome, by the ambition and avarice of Marius and Sylla, Pompey followed the interest of the latter, and by levying three legions for his service he gained his friendship and his protection. In the 26th year of his age he conquered Sicily, which was in the power of Marius and his adherents, and in 40 days he regained all the territories of Africa which had forsaken the interest of Sylla. This rapid success astonished the Romans, and Sylla, who admired and dreaded the rising power of Pompey, recalled him to Rome. Pompey immediately obeyed, and the dictator, by saluting him with the appellation of the Great, showed to the world what expectations he formed from the maturer age of his victorious lieutenant.

This sounding title was not sufficient to gratify the ambition of Pompey; he demanded a triumph, and when Sylla refuse to grant it, he emphatically exclaimed, that the sun shone with more ardour at his rising than at his setting. His assurance gained what petitions and entreaties could not obtain, and he was the first Roman knight who, without an office under the appointment of the senate, marched in triumphal procession through the streets of Rome. He now appeared, not as a dependent, but as a rival of the dictator, and his opposition to his measures totally excluded him from his will. After the death of Sylla, Pompey supported himself against the remains of the Marian faction, which were headed by Lepidus. He defeated them, put an end to the war which the revolt of Sertorius in Spain had occasioned, and obtained a second triumph, though still a private citizen, about 73 years before the Christian era. He was soon after made consul, and in that office he restored the tribunitian power to its original dignity, and in forty days removed the pirates from the Mediterranean, where they had reigned for many years, and by their continual plunder and audacity, almost destroyed the whole naval power of Rome. While he prosecuted the piratical war, and extirpated these maritime robbers in their obscure retreats in Cilicia, Pompey was called to greater undertakings, and by the influence of his friends at Rome, and of the tribune Manilius, he was empowered to finish the war against two of the most powerful monarchs of Asia, Mithridates king of Pontus, and Tigranes king of Armenia. In this expedition Pompey showed himself no ways inferior to Lucullus, who was then at the head of the Roman armies, and who resigned with reluctance an office which would have made him the conqueror of Mithridates and the master of all Asia. His operations against the king of Pontus were bold and vigorous, and in a general engagement, the Romans so totally defeated the enemy, that the Asiatic monarch escaped with difficulty from the field of battle. [vid. Mithridaticum bellum.] Pompey did not lose sight of the advantages dispatch would ensure; he entered Armenia, received the submission of king Tigranes, and after he had conquered the Albanians and Iberians, visited countries which were scarce known to the Romans, and, like a master of the world, disposed of kingdoms and provinces, and received homage from 12 crowned heads at once; he entered Syria, and pushed his conquests as far as the Red Sea. Part of Arabia was subdued, Judea became a Roman province, and when he had now nothing to fear from Mithridates, who had voluntarily destroyed himself, Pompey returned to Italy with all the pomp and majesty of an eastern conqueror. The Romans dreaded his approach, they knew his power and his influence among his troops, and they feared the return of another tyrannical Sylla. Pompey, however, banished their fears, he disbanded his army, and the conqueror of Asia entered Rome like a private citizen. This modest and prudent behaviour gained him more friends and adherents than the most unbounded power, aided with profusion and liberality. He was honoured with a triumph, and the Romans, for three successive days, gazed with astonishment on the riches and the spoils which their conquest had acquired in the east, and expressed their raptures at the sight of the different nations, habits, and treasures, which preceded the conqueror's chariot. But it was not this alone which gratified the ambition and flattered the pride of the Romans; the advantages of their conquests were more lasting than an empty show, and when 20,000 talents were brought into the public treasury, and when the revenues of the republic were raised from 50 to 85 millions of drachmæ, Pompey became more powerful, more flattered, and more envied. To strengthen himself, and to triumph over his enemies, Pompey soon after united his interest with that of Cæsar and Crassus, and formed the first triumvirate, by solemnly swearing that their attachment should be mutual, their cause common, and their union permanent. The agreement was completed by the marriage of Pompey with Julia, the daughter of Cæsar, and the provinces of the republic were arbitrarily divided among the triumvirs. Pompey was allotted Africa and the two Spains, while Crassus repaired to Syria, to add Parthia to the empire of Rome, and Cæsar remained satisfied with the rest, and the continuation of his power as governor of Gaul for five additional years. But this powerful confederacy was soon broken; the sudden death of Julia, and the total defeat of Crassus in Syria, shattered the political bands which held the jarring interest of Cæsar and Pompey united. Pompey dreaded his father-in-law, and yet he affected to despise him; and by suffering anarchy to prevail in Rome, he convinced his fellow-citizens of the necessity of investing him with dictatorial power. But while the conqueror of Mithridates was as a sovereign at Rome, the adherents of Cæsar were not silent. They demanded that either the consulship should be given to him, or that he should be continued in the government of Gaul. This just demand would perhaps have been granted, but Cato opposed it, and when Pompey sent for the two legions which he had lent to Cæsar, the breach became more wide, and a civil war inevitable. Cæsar was privately preparing to meet his enemies, while Pompey remained indolent, and gratified his pride in seeing all Italy celebrate his recovery from an indisposition by universal rejoicings. But he was soon roused from his inactivity, and it was now time to find his friends, if any thing could be obtained from the caprice and the fickleness of a people which he had once delighted and amused by the exhibition of games and spectacles in a theatre which could contain 20,000 spectators. Cæsar was now near Rome, he had crossed the Rubicon, which was a declaration of hostilities, and Pompey, who had once boasted that he could raise legions to his assistance by stamping on the ground with his foot, fled from the city with precipitation, and retired to Brundisium with the consuls and part of the senators. His cause, indeed, was popular, he had been invested with discretionary power, the senate had entreated him to protect the republic against the usurpation and tyranny of Cæsar; and Cato, by embracing his cause, and appearing in his camp, seemed to indicate that he was the friend of the republic and the assertor of Roman liberty and independence. But Cæsar was now master of Rome, and in sixty days all Italy acknowledged his power, and the conqueror hastened to Spain, there to defeat the interest of Pompey, and to alienate the hearts of his soldiers. He was too successful, and when he had gained to his cause the western parts of the Roman empire, Cæsar crossed Italy and arrived in Greece, where Pompey had retired, supported by all the powers of the east, the wishes of the republican Romans, and by a numerous and well-disciplined army. Though superior in numbers, he refused to give the enemy battle, while Cæsar continually harassed him, and even attacked his camp. Pompey repelled him with great success, and he might have decided the war if he had continued to pursue the enemy while their confusion was great, and their escape almost impossible. Want of provisions obliged Cæsar to advance towards Thessaly: Pompey pursued him, and in the plains of Pharsalia the two armies engaged. The whole was conducted against the advice and approbation of Pompey, and by suffering his troops to wait for the approach of the enemy, he deprived his soldiers of that advantage which the army of Cæsar obtained by running to the charge with spirit, vigour, and animation. The cavalry of Pompey soon gave way, and the general retired to his camp, overwhelmed with grief and shame. But here there was no safety, the conqueror pushed on every side, and Pompey disguised himself and fled to the sea-coast, whence he passed to Egypt, where he hoped to find a safe asylum till better and more favourable moments returned, in the court of Ptolemy, a prince whom he had once protected and ensured on his throne. When Ptolemy was told that Pompey claimed his protection, he consulted his ministers, and had the baseness to betray and to deceive him. A boat was sent to fetch him on shore, and the Roman general left his galley, after an affectionate and tender parting with his wife Cornelia. The Egyptian sailors sat in sullen silence in the boat, and when Pompey disembarked, Achilles and Septimus assassinated him. His wife, who had followed him with her eyes to the shore was a spectator of the bloody scene, and hastened away from the bay of Alexandria, not to share his miserable fate. He died B. C. 48, in the 58th or 59th year of his age, the day after his birth-day. His head was cut off and sent to Cæsar, who turned away from it with horror, and shed a flood of tears. The body was left for some time naked on the seashore, till the humanity of Philip, one of his freedmen, and an old soldier who had often followed his standard to victory, raised a burning pile, and deposited his ashes under a mound of earth. Cæsar erected a monument on his remains, and the emperor Adrian, two centuries after, when he visited Egypt, ordered it to be repaired at his own expense, and paid particular honour to the memory of a great and good man. The character of Pompey is that of an intriguing and artful general, and the oris probi, and animo invericundo of Sallust, short and laconic as it may appear, is the best and most descriptive picture of his character. He wished it to appear that he obtained all his honour and dignity from merit alone, and as the free and unprejudiced favours of the Romans, while he secretly claimed them by faction and intrigue; and he who wished to appear the patron, and an example of true discipline and ancient simplicity, was not ashamed publicly to bribe the populace to gain an election, or to support his favourites. Yet amidst all this dissimulation, which was perhaps but congenial with the age, we perceive many other striking features; Pompey was kind and clement to the conquered, and generous to his captives, and he buried at his own expense Mithridates, with all the pomp and the solemnity which the greatness of his power and the extent of his dominions seemed to claim. He was an enemy to flattery; and when his character was impeached by the malevolence of party, he condescended, though consul, to appear before the consorial tribunal, and to show that his actions and measures were not subversive of the peace and the independence of the people. In his private character he was as remarkable; he lived with great temperance and moderation, and his house was small, and not ostentatiously furnished. He destroyed with great prudence the papers which were found in the camp of Sertorius, lest mischievous curiosity should find causes to accuse the innocent, and to meditate their destruction. With great disinterestedness he refused the presents which princes and monarchs offered to him, and he ordered them to be added to the public revenue. He might have seen a better fate, and terminated his days with more glory, if he had not acted with such imprudence when the flames of civil war were first kindled; and he reflected with remorse, after the battle of Pharsalia, upon his want of usual sagacity and military prudence, in fighting at such a distance from the sea, and in leaving the fortified places of Dyrrachium, to meet in the open plain an enemy, without provisions, without friends, and without resources. The misfortunes which attended him after the conquest of Mithridates, are attributed by Christian writers to his impiety in profaning the temple of the Jews, and in entering with the insolence of a conqueror the Holy of Holies, where even the sacred person of the high-priest of the nation was not admitted but upon the most solemn occasions. His duplicity of behaviour in regard to Cicero is deservedly censured, and he should not have violently sacrificed to party and sedition a Roman whom he had ever found his firmest friend and adherent. In his meeting with Lucullus he cannot but be taxed with pride, and he might have paid more deference and more honour to a general who was as able and more entitled than himself to finish the Mithridatic war. Pompey married four different times. His first matrimonial connection was with Antistia, the daughter of the prætor Antistius, whom he divorced with great reluctance to marry Æmylia, the daughter-in-law of Sylla. Æmylia died in child-bed; and Pompey's marriage with Julia, the daughter of Cæsar, was a step more of policy than affection. Yet Julia loved Pompey with great tenderness, and her death in child-bed was the signal of war between her husband and her father. He afterwards married Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, a woman commended for her virtues, beauty, and accomplishments. Plut. in vitâ—Flor. 4.—Paterc. 2, c. 29.—Dio. Orat. 68, ad Attic. 7, ep. 25, ad fam. 13, ep. 19.—Eutrop.—The two sons of Pompey the Great, called Cneius and Sextus, were masters of a powerful army, when the death of their father was known. They prepared to oppose the conqueror, but Cæsar pursued them with his usual vigour and success, and at the battle of Munda they were defeated, and Cneius was left among the slain. Sextus fled to Sicily, where he for some time supported himself; but the murder of Cæsar gave rise to new events, and if Pompey had been as prudent and as sagacious as his father, he might have become, perhaps, as great and as formidable. He treated with the triumvirs as an equal, and when Augustus and Antony had the imprudence to trust themselves without arms and without attendants in his ship, Pompey, by following the advice of his friend Menas, who wished him to cut off the illustrious persons who were masters of the world, and now in his power, might have made himself as absolute as Cæsar; but he refused, and observed it was unbecoming the son of Pompey to act with such duplicity. This friendly meeting of Pompey with two of the triumvirs was not productive of advantages to him, he wished to have no superior, and hostilities began. Pompey was at the head of 350 ships, and appeared so formidable to his enemies, and so confident of success in himself, that he called himself the son of Neptune and the lord of the sea. He was, however, soon defeated in a naval engagement; and of all his numerous fleet, only 17 sail accompanied his flight to Asia. Here, for a moment, he raised seditions, but Antony ordered him to be seized and put to death about 35 years before the Christian era. Plut. in Anton. &c.—Paterc. 2, c. 55, &c.—Flor. 4, c. 2, &c.—*Trogus. vid. POMPŌNIA, the wife of Q. Cicero, sister to Pomponius Atticus. She punished with the greatest cruelty Philologus, the slave who had betrayed her husband to Antony, and she ordered him to cut his flesh by piece-meal, and afterwards to boil it and eat it in her presence.

POMPŌNIUS, the father of Numa, advised his son to accept the regal dignity which the Roman ambassadors offered to him.—A celebrated Roman intimate with Cicero. He was surnamed Atticus, from his long residence at Athens. [vid. Atticus.—Mela, a Spaniard, who wrote a book of geography. [vid. Mela.]—A Roman, who accused Manlius the dictator, of cruelty. He triumphed over Sardinia, of which he was made governor. He escaped from Rome and the tyranny of the triumvirs, by assuming the habit of a prætor, and by travelling with his servants disguised in the dress of lictors with their fasces.—Secundus, an officer in Germany in the age of Nero. He was honoured with a triumph for a victory over the Barbarians of Germany. He wrote some poems, greatly celebrated by the ancients for their beauty and elegance. They are lost.

PONS ÆLIUS was built by the emperor Adrian at Rome. It was the second bridge of Rome in following the current of the Tiber. It is still to be seen, the largest and most beautiful in Rome.—Æmylius, an ancient bridge at Rome, originally called Sublucius, because built with wood (sublucæ.) It was raised by Ancus Martius, and dedicated with great pomp and solemnity by the Roman priests. It was rebuilt with stones by Æmylius Lepidus, whose name it assumed. It was much injured by the overflowing of the river, and the emperor Antoninus, who repaired it, made it all of white marble. It was the last of all the bridges of Rome in following the course of the river, and some vestiges of it may still be seen.—Aniensis was built across the river Anio, about three miles from Rome. It was rebuilt by the eunuch Narses, and called after him when destroyed by the Goths.—Cestius was built in the reign of Tiberius, by a Roman called Cestus Gallus, from whom it received its name, and carried back from an island of the Tiber, to which the Fabricius conducted.—Aurelianus was built with marble by the emperor Antoninus.—Armonienses was built by Augustus, to join the Flaminian to the Æmylian road.—Bajanus was built at Baiæ in the sea by Caligula. It was supported by boats, and measured about six miles in length.—Janicularis received its name from its vicinity to Mount Janiculum. It is still standing.—Milvius was about one mile from Rome. It was built by the censor Ælius Scaurus. It was near it that Constantine defeated Maxentius.—Fabricius was built by Fabricius, and carried to an island of the Tiber.—Gardius was built by Agrippa.—Palatinus, near Mount Palatine, was also called Senatori, because the senators walked over it in procession when they went to consult the Sybilline books. It was begun by M. Fulvius, and finished in the censorship of L. Mummius, and some remains of it are still visible.—Trajani was built by Trajan across the Danube, celebrated for its bigness and magnificence.—The emperor built it to assist more expeditiously the provinces against the Barbarians, but his successor destroyed it, as he supposed that it would be rather an inducement for the Barbarians to invade the empire. It was raised on 20 piers of hewn stones, 150 feet from the foundation, 60 feet broad, and 170 feet distant one from the other; extending in length above a mile. [vid. Dacia.] Some of the pillars are still standing.—Another was built by Trajan over the Tagus, part of which still remains. Of temporary bridges, that of Cæsar over the Rhine was the most famous.—The largest single arched bridge known is over the river Elaver. [now the Alier] in France, called Pons Veteris Britæ. The pillars stand on two rocks at the distance of 195 feet. The arch is 84 feet high above the water.—Suffragiorum was built in the Campus Martius, and received its name because the populace were obliged to pass over it whenever they delivered their suffrages at the elections of magistrates and officers of the state.—Tirensis, a bridge of Latium between Arpinum and Minturnæ.—Triumphalis was on the way to the capitol, and passed over by those who triumphed.—Narniensis joined two mountains near Narnia, built by Augustus, of stupendous height, 60 miles from Rome: one arch of it remains, about 100 feet high.

PONTIA, [an island in the Mare Tyrrhenum, off the coast of Campania, and directly south of the promontory of Circeii. The Romans established a colony in it. It was to this island that Tiberius banished Nero the eldest son of Germanicus, where he died of famine and wretchedness, A. D. 31.] Pin. 3, c. 6.—Ptol. 3, c. 1. vid. Cnотrides.

PONTICUS, a poet of Rome, contemporary with Propertius, by whom he is compared to Homer. He wrote an account of the Theban war in heroic verse. Propert. 1, el. 7.

[PONTINÆ PALUDES, or POMPTINÆ PALUDES, a marshy tract of country in the territory of the Volsci, deriving its appellation from the town of Suessa Pometia, in whose vicinity it was situate. These fens are occasioned by the quantity of water carried into the plain by numberless streams which rise at the foot of the adjacent mountains, and for want of a sufficient declivity creep sluggishly over the level space, and sometimes stagnate in pools or lose themselves in the sands. Two rivers principally contributed to the formation of these marshes, the Ufens or Uffente, and the Nymphæus or Ninso. The flat and swampy tract spread to the foot of the Volscian mountains, and covered an extent of 8 miles in breadth and 30 in length, with mud and infection. Appius Claudius, when employed in carrying his celebrated road through these marshes, made the first attempt to drain them. Julius Cæsar is said to have intended to divert the course of the Tiber from Ostia, and carry it through these marshes to Terracina, but the plan perished with him, and gave way to the more moderate but more practicable one of Augustus. This emperor endeavoured to carry off the superfluous waters by opening a canal all along the Via Appia, from Forum Appii to the grove of Feronia. It was customary to embark on the canal in the night-time, as Strabo relates, and Horace practised, because the vapours that arise from these swamps are less noxious in the cool of the night than in the heat of the day. This canal still remains, and is called Canala. These marshes were neglected after the time of Augustus, until the reigns of Nerva and Trajan, the latter of whom drained the country from Treponti and Terracina, and restored the Appian way, which the neglect of the marshes in the previous reigns had rendered nearly impassable. During the convulsion of the following centuries, the marshes were again overflowed, until again drained in the reign of Theodoric. They were never, however, completely exhausted of their water until the pontificate of Pius 6th, although many preceding popes had made the experiment. During the French invasion, however, the precautions necessary to keep open the canals of communication were neglected, and the waters again began to stagnate. These marshes therefore are again formidable at the present day, and, though contracted in their limits, still corrupt the atmosphere for many miles around.] Horat. 1, Sat. 5, v. 9.—Lucan 3, v. 85.

PONTIUS AUFIDIANUS, Herennius, a general of the Samnites, who surrounded the Roman army under the consuls T. Veturius and P. Posthumius. As there was no possibility of escaping for the Romans, Pontius consulted his father what he should do with an army that were prisoners in his hands. The old man advised him either to let them go untouched, or put them all to the sword. Pontius rejected his father's advice, and spared the lives of the enemy, after he had obliged them to pass under the yoke with the greatest ignominy. He was afterwards conquered, and obliged in his turn to pass under the yoke. Fabius Maximus defeated him, when he appeared again at the head of another army, and he was afterwards shamefully put to death by the Romans after he had adorned the triumph of the conqueror. Liv. 9, c. 1, &c.

PONTUS, a kingdom of Asia Minor, [bounded on the north by the Euxine, on the south by Cappadocia, on the west by Galatia and Paphlagonia, and on the east by Armenia.] It was divided into three parts according to Ptolemy. Pontus Galaticus, of which Amasia was the capital, Pontus Polemoniucus, from its chief town Polemonium, and Pontus Cappadocius, of which Trapezus was the capital. This country was originally part of Cappadocia. Darius Hystaspes bestowed it upon Artabazes, either one of the seven noblemen who murdered the usurper Smerdis, or one of their descendants. [In the reign of Ariobarzanes, the Persian yoke was shaken off, and Pontus became an independent kingdom.] The kingdom of Pontus was in its most flourishing state under Mithridates the Great. When J. Cæsar had conquered it, it became a Roman province, though it was often governed by monarchs who were tributary to the power of Rome. Under the emperors a regular governor was always appointed over it. Pontus produced castors, whose testicles were highly valued among the ancients for their salutary qualities in medicinal processes. Virg. G. 1, v. 58.—Mela, 1, c. 1 and 19.—Strab. 12.—Cic. pro Leg.—Man.—Appian.—Ptol. 5, c. 6.—A part of Mysia in Europe on the borders of the Euxine Sea, where Ovid was banished, and from whence he wrote his four books of epistles de Ponto, and his six books de Tristibus. Ovid. de Pont.—An ancient deity, father of Phorcys, Thaumast, Nereus, Eurybia, and Ceto, by Terra. He is the same as Oceanus. Apollod. 1, c. 2.

PONTUS EUXINUS. [vid. Euxinus.]

M. POPILIUS, a consul who was informed, as he was offering a sacrifice, that a sedition was raised in the city against the senate. Upon this he immediately went to the populace in his sacerdotal robes, and quieted the multitude with a speech. He lived about the year of Rome 404. Liv. 9, c. 21.—Val. Max. 7, c. 8.—Lænas, a Roman ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria. He was commissioned to order the monarch to abstain from hostilities against Ptolemy, king of Egypt, who was an ally of Rome. Antiochus wished to evade him by his answers, but Popilius, with a stick which he had in his hand, made a circle round him on the sand, and bade him, in the name of the Roman senate and people, not to go beyond it before he spoke decisively. This boldness intimidated Antiochus; he withdrew his garrisons from Egypt, and no longer meditated a war against Ptolemy. Val. Max. 6, c. 4.—Liv. 45, c. 12.—Patere. 1, c. 10.—A tribune of the people who murdered Cicero, to whose eloquence he was indebted for his life when he was accused of parricide. Plut.—A Roman consul who made war against the people of Numantia on pretence that the peace had not been firmly established. He

POPPEÆ SABINA, a celebrated Roman matron, daughter of Titus Ollius. She married a Roman knight called Rufus Crispinus, by whom he had a son. Her personal charms and the elegance of her figure captivated Otho, who was then one of Nero's favourites. He carried her away, and married her; but Nero, who had seen her, and had often heard her accomplishments extolled, soon deprived him of her company, and sent him out of Italy on pretence of presiding over one of the Roman provinces. After he had taken this step, Nero repudiated his wife Octavia, on pretence of barrenness, and married Poppæa. The cruelty and avarice of the emperor did not long permit Poppæa to share the imperial dignity, and though she had already made him father of a son, he began to despise her, and even to use her with barbarity. She died of a blow which she received from his foot when many months advanced in her pregnancy about the 65th year of the Christian era. Her funeral was performed with great pomp and solemnity, and statues were raised to her memory. It is said that she was so anxious to preserve her beauty and the elegance of her person, that 500 asses were kept on purpose to afford her milk in which she used daily to bathe. Even in her banishment she was attended by 50 of these animals for the same purpose, and from their milk she invented a kind of ointment, or pomatum, to preserve beauty, called poppeanum from her. Plin. 11, c. 41.—Dio. 62.—Juv. 6.—Sueton. in Ner. & Oth.—Tacit. 13 and 14.—A beautiful woman at the court of Nero. She was mother to the preceding. Tacit. Ann. 11, c. 1, &c.

POPULONIA, or POPULONIUM, a town of Etruria, [situate on a promontory of the same name, below Vetulonii, and opposite the island of Ilva.] It was founded by a colony from Volaterræ. It was destroyed in the civil wars of Sylla. Strab. 5.—Virg. Æn. 10, v. 172.—Mela, 2, c. 5.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

PORCIA, a sister of Cato of Utica, greatly commended by Cicero.—A daughter of Cato of Utica, who married Bibulus, and after his death, Brutus. She was remarkable for her prudence, philosophy, courage, and conjugal tenderness. She gave herself a heavy wound in the thigh to see with what fortitude she could bear pain; and when her husband asked her the reason of it, she said that she wished to try whether she had courage enough to share not only his bed, but to partake of his most hidden secrets. Brutus was astonished at her constancy, and no longer detained from her knowledge the conspiracy which he and many other illustrious Romans had formed against J. Cæsar. Porcia wished their success, and though she betrayed fear; and fell into a swoon the day that her husband was gone to assassinate the dictator, yet she was faithful to her promise, and dropped nothing which might affect the situation of the conspirators. When Brutus was dead, she refused to survive him, and attempted to end her life as a daughter of Cato. Her friends attempted to terrify her; but when she saw that every weapon was removed from her reach, she swallowed burning coals and died, about 42 years before the Christian era. Valerius Maximus says, that she was acquainted with her husband's conspiracy against Cæsar when she gave herself the wound. Val. Max. 3, c. 2, l. 4, c. 6.—Plut. in Brut. &c.

PORCIA LEX, de civitate, by M. Porcius the tribune, A. U. C. 453. It ordained that no magistrate should punish with death, or scourge with rods, a Roman citizen when condemned, but permit him to go into exile. Sallust. in Cat.—Liv. 10.—Cic. pro Rab.

M. PORCIUS LATRO, a celebrated orator who killed himself when labouring under a quartan ague, A. U. C. 750.—Licinius, a Latin poet during the time of the third Punic war, commended for the elegance, the graceful ease, and happy wit of his epigrams.—A Roman senator who joined the conspiracy of Catiline.—A son of Cato of Utica, given much to drinking.

POREDORAX, one of the 40 Gauls whom Mithridates ordered to be put to death, and to remain unburied for conspiring against him. His mistress at Pergamus buried him against the orders of the monarch. Plut. de Virt. Mul.

PORPHYRION, a son of Cælus and Terra, one of the giants who made war against Jupiter. He was so formidable that Jupiter, to conquer him, inspired him with love for Juno, and while the giant endeavoured to obtain his wishes, he, with the assistance of Hercules, overpowered him. Horat. 3, od. 4.—Mart. 13, ep. 78.—Apollod. 1, c. 6.

PORPHYRIUS, a Platonic philosopher of Tyre. [His original name was Melek, which, in Syriac, signifies king, and hence he was sometimes called king. Afterwards Longinus changed his name to Porphyrius, from πορφυρα, the Greek for purple, a colour usually worn by kings and princes.] He studied eloquence at Athens under Longinus, and afterwards retired to Rome, where he perfected himself under Plotinus. Porphyry was a man of universal information, and according to the testimony of the ancients, he excelled his contemporaries in the knowledge of history, mathematics, music, and philosophy. He expressed his sentiments with elegance and with dignity, and while other philosophers studied obscurity in their language, his style was remarkable for its simplicity and grace. [Had his judgment and integrity been equal to his learning he would have deserved a distinguished place among the ancients. But neither the splendour of his diction, nor the variety of his reading, can atone for the credulity or dishonesty which filled the narrative part of his works with so many extravagant tales, or interest the reader in the abstruse subtleties and mystical flights of his philosophical writings.] He applied himself to the study of magic, which he called a theurgic or divine operation. The books that he wrote were numerous, and some of the smaller treatises are still extant. His most celebrated work, which is now lost, was against the religion of Christ, and in this theological contest he appeared so formidable, that most of the fathers of the church have been employed in confuting his arguments, and developing the falsehood of his assertions. [The treatises of Porphyry against Christianity were supposed to have been written in Sicily. They are said to have been partially destroyed by the orders of Constantine. Many of them were extant in the fifth century, and were known to Jerome, who made large extracts from them.] He has been universally called the greatest enemy which the Christian religion had. The best edition of his life of Pythagoras is that of Kuster, 4to. Amst. 1707, of his treatise De abstinentia, that of De Rhoer, Traj. ad Rhen. 8vo. 1767, and De Antro Nympharum, that in 8vo. Traj. ad Rhen. 1765.—A Latin poet in the reign of Constantine the Great.

PORSENNA, or PORSĒNA, a king of Etruria, who declared war against the Romans because they refused to restore Tarquin to his throne and to his royal privileges. He was at first successful, the Romans were defeated, and Porsenna would have entered the gates of Rome, had not Cocles stood at the head of a bridge and supported the fury of the whole Etrurian army, while his companions behind were cutting off the communication with the opposite shore. This act of bravery astonished Porsenna; but when he had seen Mutius Scævola enter his camp with an intention to murder him, and when he had seen him burn his hand without emotion, to convince him of his fortitude and intrepidity, he no longer dared to make head against a people so brave and so generous. He made a peace with the Romans, and never after supported the claims of Tarquin. The generosity of Porsenna's behaviour to the captives was admired by the Romans, and to reward his humanity they raised a brazen statue to his honour. Liv. 2, c. 9, &c.—Plut. in Public.—Flor. 1, c. 10.—Horat. ep. 16.—Virg. Æn. 8, v. 646.

PORTA CAPĒNA, a gate at Rome which leads to the Appian road. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 192.—Aurelia, a gate at Rome, which received its name from Aurelius, a consul, who made a road which led to Pisa, all along the coast of Etruria.—Asinaria led to Mount Cælius. It received its name from the family of the Asinii.—Carmentalis was at the foot of the Capitol, built by Romulus. It was afterwards called Scelerata, because the 300 Fabii marched through when they went to fight the enemy, and were killed near the river Cremera.—Janualis was near the temple of Janus.—Esquilina was also called Metia, Taurica, or Libitinensis, and all criminals who were going to be executed generally passed through, as also dead bodies which were carried to be burnt on Mount Esquilinus.—Flaminia, called also Flumentana, was situate between the capitol and Mount Quirinalis, and through it the Flaminian road passed.—Fontinalis led to the Campus Martius. It received its name from the great number of fountains that were near it.—Navalis was situate near the place where the ships came from Ostia.—Viminalis was near Mount Viminalis.—Trigemina, called also Ostiensis, led to the town of Ostia.—Catularia was near the Carmentalis Porta, at the foot of Mount Viminalis.—Collatina received its name from its leading to Collatia.—Collina, called also Quirinalis, Argonensis, and Salaria, was near Quirinalis Mons. Annibal rode up to this gate and threw a spear into the city. It is to be observed, that at the death of Romulus there were only three or four gates at Rome, but the number was increased, and in the time of Pliny there were 37, when the circumference of the walls was 13 miles and 200 paces.

PORTIA and PORTIUS. [vid. Porcia and Porcius.]

PORTUNALIA, festivals of Portumnus at Rome, celebrated on the 17th of August, in a very solemn and lugubrious manner, on the borders of the Tiber. Ovid. Fast. 6, v. 547. —Varro de L. L. 5, c. 3.

PORTUNUS, a sea-deity. [vid. Melicerta.]

PORUS, the god of plenty at Rome. He was son of Metis or Prudence. Plato.—A king of India, when Alexander invaded Asia. The conqueror of Darius ordered him to come and pay homage to him as a dependent prince. Porus scorned his commands, and declared he would go and meet him on the frontiers of his kingdom sword in hand, and immediately he marched a large army to the banks of the Hydaspes. The stream of the river was rapid; but Alexander crossed it in the obscurity of the night, and defeated one of the sons of the Indian monarch. Porus himself renewed the battle, but the valour of the Macedonians prevailed, and the Indian prince retired covered with wounds, on the back of one of his elephants. Alexander sent one of the kings of India to demand him to surrender, but Porus killed the messenger, exclaiming, is not this the voice of the wretch who has abandoned his country? and when he at last was prevailed upon to come before the conqueror, he approached him as an equal. Alexander demanded of him how he wished to be treated; like a king, replied the Indian monarch. This magnanimous answer so pleased the Macedonian conqueror, that he not only restored him his dominions, but he increased his kingdom by the conquest of new provinces; and Porus, in acknowledgment of such generosity and benevolence, became one of the most faithful and attached friends of Alexander, and never violated the assurances of peace which he had given him. Porus is represented as a man of uncommon stature, great strength, and proportionable dignity. Plut. in Alex.—Philostr. 2, c. 10 —Curt. 8, c. 8, &c.—Claud. Cons. Honor. 4. —Another king of India in the reign of Alexander.

POSIDÆUM, a promontory and town of Ionia, where Neptune had a temple. Strab. 14.—A town of Syria below Libanus. Plin. 5, c. 20.—A town near the Strymon, on the borders of Macedonia. Plin. 4, c. 10.

POSIDON, a name of Neptune among the Greeks.

POSIDONIA. [vid. Pæstum.]

POSIDONIUM, a town or temple of Neptune, near Cænis in Italy, where the straits of Sicily are narrowest, and scarce a mile distant from the opposite shore.

POSIDONIUS, a philosopher of Apamea. He lived at Rhodes for some time, and afterwards came to Rome, where, after cultivating the friendship of Pompey and Cicero, he died in his 84th year. [Pompey, on his return from the Mithridatic war, paid a visit to the philosopher at Rhodes for the purpose of attending his lectures, and rendered respectful homage to philosophy by ordering his lictors to lower their faces at the gate of Posidonius.] He wrote a treatise on the nature of the gods. [He is said also to have constructed a kind of sphere with which he exhibited the apparent motions of the sun, moon, and planets round the earth. He is thought besides to have written a continuation of the history of Polybius in an elegant and polished style.] Cic. Tusc. 5, c. 37.—Strab. 14.—[An astronomer and mathematician of Alexandria. He was the disciple of Zeno, and contemporary with, or else a short time posterior to, Eratosthenes. He probably flourished about 260 B. C. He is particularly celebrated on account of his having employed himself in endeavouring to ascertain the measure of the circumference of the earth by means of the altitude of a fixed star. According to Cleomedes, he concluded that it was 240,000 stadia; but, according to Strabo, he made it 180,000 only. He is the reputed author of a treatise on military tactics, mentioned in the first chapter of Ælian's work on the same subject. No fragments of his writings remain.]

POSTHMIUS ALBINUS, a man who suffered himself to be bribed by Jugurtha against whom he had been sent with an army.—A writer at Rome whom Cato ridiculed for composing an history in Greek, and afterwards offering apologies for the inaccuracy and inelegance of his expressions.—Tubero, a master of horse to the dictator Æmilius Mamercus. He was himself made dictator in the war which the Romans waged against the Volsci, and he punished his son with death for fighting against his orders, A. U. C. 312. Liv. 4, c. 23.—Spurius, a consul sent against the Samnites. He was taken in an ambush by Pontius the enemy's general, and obliged to pass under the yoke with all his army. He saved his life by a shameful treaty, and when he returned to Rome, he persuaded the Romans not to reckon as valid the engagements he had made with the enemy, as it was without their advice. He was given up to the enemy because he could not perform his engagements; but the Samnites refused to receive him.—Aulus, a dictator who defeated the Latins and the Volsci.—Tubertus, another dictator, who defeated the Æqui and Volsci.—A general who defeated the Sabines, and who was the first who obtained an ovation.—A general who conquered the Æqui, and who was stoned by the army because he refused to divide the promised spoils. Flor. 22.—Lucius, a Roman consul, who was defeated by the Boii. He was left among the slain, and his head was cut off from his body, and carried in triumph by the Barbarians into their temples, where they made with the skull a sacred vessel to offer libations to their gods.—Marcus Crassus Latianus, an officer proclaimed emperor in Gaul, A. D. 260. He reigned with great popularity, and gained the affection of his subjects by his humanity and moderation. He took his son of the same name as a colleague on the throne. They were both assassinated by their soldiers, after a reign of six years.

POSTUERTA, a goddess at Rome, who presided over the painful travails of women. Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 633.

POTAMIDES, nymphs who presided over rivers and fountains, as their name (ποταμοις, fluvius) implies.

POTYMON, a philosopher of Alexandria in the age of Augustus. He wrote several treatises, and confined himself to the doctrines of no particular sect of philosophers.

POTAMOS, a town of Attica near Sunium. Strab. 9.

POTIDEA, a town of Macedonia, situate in the peninsula of Pallene. It was founded by a Corinthian colony, and became tributary to the Athenians, from whom Philip of Macedonia took it. The conqueror gave it to the Olynthians to render them more attached to his interest. Cassander repaired and enlarged it, and called it Cassandria, a name which it still preserves, and which gave occasion to Livy to say, that Cassander was the original founder of that city. Liv. 44, c. 11.—Demosth. Olynth.—Strab. 7.—Paus. 5, c. 23.—Mela, 2, c. 2.

POTITIUS. [vid. Pinarius.]

POTNIE, a town of Bœotia, where Bacchus had a temple. The Potnians, having once murdered the priest of the god, were ordered by the oracle, to appease his resentment, yearly to offer on his altars a young man. This unnatural sacrifice was continued for some years till Bacchus himself substituted a goat, from which circumstance he received the appellation of Ægobolus and Ægophagus. There was here a fountain whose waters made horses run mad as soon as they were touched. There were also here certain goddesses called Potniades, on whose altars, in a grove sacred to Ceres and Proserpine, victims were sacrificed. It was also usual at a certain season of the year, to conduct into the grove, young pigs, which were found the following year in the groves of Dodona. The mares of Potniæ destroyed their master Glaucus, son of Sisyphus. [vid. Glaucus.] Paus. 9, c. 8.—Virg. G. 3, v. 267.—Ælian. V. H. 15, c. 25.

PRÆNESTĒ, now Palæstrina, a town of Latium, about 21 miles from Rome, built by Telegonus, son of Ulysses and Circe, or, according to others, by Cæculus the son of Vulcan. There was a celebrated temple of Fortune there with two famous images, as also an oracle, which was long in great repute. Cic. de Div. 2, c. 41.—Virg. Æn. 7, v. 680.—Horat. 3, od. 4.

PRÆTOR, one of the chief magistrates of Rome. [The name of Prætor was anciently common to all the magistrates. Thus the Dictator is called in Livy (3, 55,) Prætor Maximus. But when the consuls being engaged in almost continual wars could not attend to the administration of justice, a magistrate was created for that purpose, A. U. C. 389, to whom the name of Prætor was thenceforth appropriated. He was at first created only from among the patricians, as a kind of compensation for the consulship being communicated to the plebeians, but afterwards, A. U. C. 419, from the plebeians also.] One of them was totally employed in administering justice among the citizens, whence he was called prætor urbanus; and the other in all causes which related to foreigners, [and was called prætor peregrinus.] In the year of Rome 520, two more prætors were created to assist the consul in the government of the provinces of Sicily and Sardinia, which had been lately conquered, and two more when Spain was reduced into the form of a Roman province, A. U. C. 571. [The prætor urbanus and peregrinus, administered justice only in minor or private causes, but in public and important causes the people either judged themselves, or appointed persons, one or more, to preside at the trial. In A. U. C. 604, it was determined that the prætor urbanus, and peregrinus, should continue to exercise their usual jurisdictions; and that the other four prætors should during their magistracy also remain in the city, and preside at public trials: one at trials for extortion; another concerning bribery; a third concerning crimes committed against the state; and a fourth about peculation. Still, however, when any thing unusual or atrocious happened, the people or senate judged about the matter themselves, or appointed inquisitors to preside at the trial, as in the case of Clodius for violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea, and of Milo for the murder of Clodius.] Sylla the dictator added two more, and Julius Cæsar increased the number to 10, and afterwards to 16, and the second triumvirate to 67. After this their numbers fluctuated, being sometimes 18, 16, or 12, till, in the decline of the empire, their dignity decreased and their numbers were reduced to three. In his public capacity the prætor urbanus, besides dispensing justice, presided at the celebration of public festivals, and in the absence of the consul assembled or prorogued the senate as he pleased. He also exhibited shows to the people, and in the festivals of the Bona Dea, where no males were permitted to appear, his wife presided over the rest of the Roman matrons. Feasts were announced and proclaimed by him, and he had the power to make and repeal laws if it met with the approbation of the senate and people. The quæstors were subject to him, and in the absence of the consuls, he appeared at the head of the armies, and in the city he kept a register of all the freedmen of Rome, with the reasons for which they had received their freedom. In the provinces the prætors appeared with great pomp, six lictors with the fasces walked before them, and when the empire was increased by conquests, they divided like the consuls their government, and provinces were given them by lot. When the year of their prætorship was elapsed, they were called proprætores, if they still continued at the head of their province. At Rome the prætors appeared also with much pomp, two lictors preceded them, they wore the prætexta, or the white robe with purple borders, they sat in curule chairs, and their tribunal was distinguished by a sword and a spear, while they administered justice. The tribunal was called prætorium. When they rode they appeared on white horses at Rome, as a mark of distinction. The prætors cereales, appointed by Julius Cæsar, were employed in providing corn and provision for the city. They were on that account often called frumentarii.

PRÆTORIA, a town of Dacia, now Cronstadt.—Another, now Aoust, in Piedmont.

PRÆTORIUS, a name ironically applied to As. Sæmpronius Rufus, because he was disappointed in his solicitations for the prætorship, as being too dissolute and luxurious in his manners. He was the first who had a stork brought to his table. Horat. 2, Sat. 2, v. 50.

PRÆSIAS, a lake between Macedonia and Thrace, where were silver mines. Herodot. 5, c. 17.

PRATINAS, a Greek poet of Phillius, contemporary with Æschylus. He was the first among the Greeks who composed satires which were represented as farces. Of these 32 were acted, as also 18 of his tragedies, one of which only obtained the poetical prize. Some of his verses are extant, quoted by Athenæus. Paus. 2, c. 13.

PRAXAGÓRAS, an Athenian writer, who published an history of the kings of his own country. He was then only 19 years old, and three years after, he wrote the life of Constantine the Great. He had also written the life of Alexander, all now lost.

PRAXILA, a lyric poetess of Sicyon, who flourished about 492 years before Christ. Paus. 3, c. 13.

PRAXITÊLES, a famous sculptor of Magna Græcia, who flourished about 324 years before the Christian era. He chiefly worked in Parian marble, on account of its beautiful whiteness. He carried his art to the greatest perfection, and was so happy in copying nature, that his statues seemed to be animated. The most famous of his pieces was a Cupid which he gave to Phryne. This celebrated courtesan, who wished to have the best of all the statues of Praxiteles, and who could not depend upon her own judgment in the choice, alarmed the sculptor by telling him his house was on fire. Praxiteles upon this showed his eagerness to save his Cupid from the flames above all his other pieces; but Phryne restrained his fears, and by discovering her artifice, obtained the favourite statue. The sculptor employed his chisel in making a statue of this beautiful courtesan, which was dedicated in the temple of Delphi, and placed between the statues of Archidamus king of Sparta, and Philip king of Macedon. He also made a statue of Venus, at the request of the people of Cos, and gave them their choice of the goddess, either naked or veiled. The former was superior to the other in beauty and perfection, but the inhabitants of Cos preferred the latter. The Cnidians, who did not wish to patronize modesty and decorum with the same eagerness as the people of Cos, bought the naked Venus, and it was so universally esteemed, that Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, offered the Cnidians, to pay an enormous debt, under which they laboured, if they would give him their favourite statue. This offer was not accepted. The famous Cupid was bought of the Thespians by Caius Cæsar, and carried to Rome, but Claudius restored it to them, and Nero afterwards obtained possession of it. Paus. 1, c. 40, l. 8, c. 9.—Plin. 7, c. 34 and 36.

PRÆLIUS, a lake in Tuscany, now Castiglione. Cic. Mil. 97.—Plin. 3, c. 5.

PRÆXASPES, a Persian who put Smerdis to death by order of king Cambyses. Herodot. 3, c. 30.

PRIAMIDES, a patronymic applied to Paris as being son of Priam. It is also given to Hector, Deiphobus, and all the other children of the Trojan monarch. Ovid. Heroid.—Virg. Æn. 3, v. 295.

PRIÁMUS, the last king of Troy, was son of Laomedon, by Strymo, called Placia by some. When Hercules took the city of Troy [vid. Laomedon,] Priam was in the number of his prisoners, but his sister Hesione redeemed him from captivity, and he exchanged his original name of Podarces for that of Priam, which signifies bought or ransomed. [vid. Podarces.] He was also placed on his father's throne by Hercules, and he employed himself with well directed diligence in repairing, fortifying, and embellishing the city of Troy. He had married, by his father's orders, Arisba, whom now he divorced for Hecuba, the daughter of Dimas, or Cisseus, a neighbouring prince. He had by Hecuba 17 children, according to Cicero, or, according to Homer, 19; the most celebrated of whom are Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Pammon, Polites, Antiphus, Hipponus, Troilus, Creusa, Laodice, Polyxena, and Cassandra. Besides these he had many others by concubines. Their names, according to Apollodorus, are Melampus, Gorgythion, Philæmon, Glaucus, Agathon, Evagoras, Hippothous, Chersidamus, Hippodamas, Mestor, Atas, Dorcyclus, Dryops, Lyeaon, Astygonus, Bias, Evander, Chromius, Telestas, Melius, Cebrion, Laodocus, Idomeneus, Archemachus, Echephron, Hyperion, Ascanius Arrhetus, Democoon, Dejoptes, Echemon, Clovius, Ægioneus, Hyporichus, Lisithous, Polymedon, Medusa, Lysimache, Medesicasta, and Aristodeme. After he had reigned for some time in the greatest prosperity, Priam expressed a desire to recover his sister Hesione, whom Hercules had carried into Greece, and married to Telamon his friend. To carry this plan into execution, Priam manned a fleet, of which he gave the command to his son Paris, with orders to bring back Hesione. Paris, to whom the goddess of beauty had promised the fairest woman in the world, [vid. Paris,] neglected in some measure his father's injunctions, and as if to make reprisals upon the Greeks, he carried away Helen the wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, during the absence of her husband. Priam beheld this with satisfaction, and he countenanced his son by receiving in his palace the wife of the king of Sparta. This rape kindled the flames of war; all the suitors of Helen, at the request of Menelaus, [vid. Menelaus,] assembled to revenge the violence offered to his bed, and a fleet, according to some, of 140 ships, under the command of the 69 chiefs that furnished them, set sail for Troy. Priam might have averted the impending blow by the restoration of Helen; but this he refused to do, when the ambassadors of the Greeks came to him, and he immediately raised an army to defend himself. Troy was soon besieged, frequent skirmishes took place, in which the success was various, and the advantages on both sides inconsiderable. The siege was continued for ten successive years, and Priam had the misfortune to see the greatest part of his children massacred by the enemy. Hector, the eldest of these, was the only one upon whom now the Trojans looked for protection and support; but he soon fell a sacrifice to his own courage, and was killed by Achilles. Priam severely felt his loss, and as he loved him with the greatest tenderness, he wished to ransom his body which was in the enemy's camp. The gods, according to Homer, interested themselves in favour of old Priam. Achilles was prevailed upon by his mother, the goddess Thetis, to restore Hector to Priam, and the king of Troy passed through the Grecian camp conducted by Mercury the messenger of the gods, who with his rod had made him invisible. The meeting of Priam and Achilles was solemn and affecting, the conqueror paid to the Trojan monarch that attention and reverence which was due to his dignity, his years, and his misfortunes, and Priam in a suppliant manner addressed the prince whose favours he claimed, and kissed the hands that had robbed him of the greatest and the best of his children. Achilles was moved by his tears and entreaties, he restored Hector, and permitted Priam a truce of 12 days for the funeral of his son. Some time after Troy was betrayed into the hands of the Greeks by Antenor and Æneas, and Priam upon this resolved to die in the defence of his country. He put on his armour and advanced to meet the Greeks, but Hecuba by her tears and entreaties detained him near an altar of Jupiter, whither she had fled for protection. While Priam yielded to the prayers of his wife, Polytes, one of his sons, fled also to the altar before Neoptolemus, who pursued him with fury. Polytes, wounded and overcome, fell dead at the feet of his parents, and the aged father, fired with indignation, vented the most bitter invectives against the Greek, who paid no regard to the sanctity of altars and temples, and raising his spear, darted it upon him. The spear, hurled by the feeble hand of Priam, touched the buckler of Neoptolemus, and fell on the ground. This irritated the son of Achilles, he seized the grey hairs of Priam, and, without compassion or reverence for the sanctity of the place, he plunged his dagger into his breast. His head was cut off, and the mutilated body was left among the heaps of slain. *Dictys. Cret. 1, &c.—Dares. Phryg.—Herodot. 2, c. 120.—Paus. 10, c. 27.—Homer. Il. 22, &c.—Eurip. in Troad.—Cic. PRIAPUS, a deity among the ancients, who presided over gardens, and the parts of generation in the sexes. [vid. the end of this article.] He was son of Venus by Mercury or Adonis; or, according to the more received opinion, by Bacchus. The goddess of beauty, who was enamoured of Bacchus, went to meet him as he returned victorious from his Indian expedition, and by him she had Priapus, who was born at Lampsacus. Priapus was so deformed in all his limbs, particularly the genitals, by means of Juuo, who had assisted at the delivery of Venus, that the mother, ashamed to have given birth to such a monster ordered him to be exposed on the mountains. His life, however, was preserved by shepherds, and he received the name of Priapus propter deformitatem & membri virilis magnitudinem. He soon became a favourite of the people of Lampsacus, but he was expelled by the inhabitants on account of the freedom he took with their wives. This violence was punished by the son of Venus, and when the Lampsaceniens had been afflicted with a disease in the genitals, Priapus was recalled, and temples erected to his honour.

Festivals were also celebrated, and the people, naturally idle and indolent, gave themselves up to every lasciviousness and impurity during the celebration. His worship was also introduced in Rome; but the Romans revered him more as a god of orchards and gardens than as the patron of licentiousness. A crown painted with different colours was offered to him in the spring, and in the summer a garland of ears of corn. An ass was generally sacrificed to him, because that animal by its braying awoke the nymph Lotis, to whom Priapus was going to offer violence. He is generally represented with an human face and the ears of a goat; he holds a stick in his hand, with which he terrifies birds, as also a club to drive away thieves, and a scythe to prune the trees and cut down corn. He was crowned with the leaves of the vine, and sometimes with laurel, or rocket. The last of these plants is sacred to him, and it is said to raise the passions and excite love. Priapus is often distinguished by the epithet of phallus, fascinus, lyphallus, or ruber, or rubicundus, which are all expressive of his deformity. [Priapus is supposed by Banier, to have been the same with Belphegor, that idol of iniquity mentioned by St. Jerome, and his worship is said to have been brought to Lampsacus, whence it passed into Greece and Italy. This worship, it is thought, came originally from Egypt, agreeably to an observation sanctioned by the authority of Herodotus, that the birth of a god in any country means only the introduction of his worship into that country. Accordingly Priapus was reported to be the son of that Bacchus who made the conquest of India, and who is supposed to have been the same with Osiris, and Venus his mother was the same with Isis. This Egyptian queen had introduced, after the death of her husband, the ceremony of the Phallus. Such is the explanation of Banier. More recent enquiries, however, into certain parts of the religion of modern India, stamp the worship of Priapus as decidedly of Indian origin.] Catull. ep. 19 and 20.—Colamn. 2, de Culthort.—Horat. 1, sat. 1.—Tibull. 1, el. 1, v. 18.—Ovid. Fast. 1, v. 415, l. 6, v. 319.—Virg. Ecl. 7, v. 33, G. 4, v. 111.—Paus. 9, c. 31.—Hygin. fab. 190.—Diod. 1.—A town of Asia Minor, near Lampsacus, now Caraboa. PRËNE, a maritime town of Asia Minor at the foot of Mount Mycale, one of the twelve independent cities of Ionia. It gave birth to Bias, one of the seven wise men of Greece. It had been built by an Athenian colony. Paus. 7, c. 2, l. 8, c. 24.—Strab. 12.

PRISCIANUS, [an eminent grammarian, born at Cæsarea in Palestine. He went to Constantinople, where he taught grammar and rhetoric with much success about the year 525. He composed various works, of which his treatise "De Arte Grammatica" was first published by Aldus, at Venice, in 1476, from a MS. found in France. It has been re-printed frequently, but the best edition is that of Putschius, 1605, among the Grammatici Latini. A valuable edition appeared also in 1819, by Krehl, Lips. 2 vols. 8vo. A translation of the Periegesis of Dionysius into Latin verse is attributed to Priscian, and has been printed with the Oxford edition of that author.]

PRISCUS, SERVILIUS, a dictator at Rome who defeated the Veientes and the Fidenates. —A surname of the elder Tarquin king of Rome. (vid. Tarquinius.)—Helvidius, a quæstor in Achaia during the reign of Nero, remarkable for his independent spirit, &c. Tacit. Hist. 4, c. 6.—Juvenal.—An orator whose dissipated and luxurious manners Horace ridicules, 1 Sat. 7, v. 9.

PRISTIS, the name of one of the ships that engaged in the naval combat which was exhibited by Æneas at the anniversary of his father's death. She was commanded by Mnestheus. Virg. Æn. 1, v. 116.

PRIVERNUM, now Piperno Vecchio, a town of the Volsci in Italy, whose inhabitants were called Privernates. It became a Roman colony. Liv. 8, c. 10.—Virg. Æn. 11, v. 540.—Cic. 1, Div. 43.

PROBUS, M. Arelius Severus, a native of Sirmium in Pannonia. His father was originally a gardener, who by entering the army rose to the rank of a military tribune. His son obtained the same office in the 22d year of his age, and he distinguished himself so much by his probity, his valour, his intrepidity, moderation, and clemency, that at the death of the emperor Tacitus, he was invested with the imperial purple by the voluntary and uninfluenced choice of his soldiers. His election was universally approved by the Roman senate and the people: and Probus, strengthened on his throne by the affection and attachment of his subjects, marched against the enemies of Rome in Gaul and Germany. Several battles were fought, and after he had left 400,000 barbarians dead in the field, Probus turned his arms against the Sarmatians. The same success attended him, and after he had quelled and terrified to peace the numerous Barbarians of the north, he marched through Syria against the Blemmyes in the neighbourhood of Egypt. The Blemmyes were defeated with great slaughter, and the military character of the emperor was so well established, that the king of Persia sued for peace by his ambassadors, and attempted to buy the conqueror's favours with the most splendid presents. Probus was then feasting upon the most common food when the ambassadors were introduced; but without even casting his eyes upon them, he said, that if their master did not give proper satisfaction to the Romans he would lay his territories desolate, and as naked as the crown of his head. As he spoke the emperor took off his cap, and showed the baldness of his head to the ambassadors. His conditions were gladly accepted by the Persian monarch, and Probus retired to Rome to convince his subjects of the greatness of his conquests, and to claim from them the applause which their ancestors had given to the conqueror of Macedonia or the destroyer of Carthage, as he passed along the streets of Rome. His triumph lasted several days, and the Roman populace were long entertained with shows and combats. But the Roman empire, delivered from its enemies, was torn by civil discord, and peace was not re-established till three usurpers had been severally defeated. While his subjects enjoyed tranquillity, Probus encouraged the liberal arts, he permitted the inhabitants of Gaul and Illyricum to plant vines in their territories, and he himself repaired 70 cities in different parts of the empire which had been reduced to ruins. He also attempted to drain the waters which were stagnated in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, by conveying them to the sea by artificial canals. His armies were employed in this laborious undertaking; but as they were unaccustomed to such toils, they soon mutinied, and fell upon the emperor as he was passing into one of the towns of Illyricum. He fled into a tower which he himself had built to observe the marshes, but as he was alone and without arms, he was soon overpowered and murdered in the 50th year of his age, after a reign of six years and four months, on the second of November, after Christ 282. The news of his death was received with the greatest consternation; not only his friends, but his very enemies, deplored his fate, and even the army, which had been concerned in his fall, erected a monument over his body, and placed upon it this inscription: Hic Probus imperator, verè probus, situs est, victor omnium gentium barbararum, victor etiam tyrannorum. He was then preparing in a few days to march against the Persians that had revolted, and his victories there might have been as great as those he obtained in the two other quarters of the globe. He was succeeded by Carus, and his family, who had shared his greatness, immediately retired from Rome, not to become objects either of private or public malice. Zos.—Prob.—Saturn.—Emilius, a grammarian in the age of Theodosius. The lives of excellent commanders, written by Cornelius Nepos, have been falsely attributed to him by some authors.—An oppressive prefect of the pretorian guards in the reign of Valentinian.

PROCHÏTA, an island of Campania in the bay of Puteoli, now Procida. It was situated near Ioarima, from which it was said that it had been separated by an earthquake. It received its name, according to Dionysius, from the nurse of Æneas. Virg. Æn. 2, v. 715.—Mela, 2, c. 7.—Dionys. Hal. 1.

C. VALERIUS PROCILLUS, a prince of Gaul, intimate with Cæsar.

PROCLÆS, a son of Aristodemus and Argia, born at the same birth as Eurysthenes. There were continual dissensions between the two brothers who both sat on the Spartan throne. [vid. Eurysthenes and Lacedæmon.]

—A native of Andros in the Ægean Sea, who was crowned at the Olympic games. Paus. 6, c. 14. Id. 7, c. 4.—A Carthaginian writer, son of Eucrates. He wrote some historical treatises, of which Pausanias has preserved some fragments. Id. 4, c. 35.—A tyrant of Epidaurus, put to death, and thrown into the sea. Plut. de orac.

PROCONNÆSUS, now Marmora, an island of the Propontis, at the north-east of Cyzicus; also called Elaphonnesus and Neurus. It was famous for its fine marble. [The marble of this island was of a bluish white, slightly variegated with black; this colour usually running in small veins, and not unaptly resembling, in many instances, the course of the veins of a human body in the naked statues. It was also used in the sumptuous buildings of the Romans.] Plin. 5, c. 32.—Strab. 13.—Mela, 2, c. 7.

PROCOPIUS, a celebrated officer of a noble family in Cilicia, related to the emperor Julian, with whom he lived in great intimacy. He was universally admired for his integrity, but he was not destitute of ambition or pride. After he had signalized himself under Julian and his successor, he retired from the Roman provinces among the Barbarians in the Thracian Chersonesus, and some time after he suddenly made his appearance at Constantinople, when the emperor Valens had marched into the east, and he proclaimed himself master of the eastern empire. His usurpation was universally acknowledged, and his victories were so rapid, that Valens would have resigned the imperial purple had not his friends intervened. But now fortune changed, Procopius was defeated in Phrygia, and abandoned by his army. His head was cut off, and carried to Valentinian in Gaul, A. D. 366. Procopius was slain in the 42d year of his age, and he had usurped the title of emperor for about eight months. Ammian. Marcel. 25 and 26.—A Greek historian of Cæsarea in Palestine, secretary to the celebrated Belisarius, A. D. 534. He wrote the history of the reign of Justinian, and greatly celebrated the hero whose favours and patronage he enjoyed. [Procopius himself was employed by Belisarius against the Goths in Italy. He was afterwards nominated senator, and about A. D. 562 was appointed prefect of Constantinople, a station of which he was deprived subsequently, by the emperor Justinian.] This history is divided into eight books, two of which give an account of the Persian war, two of the Vandals, and four of the Goths, to the year 553, which was afterwards continued in five books by Agathais till 559. [According to two modern Oriental scholars, Procopius derived his materials for the Armenian work of the bishop Puzunt Posodus, who was born at Constantinople of Greek parents, and who wrote a history of Armenia in 6 books, of which the last 4 have reached us. Procopius is the author also of a work, entitled Anecdota, or secret history, in which Justinian and his empress Theodora, are represented in a most odious light. Procopius assigns as a reason for writing this last work, that in his history he could not speak of persons and things as he wished. He was the author of a third work "On the edifices erected by the emperor Justinian." As an eyewitness of many of the events which he describes, Procopius is entitled to great attention. He writes like one free from all the prejudices of his age; when, however, he makes mention of the emperor and his court, he appears entitled only to that degree of credit which is due to one who writes under the constraint and eye of his prince.] The works of Procopius were edited in 2 vols. folio. Paris, 1662.

PROCRUSTES, a famous robber of Attica, killed by Theseus, near the Cephissus. He tied travellers on a bed, and if their length exceeded that of the bed he used to cut it off, but if they were shorter, he had them stretched to make their length equal to it. He is called by some Damastes and Polypemon. Ovid. Heroid. 2, v. 69. Met. 7, v. 43.—Plut. in These.

PROCULEIUS, a Roman knight very intimate with Augustus. He is celebrated for his humanity and fraternal kindness to his brothers Muræna and Scipio, with whom he divided his possessions after they had forfeited their estates, and incurred the displeasure of Augustus for siding with young Pompey. He was sent by Augustus to Cleopatra, to endeavour to bring her alive into his presence, but to no purpose. He destroyed himself when labouring under a heavy disease. Horat. 2, od. 2.—Plut. in Anton.—Plin. 36, c. 24.

PROCULUS JULIUS, a Roman, who, after the death of Romulus, declared that he had seen him in his appearance more than human, and that he had ordered him to bid the Romans to offer him sacrifices under the name of Quirinus, and to rest assured that Rome was destined by the gods to become the capital of the world. Plut. in Rom.—Liv. 1, c. 16.—An African in the age of Aurelius. He published a book entitled de regionibus, on foreign countries, &c.—An officer who proclaimed himself emperor in Gaul, in the reign of Probus. He was soon after defeated, and exposed on a gibbet. He was very debauched and licentious in his manners, and had acquired riches by piratical excursions.

tude,] near Sirius, or the dog star, before which it generally rises in July. Cicero calls it Anticanis, which is of the same signification (πρωκυων). Horat. 3, od. 29.—Cic. de Nat. D. 2, c. 44.

PRODICUS, a sophist and rhetorician of Cos, about 396 years before Christ. He was sent as ambassador by his countrymen to Athens, where he publicly taught, and had among his pupils Euripides, Socrates, Thramenes, and Isocrates. He travelled from town to town in Greece, to procure admirers and get money. He made his auditors pay to hear him harangue, which has given occasion to some of the ancients to speak of the orations of Prodicus, for 50 drachmas. In his writings, which were numerous, he composed a beautiful episode, in which virtue and pleasure were introduced, as attempting to make Hercules one of their votaries. The hero at last yielded to the charms of virtue, and rejected pleasure. This has been imitated by Lucian. Prodicus was at last put to death by the Athenians on pretence that he corrupted the morals of their youth. Xenophon. Memor.

PRÆROSA, a surname of Ceres. Her festivals, celebrated at Athens and Eleusis before the sowing of corn, bore the same name. Meurs. de myst. El.
